The partition of Bengal conferred political predominance on the Mahomedans and for the first time in the history of Anglo-Indian civil administration partisanship—he used the word in no offensive sense—had been manifested by the Government of India in dealing with the subject races. That spirit was a very dangerous one to be manifested by the Government of India. The creation of antagonism between Mahomedans and Hindus was one of the most radical and serious difficulties they had to contend with in India, and the creation of a province with the special object of giving predominance to Mahomedans in a country that was essentially Hindu was calculated to produce throughout Eastern Bengal that particular difficulty that Indian Governments most desired to avoid. Nobody admired the true Indian Mahomedan more than he did. For the last six years of his official life he lived among them and was on friendly terms with nearly all of any importance in his province. They were a race that anybody could invite to one's table and could accept invitations to their houses. But who were the Mahomedans of Eastern Bengal? Were they the descendants of the invaders who came into Upper India under Timur? By no means. They were the aboriginal inhabitants of Eastern Bengal who, after the Mahomedan invasion in the 13th century, willingly accepted the Mahomedan creed. From that time up to our conquest they had lived among their Hindu neighbours undistinguished from them, so far as the records showed. He had lived among them for three years and got to like them. Although extremely fanatical, they were a fine body of men, but the most ignorant people that he had met in the whole of his Indian career. He recognized the educational efforts that had since been made among them, but were they the men to be given political predominance over the clever and intellectual Hindus? Such a policy was destined to produce the most injurious consequences to our rule. . . . The ultimate effect of the noble earl's policy would be the extinction of the Bengali Hindu as a political unit in the Indian Empire. There was every reason to believe that the Bengali mind was growing to accept that possible consummation as a fact certain to occur, and the conviction thereby produced in his mind excited the most bitter feelings of animosity and revenge, and those feelings found expression in outrage and assassination. It was his firm belief that that state of things would have increased and grown worse as the effects of the policy of partition made themselves more plain, and in his opinion no more happy event had ever occurred in our Indian history than His Majesty's declaration in Durbar by which the current of thought of an entire people was changed from discontent to loyalty. . . . He considered Earl Curzon's partition policy as one of the great mistakes which had been made in the history of our government of India. Millions of people in Bengal regarded the partition as a breach of a promise contained in the proclamation by which Queen Victoria took over the direct government of India. The words of the proclamation were: "In their prosperity will be our strength, in their contentment our security and in their gratitude our best reward."

The Mussalmans would no doubt be duly grateful to his lordship for his admiration for "the true Indian Muhammadan," and the "character" he gave him. But it is doubtful whether all this would alter by a jot the "character" which the noble lord himself acquired generally for his manners, or make the Mussalmans endorse his statement that "for the last six years of his official life he lived among them and was on friendly terms with nearly all of any importance in his province." To use his lordship's own words, it was during those six years of his satrapy that "for the first time in the history of Anglo-Indian civil administration partisanship"—and we know of only one sense in which the word can be used—was manifested by so important an official in his dealings with "the subject races." If the creation of antagonism between Muhammadans and Hindus is one of the most radical and serious difficulties we have to contend with in India, the linguistic disturbance that he sought to create in a province which was essentially Moslem in its culture and literary taste, and the inquiries that he set on foot to show to the Hindus that they had not had their proportionate share of Government offices and places, was calculated to produce that particular difficulty which Indian Governments most desired to avoid. It is indeed the irony of fate that Lord Macdonnell should get up in Parliament to accuse Lord Curzon of partisanship and descent on the virtues of impartiality.

But whatever else may or may not be objectionable in his remarks, we deprecate most emphatically the distinction between "true Indian Muhammadans," meaning, we presume, "the descendants of the invaders who came into Upper India under Timur," and "the aboriginal inhabitants of Eastern Bengal who, after the Muhammadan invasion in the 13th century, willingly accepted the Muhammadan creed." It is the glory of Islam that not only were the successors of Timur and his band of invaders humanized, but that the men who but for Islam, would have been among the savages, the untouchables and the depressed in Eastern Bengal were given a message of hope and emancipated from the thralldom of caste. To-day they are the equals of those who trace their descent from the greatest of the Great Moghals, so far as Islam is concerned, and given those educational efforts to which Lord Macdonnell alludes, but for which we never heard him appeal in connection with Eastern Bengal, they would soon claim actual as well as legal equality with "the clever and intellectual Hindus" who have secured, for good or evil, the advocacy of his lordship.

To talk of "the clever and intellectual Hindus" ever growing to accept the "possible consummation" of extinction "as a political unit in the Indian Empire" as "a fact certain to occur" is not only to talk nonsense, but also to talk that which the speaker himself believes to be nonsense. To Lord Macdonnell it may be enough if His Majesty's declaration in Durbar changed the current of thought of an entire people from discontent to loyalty. For our part, we are sceptical of this, and the Calcutta Deputation against the Dacca University and the appointment of a special educational officer for Eastern Bengal has not gone to convince us of our folly. But it matters little to Lord Macdonnell if the current of thought of another "entire people" was turned in the opposite direction, from loyalty to discontent. Lord Amphill may still believe that "the people of India had assented—in fact cheerfully assented—to the changes, and it was their opinion that really mattered." He may continue to think that "there was no evidence that the people of India were discontented." But such comfortable belief does not alter the fact that if the Mussalmans are to be included among "the people of India," they were not contented and they had assented neither cheerfully nor otherwise. They had, as the authors of the changes admit, exercised great self-restraint, but that only means that there was something within them which needed re-training, and it is needless to add that it could not have been cheerful assent. They have patiently waited for the announcement of some compensating advantages for the loss of "predominance" in Eastern Bengal, and hitherto they have no definite knowledge as to what that compensation, even if educational, is to be. Lord Macdonnell, in supporting the anti-Partitionists, quotes with evident feeling the Good Queen's Proclamation that "in their prosperity will be our strength, in their contentment our security and in their gratitude our best reward." But we trust Lord Hardinge does not believe with Lord Macdonnell that this noble Proclamation was of limited application. We hope that in Moslem prosperity he would also find an element of strength, in Moslem contentment at least some little security, and in Moslem gratitude, we shall not say reward—for a community so humble cannot reward one so high—but certainly some slight satisfaction.

Lord Morley and the "Settled Fact."

We have always had an overpowering faith in the liberal principles of Lord Morley and, to use his own phrase, we have tried to kindle our own modest rushlight at his lamp of temperate and practical Liberalism. We felt as keenly as anyone else in this country the dangers of the repressive policy to which Lord Morley gave his unwilling assent, but we never accused him of being "that abject and despicable being, a philosopher," nor condemned him for having gone against "the principles of a lifetime." But we confess his speech on Persia in reply to Lord Curzon in which, as the Pioneer remarked, "the two antagonists appeared to have exchanged the foils, astonished us, and if Lord Curzon ever thought of revenging himself on the noble viscount for his subtle sarcasm, he appears to us to have an excellent opportunity in the speech of Lord Morley on the reversal of the Partition and the bearings of the Constitution and customary procedure on the Announcement at Delhi.

To begin with, Lord Morley agrees with Lord Amphill that "the discussion (of the changes) would be ineffectual as the motion of the noble earl could produce no result in the way of a change of policy," and yet, presumably as a concession to the self-same "principle of a lifetime," he admits that "the matters involved in the two policies are fairly topics for parliamentary debate." In the next place, Lord Morley, somewhat used to the acquiescence of Lord Minto, finds his outspoken utterance, now that he has secured his freedom, "particularly disagreeable," because he agrees with Lord Curzon and—for the benefit of the Bengali newspapers we may add—the Nawab of Dacca, that "such a policy could but depreciate the reputation of British rule in India," and that as having been the last Viceroy of India and "as having lately been intimately connected with its public affairs he felt that he was not entitled to keep silence." In reply to his criticism Lord Morley easily brushes aside the Lieutenant-Governors as people to whom no particular reverence was ever paid by either, and then politely tells the small group of ex-Viceroy that nothing would have been gained "by asking their opinion upon a point which depended not upon old history, nor upon old arguments threshed out, but upon the present actual situation." Now, how does this dictum fit in with the change of the capital? On his own admission that was a question "which had been before the people of India, officials and others, for generation after generation." So it comes to this, that one question was too old and the other too new to need consultation. As Lord Lansdowne said, in this matter Lord Morley was far more autocratic than Lord Crewe himself, and the shaft must have gone home that "if you want autocratic sentiments, go to a Liberal Minister."

But when he comes to deal with the unsettling of this settled fact that Lord Morley seems to have put on the complete armour of the Tory Knight. He said—

"My noble friend was made Viceroy in November, I became Secretary of State in December. We were therefore a new Government. I am sure the noble earl (Lord Minto) would be the first person to admit that, a great party sweep having taken place in Great Britain, and a Government of a different tone and complexion having come into power, it was all important that nothing should be done to lead people in India to suppose for a moment that there was going to be any great sweep or reversal of policy. There was another reason—namely, that it would be wrong, partition having only been in operation for six months or less—wrong and rash for us at once to reverse an operation the effects of which we had had no opportunity of forming a judgment upon. There was a third reason. My noble friend and I were engaged upon a project of Council reform. That was a project which was regarded by a great many people as dangerous, as hazardous in the extreme, as opening the door to all kinds of mischief. It was a reform for the successful carrying out of which we were bound to have with us as far as ever we could the good opinion and the friendly aid of the Indian Civil Service and of Anglo-Indian public opinion. If they had seen that we were going to reverse Lord Curzon's policy, that we were then going to launch out on this difficult and arduous voyage, we should have run the risk of having our whole course and prospects seriously damaged. Friends of my own were very angry with me for many months for not taking immediate steps for reversing that policy. That, if you like, would have been concession to clamour, if we had reversed partition in December 1905. There was a well known Member of Parliament who wrote a letter and said that if they would be tenacious in keeping up the clamour they would squeeze me into advising my noble friend opposite to give up. That is the story of the failure to reverse, and if there is any charge of inconsistency in abstaining from reversing partition in 1906, 1907, and onwards, and now accepting the policy, which is not a reversal but a modification of the policy of partition, my withers are at all events completely unwrung."

To deal with each of these four reasons seriatim, we should like to ask what "first principles" made it undesirable "to lead the people of India to suppose that there was going to be any great sweep or reversal of policy"? Was it not the desire to impress on India that she was outside Party politics and that every British M. P. was a member for India? Now, even if a George Hamilton could be pardoned for this empty sentiment, it is unforgivable in a John Morley. With all its faults, the English Party system has been accepted as the best compromise in politics and has hitherto stood the strain of circumstances. To place India outside that system is to keep the British constituents hopelessly unenlightened about their great dependency, and to regard every M. P. as the member for India is to have the chosen representatives of that electorate even more ignorant than M. P.'s are as a rule. South Africa was a plank in the Party platform, and it is to this fact that South Africa owes the repatriation of the "Chinese Slaves" and the grant of self government. Paradoxical as it may seem, for India, a precipitation into the vortex of Party politics is like reaching the haven that she sought.

As to the second reason, the desire for more experience of the Partition before reversing it, we should have thought Lord Morley at least to be immune from the malady of such shallow reasoning. Is he waiting even now to see if the re-partition of Bengal is a failure before he advises the Cabinet to revoke it also? If so, there is a rich harvest to be reaped by the agitators against the new changes. The only ground for doubt is that Lord Crewe has not yet declared it to be a settled fact, for it is declarations of this nature which, like guarantees of integrity and independence, give assurance that the Liberal Government contemplates just the reverse of what it says. We should have thought that momentous changes such as these would first be considered carefully and in consultation with all interests involved, and then carried out; but here we have an instance of one hasty Partition undone after six years' trial, and a more hasty Partition carried out after still less consideration and with no consultation whatever, between which and its revocation there is nothing but "the irrevocable word of the Sovereign." A logical conclusion of this would be if the High Courts began to deliver judgments in cases preparatory to the taking of evidence.

As regards the third reason, we do not know how to characterise it. It now appears that Lord Morley was all the time convinced that he regarded the Partition, along with Lord Macdonnell, as a great blunder, while he was rebuking such members of the democracy as desired to rip up a settled fact and reproaching Lord Macdonnell himself for taking the palm for indiscretion. In spite of the fact that a minute ago he said that he was waiting to see the effects of the operation, he now assures us that he had a ready formed his judgment, and although he recognized the Partition to be a mistake, he persisted in that error in order to bribe the Indian Civil Service and Anglo-Indian public opinion in favour of what a great many people regarded as a project of reform which was dangerous and hazardous in the extreme and which opened the door to all kinds of mischief. This confession of throwing a sop to Anglo-Indian sentiment makes us wonder whether the safeguards devised for the representation of the minorities were also bribes offered for the time being to Moslem sentiment and are as likely to be withdrawn at a suitable moment as the boon of the Partition. It is reasoning of this nature that presents Lord Morley and his compromises in a light in which he is seen to the least advantage. To us it appears that when that "abject and despicable being, a philosopher" descends to the level of tricky politicians and throws temporary sops to interests which deserve something more than that in sheer justice, he gives some point at least to the epithet which he uses for himself in mere mockery. His nature becomes something like that of Macbeth,

"It is too full o' the milk of human kindness,
To catch the nearest way: thou wouldst be great;
Art not without ambition, but without
The illness should attend it: What thou wouldst highly,
That thou wouldst not play false,
And yet wouldst wrongly win."

In this case, Lord Morley has used some of the tricks of the trade, but has not known how to hide them under the sonorous phrase of the practised politician, and whether his lordship's withers are wrung or unwrung, he may be sure few will trouble him any more about "the principles of a lifetime." He has descended to the common plane of the opportunist and he must be content to receive no more than the reward of a successful opportunist and no less than the contempt for the opportunist that fails. For the purposes of the law of high politicians are "all honourable men," but it was not in that sense surely that a critical public gave him the name of "Honest John."

As regards the fourth and the last of his reasons for the reversal of the Partition at the present juncture, that in 1906, 1907, and onwards the reversal would have appeared as a concession to clamour, he reminds us of the simple swain who had to go to the law courts as the defendant in a breach of promise suit to escape from the clutches of a designing young person. When after great expense and much worry he had won the case, a pleading letter was received from the unsuccessful plaintiff, appealing the time more to love than to law. In response to this epistle, the defendant who had succeeded in withholding his hand from the plaintiff now lost his heart to the appellant, and within three days of winning the lawsuit went to a Registry Office and married this designing person. That seems to us to be the situation of Lord Morley, and we congratulate the veteran politician from Bengal who went to England last summer on the success of his emotional appeal.

(The heart that I had saved from beautiful youths, an ancient person of innumerable winters snatched away with a single glance.)

Whatever the ethical aspect of Lord Morley's opportunism, we could not conceive that it would lead him into such devious paths in the realm of intellect also as it seems to have done. If one could not go to Lord Morley as a fountain-head of moral ideas, one was at least sure of getting his intellectual thirst satisfied at the spring which had its sources in the political philosophy of Burke and Mill. But what are we to say of his remarks "upon the Constitutional point"? He asks, "What is exactly the Constitutional point, and tells us that Lord Salisbury said, "I hold that the Monarchy should seem to be as little Constitutional as possible," adding for himself that he understood what Lord Salisbury meant, but that it was a doubtful proposition. That is more than we can say of Lord Morley's own dubious phrase, for we have not the remotest notion what he means. He tells us that "we are now dealing with what is undoubtedly delicate Constitutional ground," but we would have been inclined to compliment him on his skating over this ice if we had not been somewhat doubtful of his having put on the skates at all. He seems to us to remain on terra firma, but while he is stationary himself he carries us also no farther. Does he believe that on this Constitutional point anybody who turned to him for enlightenment could be satisfied with a general quotation from Bagehot that "it would create great surprise if people were told how many things a Sovereign could do without consulting Parliament"? He repeats what he had said a year ago about the Secretary of State having the last word in every question that arises and the very first word in every question that in his view he thinks ought to arise, and he asks us to accept this as the final doctrine. We have already accepted its finality, but to us it appears to be only remotely relevant. How does it answer our question to ask another, "What has the Government of India to do"? Are we to think that it was Lord Morley himself who had dictated the creation of a new heaven and a new earth to the Government of India, instead of being advised himself by those in touch with "the present actual situation"? The sum total of Lord Morley's dissertation on the Constitutional point is, that in his announcement His Majesty said, "We are pleased to announce to our people that upon the advice of our Ministers and after consultation with our Governor-General in Council we have decided," and so on, and Lord Morley confronts the questioners with the query of the Sphinx, "Is not that exactly what the Constitution demands?" After reading all this in clear cold print we are constrained to say that, if this is light we should prefer some smoke. It reminds us of nothing so much as of the "non-committal reply" which Mark Twain says he once wrote as the Secretary of a Senator in answer to some painfully direct questions from his enraged constituents who wanted to know whether their representative was leading them. If politics robs an honest man of his sincerity and reduces a clear thinking philosopher to an unconscious humourist, the less we have to do with politics the better. Lord Morley's books have been a source of pleasure and knowledge to more than one generation of students of History, Political Philosophy, and Literature. For the sake of their beneficial influence we devoutly wish that no publisher would include in his published speeches those which he has just delivered on Persia and the Announcement in the debates initiated by Lord Curzon. These, all persons who are charitably inclined would only too willingly let die.

Short Story.

Vicissitude II.

THE LAWYER'S CLIENT.

MR. ALI HOSSAIN was spending the long vacation up at Mussoorie. He had been having a very nice time indeed. He had not been accompanied by the partner of his joys and sorrows, and although far be it from us to suggest that he was not all that a model husband should be, still it must be confessed that an occasional holiday en garçon was not absolutely abhorrent to him.

He had really had a most enjoyable time and was beginning to feel very sorry that the speedy opening of the law courts was bringing it to an end.

The Charleville had been particularly gay this season, and Mr. Ali Hossain had been largely in demand. In tennis tournaments, bridge parties, picnics, dances, amateur theatricals he shone. The ladies at the Charleville, of whom there was a fair sprinkling, all found in him a most charming cavalier; the men voted him a good fellow. There had in fact been nothing at all to mar his enjoyment. But all good things come to an end, and unfortunately unless the briefs were attended to and clients satisfied, such holidays would no longer be possible.

The gong for lunch sounded and gradually the huge dining room filled up. All the tables were soon occupied with the exception of one near the entrance, which had been placed there in addition to the usual tables evidently. It was beautifully decorated with huge crimson roses and maidenhair ferns. Mr. Ali Hossain and his three friends occupied a table just behind it, and were speculating on the why and the wherefore of the unusual decorations, when three newcomers entered the room and took their seats at this very table. An elderly man, who looked as though he were their father or uncle, and two very pretty girls of about 17 or 18 comprised the party. Mr. Ali Hossain had ever a keen eye for beauty and he could not help being struck by the two charming damsels. One was a blonde of the petite mignone type, the other was a tall and slender brunette. It was hard to say which of the two was the prettier, but Mr. Ali Hossain always admired fair beauties more and cast many furtive glances in the direction of the strange table. He could not help noticing the stern and silent demeanour of the masculine member of the trio, and without being unduly conceited, he also flattered himself that the other two who were facing him cast several glances at his table, glances not devoid of interest. He hoped that the newcomers were not mere casual visitors for lunch, but that they were residents in the hotel, and that he would soon have an opportunity of making their acquaintance.

At the end of lunch the elderly gentleman rose and followed by the two girls left the room. As they passed by Mr. Ali Hossain half fancied that the fair-haired one lagged a little behind and almost lingered a few seconds near his table. She seemed to be hesitating about something and the absurd idea flashed across his brain that she wished to speak to him. He almost fancied a look of entreaty in her eyes. The thought was too ridiculous, however, and he dismissed it at once as such, and was presently absorbed in a deep discussion with his friends on an intricate bridge problem. Later on in the afternoon as he was dressing for tennis, one of the hotel servants brought him a note. Tearing it open he read:

"You will be astonished at my writing to you, but I am in great distress and need your help very urgently. That is my only excuse for venturing to take this step. I have heard much of your reputation as a lawyer and when I saw you to-day I felt certain you could help me, and I am sure I can trust you. Will you help me? If you will please send me a line in reply (this man will give it to me safely) simply saying 'yes,' in that case I will lunch with you to-morrow at the Criterion at 1 o'clock. There I will tell you all my trouble. I need not sign my name as I saw you noticed me to day."

"P.S.—Please tear this up at once. I trust you not to say a word to any one."

Mr. Ali Hossain, as we have mentioned before, was a very popular young man, furthermore, his friends had not left him in ignorance of this fact. He had always been very kindly treated by the fair sex and he was much too gallant to refuse to aid beauty in distress. Besides it was surely his duty as a lawyer and a gentleman to respond to her entreaty. He was almost sure he had read entreaty in the girl's eyes. Without hesitation he took a sheet of notepaper decorated with his crest and monogram and wrote on it one single word "yes." Putting it in the envelope unaddressed, he sealed it carefully, and handed it to the man, who salaamed quietly and left the room.

Mr. Ali Hossain went off to play the final in his tennis tournament in the highest of spirits.

That evening he was besieged with invitations for the next day, unfortunately all between 12 and 4. Picnics, lunches, bridge, tennis, all seemed fixed for that particular day at that particular time. Mr. Ali Hossain regretfully declined them all, pleading sudden stress of work, which would keep him confined to his room all day. He was so much in demand he had some difficulty in evading all the kind invitations, but eventually managed to do so.

The next day at about 12-30, Mr. Ali Hossain started out for a walk. He seemed rather cautious to avoid people and chose an unfrequented path which after rather a circuitous detour brought him near the Library. He looked round to make sure he was unobserved and hastily crossed over to the Criterion. There he was received by the Manager who knew him as a good customer and hastened to carry out his instructions for a private room, a recherche lunch and, particularly, table decoration of crimson roses. In a few minutes all was ready and Mr. Ali Hossain sat down complacently with the morning paper and a cigarette.

One o'clock struck, half past one, a quarter to two. Mr. Ali Hossain gave a sigh over the proverbial dilatoriness of the fair sex. At 2 o'clock he began to feel decidedly hungry, and a little bit angry also. He heard the manager's voice: "Thus way, room No. 6. Yes lunch is ready. The gentleman has been waiting some time—over an hour." Footsteps were heard approaching. Mr. Ali Hossain got up and went towards the door with a most charming smile on his face. "It doesn't matter at all my dear young lady," he began. The words were cut short—"Took you in this time, old man," guffawed his three friends who stood in the doorway. "We'll do justice to your lunch." "You scoundrels!" gasped Mr. Ali Hossain.

The Council.

"As large a charter as the wind to blow on whom I please"

— As You Like It

February 26th (contd.)

HAVING destroyed the purity of castes by a generous admixture of the other colours of the rainbow in the bluest of blue bloods, and making a present of the bar sinister to not a few coats of arms, Bhupen Babu turned his destructive attention to the rites of marriage. Who talked of Sacrament? Where was the Sacrament in Gandharb where an exchange of garlands made the wife a galav ka har (a garland round the neck) to the husband? Where was the Sacrament in the Swaymbara where the maiden constituted herself into a Board of Examiners and ploughed the competitors ruthlessly, allowing no marks of grace to a single candidate unless he hit the mark and secured at one and the same time a bull's eye and the maiden's hand? Panditji wondered with great trepidation whether Bhupen Babu was going to refer to those ancient euphemisms for Section 376, I. P. C., which existed long before the artificial ceremoniousness of the Age of Consent. But even Bhupen Babu must draw the line somewhere and he drew it at a well-known though little respected Commandment. However, littered the floor of the House with his Library of Law and Epic Love, citing instance after instance and piling up precedent on top of precedent.

Next he came to the interesting topic of divorce, and several persons moved uncomfortably in their seats. What if his Bill would introduce the institution of divorce into Hindu Society? "Is divorce such a great calamity after all?" One thought Bhupen Babu was in a confessing mood and would dilate on personal predictions. But for once he was impersonal and deftly turned the current of his eloquence in the direction of a pamphlet recently issued, giving instance of law cases in which the miseries of women came to light. And in a burst of noble indignation that would do credit to the most militant suffragette, Bhupen asked, "Is the polygamous husband always to have things all his own way?" The Council wondered what would come next. Would Bhupen Babu push things to their logical conclusion and—polyandry? Instead of that he merely detailed Manu's saving clauses describing how wives could dispose of damaged goods. According to Hindu law about remarriage, woman's disabilities cease just at the time when man's begin. "If man became infirm or otherwise disabled a woman could marry again." On the other hand, the Hindu Petruchio need not tame the Shrew. If the Hindu Katherine has a sour tongue she can be put away like a sour mango. Not satisfied with so ancient an authority as Manu (Verse 72 Chapter IX.), brought in Herbert Spencer as a witness to support monogamy, and Islam to justify divorce. Appropriately quoted Dr. Winter as an authority on warm social relations, and described for the benefit of all "the potent stimulus to connubial happiness," ending up with the useful dictum that "licentiousness is not synonymous with loose marriage relations."

Lest Mussalmans should accuse him of treating them as a negligible quantity, turned his attention to them and singled out his best friend, a certain nobleman who is alleged to have made a certain remark on the receipt of a certain decoration. His objection, that the Bill would prevent the possibility of having more than one wife, was one which "at my time of life it is not possible to respect." Evidently the Harem of Bhupen Babu not like the customary Committee of a few members "with powers to add to their number." But surely even if the Blood Heat of Mid Summer had passed the meridian, something could have been made of Dr. Winter's "potent stimulus to connubial happiness." Turning from Eastern opponents of the Bill to Western supporters, quoted from Sir Roland Wilson. But although Roland's horn was blown so loud that even at the first blast it cracked, the Moslem army was not in the least panic-stricken. Cited the example of a Hindu who had married an unnamed Moslem Governor's daughter, but who on being refused admission into the pale of Hinduism became the greatest of iconoclasts. Not very clear whether Hindus or Mussalmans expected to regard this as "a consummation devoutly to be wished."

At last finding his Little Mary almost a pancake for want of nutritive contents, thought of lunch and his peroration. The picture of patience on a monument smiling at failure, he referred sadly to "the fate of all reformers to meet with ridicule and contempt." "At present ignorance and superstition prevailed, but when the time comes and my friend the Mild Hindu's Bill is passed (Mild Hindu smiles incredulously) my Bill would be better appreciated."

Sobraon, the Pantaloon, welcomed the approaching conclusion, though it came so late as to appear to have missed the train of reasoning, and the Pandit heaved a sigh of relief. Bhupen met this provocative joy with a parting shot and drew a cordon of splendid isolation round them supplied by the Vishnumurti that "in the Kaliyuga everybody is a Sudra except the Brahmin," and from that remote antiquity jumped to the Civilisation of Buckle in quoting horrible punishments of Sudras mixing with Brahmins.

But it was the Burly Raja who was the omega, just as he had been the alpha, of his satirical remarks. "My friend on the right" had borrowed the language of criminal intelligence in describing the Bill as a bomb. But bombs were not going to be reserved for the C.I.D. if he could help it. "All who sheltered themselves behind the buttress of prejudice and ignorance were always afraid of some extraordinary commotion which might overthrow the little Protective Works that they set about themselves." For his part, he preferred such Productive Works as Civil Marriages, though he confessed that he himself was but "a faint and weak worker in a difficult cause."

Just as Bhupen Babu sat down faint and exhausted, Dashing Boy, more dashing than ever, jumped up, and looking neither to left nor to right, commenced to dash through eight pages of closely printed oration in support of Bhupen Babu, all because "Persian opinion generally is unfavourable to the Bill." But "the Bill does not specially affect us—Persians. Monogamy and divorce are familiar to us." Wonder whether familiarity has bred contempt for the former and an increasing affection for the latter. However, Dashing Boy loves nothing better than first principles, and commenced this long lesson to the Council with the A. B. C. of legislation. "Marriage affords the best guarantee of good morals and purity" thought the Dashing Boy, while some others may have regarded it merely as additional security, and the old bachelors in the Council wondered what they should do to secure a character. Since the election of Dashing Boy a new era had dawned in India. "The days of Petitions to the Legislative Councils are past." Is not Dashing Boy in the Council and is not all right with the world since then? "A non-official Member in close touch with Orthodox Hindu sentiment has introduced the Bill." (The Pandit moved still further towards Baby Brunyate to avoid the defiling touch of heterodox scomoclasts, and Burly Raja rejoiced that he was just then calling on the Moslem Dowager and the Pandit.) "A representative Indian has brought forward the Bill" ("What a misrepresentation" thought Orthodox.)

Referring to the changes in the social conditions of Hindus, said that "Caste hangs loosely to-day about the Hindu." (Almost as loosely indeed as his dhoti.) "The pardah is being gradually lifted." (No simile available.) "Hindu ladies of Bengal have been married to Punjabis, Madrasis and Europeans" (Oh, the great advances of Bengal and the Forward Policy of its leading women!) "Even Muhammadans have evinced a desire for marital relations with Hindus. Last year I happened to see an advertisement in the Bengalee newspaper by a Muhammadan zamindar for the hand of a Hindu girl" (Excellent Matrimonial Agency No bogus photographs Interviews arranged in Botanical Gardens or the Museum Correspondence strictly confidential Plain sealed covers Rather a small commission charged in case of the complete satisfaction of our clients or name registered for a year's supply of the paper at ordinary rates. Telegraphic Address, FUTNEK, CALCUTTA.) Among others, the Arya Samaj, which "has again undertaken to receive back into the fold of Hinduism all penitent backsliders," wanted extension of marriage area for the sake of its neophytes. But if all the neophytes are merely "backsliders," why not let them slide back into the non-Hindu fold instead of making them slide into extended matrimony? Referred to "the difficulty of getting suitable husbands for their girls" felt by Hindu fathers. "Necessity is helping the cause of Social Reform." Indeed "Necessity" is wonderful. She is generally supposed to know no law, and yet here was Bhupen Babu forging one to satisfy "Necessity." But although everyone had heard of "Necessity" as "the Mother of Invention," few had thought of it as "the Father-in-law of Social Reform."

"Marriage" said Dashing Boy, "was one of the most solemn acts of Man." But he did not complete the description. Marriage also happens to be one of two things to Woman. It is "either even more solemn to her, in fact nothing less than a funeral, or a screaming farce played only as a curtain-raiser. Naturally a man "objects to disown his religion even for the sake of his fiancee." In fact his creed is quite as sacred to him as his cigar to Kipling.

"A woman is a woman, but a good cigar is a smoke."

Dashing Boy did not forget the point of view of the orthodox Hindu. But "the operation of forces noted above" (The Council looked up at the ceiling but saw naught) "Must incline young people to consult their own wishes in the matter of marriage and not to be determined for them by their elders in the customary fashion." This was characteristically Dashing Boyish. A monument to Dashing Boy must be erected at Greta Green to perpetuate his memory, and it should preferably be in the robes of a male Hymene. "We must take human nature as it is and must be prepared for attachment among young people thrown together by the force of circumstances." "Force of circumstances" is rather good, but a bit longish name for the prospective mother-in-law.

Quoted great jurists in support of his contention and specially Sir James Fitzjames Stephen, who said, "How can we sow the seed and refuse to recognise the crop?" But it escaped him that Orthodoxy opposed the sowing of the seed on just the same ground, for it refused to recognise in the crop the reaper of a rich harvest of intestate succession to the sower's collaterals and ascendants.

The next argument was the want of purity of blood in Hindu Society. Referred to "mongrel classes" and wanted more of the breed. "Why speak of marriages only? Hindu Society has been tolerant of even liaison, and large classes of Hindus have grown up with a recognised social position out of amours." The prospect of similar fecundity was too tempting for the Dashing Boy. With evident envy said that "it is this tolerance, this elasticity of social rules which assured to Hindu Society the remarkable vitality which has impressed non-Hindus so much." A very impressive vitality indeed, and a still more impressive elasticity and tolerance. Threw new light on pilgrimage to holy places by computing on the authority of Mr. Parekh that as many as 200 families of Bhatias had intermarried with "Hardwar maidens." The Ganges is useful not only for lavage but also for loving.

Turning to the Mussalimans, pronounced the fatwa that "strict adherence to Islamism does not prevent Muhammadans marrying non-Muhammadans." Could anything be more impressive than the fact that "Even Moghal Emperors took to themselves Hindu wives"? This may be good precedent for Islamism and Islamists, but Islam without the ams is still much too conservative. It has not yet permitted the worship of kings because Akbar was so worshipped, nor sanctified the use of intoxicants because Jehangir took as much wine as his namesake Jehangirji Menoushji Daruwala quaffs to-day. Concluded at last with characterising the opposition as "the Shibboleth of unmeaning conservatism," and as a sign of his own freedom from ordinary conventions such as grammar, talked glibly of a bogey of discreditable marriages that "was strutted out" with the same "disagreeable frequency" which was displayed by people in using "strut" intransitively. But hoped that Government would "guide the Bill through the Council with their accustomed sympathy and firmness" so well exhibited in the rejection of his Resolutions about the abolition of the Cotton Excise Duties and the remission of Income Tax below an income of one hundred pounds a year.

While this speech of absorbing interest and comprehensive magnitude was being dashed through, Councillors found opportunity of calling on each other. Visits were paid by vital Thackeray to Sir Orator Meston, by the Mild Hindu to Sir Guy and the Pandit, by St Vincent to Regie and the Sage, and by the Burly Raja to the Mild Hindu, the Pandit, Sir Guy and the Moslem Dowager. While this Mizaj pursi was going on, the Sharp'un snatched his forty winks, and King Arthur bowed his head, as if in prayer like the King in Hamlet, and snored his orisons. Saunders was transplanted on the wings of Dashing Boy's opiate oratory and was united with his province in the fond embraces of sleep. The opportunity was too tempting for the free disposition of Frenantle, and he ensconced himself in the Visitors' Gallery in the midst of the ladies.

After Lunch

Having fortified himself with a substantial lunch, the Burly Raja brought his heavy guns into play on Bhupen Babu's Bill and the "reformers." As one who had advocated the relaxation of many a meaningless social custom among the Hindus, as one who had changed the fetters of many an Indian bondswoman into the gold bangles of the emancipated, as one who, very much alive and occasionally kicking, was yet dead opposed to early marriages, as one who practised what the others only preached, he could not, with any instinct of true Hinduism left in him, possibly advocate a something-with-an-awfully-unpronounceable-name to be spread in the country for the benefit of an infinitesimal minority (punctuated by a shrug) or a special class (another shrug) or for the benefit of a handful of love-sick Indian youths seeking legislation of their indiscreet romantic marriages. (This time the huge shoulders were lifted above the aristocratic head and suddenly dropped from that giddy height.) If the declaration was "unnecessary," why was it "unnecessary?" This tremendous question was sent forth like a cannon-ball and the atmospheric disturbance consequent on the discharge of such a volume of voice was like the crack of doom. It reverberated against the walls of the Council chamber and returned with fourfold fury to the assembled listeners. The batteries of Bhupen were silent, for Bhupen Babu had had some inkling of this and had taken cover in his solicitors' "pretty little parlour." When the echoes of this tremendous ejaculation had died down, Burly Raja once more commenced the destruction of "swift-winged reformers," and disciples of Sir Henry Maine who had even outrun their preceptor.

Referring to other objects and reasons, characterized the promotion of inter-marriages among various sub-sections of a caste and between members of the same caste inhabiting different provinces as comparatively modest. But if they had no immodesty, they did not create any necessity either for this Bill. "There was no need seeking the aid of the legislature at all." After the commotion caused by Burly Raja's question, there was now complete quiet. A "hush" went round the Council and every listener strained his ear to catch the aristocratic, almost the royal reason that made the Bill unnecessary. And it was not in vain that the Council eagerly awaited the advent of a great, an all-compelling and eternal truth. "There was no need seeking the aid of the legislature at all. Such marriages have my fullest support." Everyone looked at his neighbour and penitently whispered, "How foolish of me not to have thought of that. Eh?" Having so forcibly humbled the audience, Burly Raja went on, pushing his advantage still further. "Seeking its help of Government for such a purpose not only betrays impatience, but impotence." This abashed the advocates of the Bill thoroughly and the next sentence made their humiliation complete. "Those who have desired to introduce such intermarriages have taken recourse either to the Hindu law or to the Special Marriage Act, welcoming their consequences stubbornly." Would not the reformers have the manliness to extend a "stubborn welcome" to the consequences of their unions? Seeking advantage of the famous dilemma with which Omar, the Caliph, is alleged to have met a question, Burly Raja bowed his head and charged his opponents, lifting some on one horn and some on the other. Intermarriages are either valid, or invalid according to Hindu law. If valid, legislation is needless. If invalid, the marrying couple are not Hindus and the declaration is harmless. This dumfounded all, and there was a vacant look on each face as if a master magician had cast an overpowering spell on them all.

Dealing with the Brahmos who supported the Bill, asked them what were Abdul Ghaffar, Jalaluddin Mian, and Mr. Maitland. They were as much Hindus as the Laplanders or the Zulus. To identify Brahmoism with Hinduism was like mixing salad oil with vinegar. And yet the salad bowl was not at all unlike Hinduism with its tasteful variety, its oily Bhupens and vinegary Burly Rajas.

After dealing with "persons with superfine conscientiousness" and laying down the law that even tolerance may amount to wickedness—Dashing Boy had already laid down the converse proposition that wickedness should be tolerated—came to discuss the alleged results of intermixture of races. Doubtful how far it was scientifically true that it conduces to mental and physical improvements, but was certain that it was the rigid rules of Hinduism against such intermarriages that had preserved the Hindus as a distinct race. "The high self-sacrificing spirits depicted in the splendid Epics, the undaunted courage and unparalleled patriotism of the Rajputs (from the days of the Great Battle between Kuravas and Pandavas to the world renowned Mahabharata of Overtown Hall) the heroism of the Maharastrias (no connection with Bal Gangadhar Tilak, Damodar Hari Chapekar and the more recent Savarkar, you know) were all products of the nation. I do not know if any other nations on the surface of the globe have showed better moral or physical progress." And here the broad Kshattriya shoulders were straightened, the chest swelled out and thrown well forward, and the proud aristocratic head tilted a little, all combining to create an effect unseen on the surface of the globe, but resembling what the world had imagined some K. C. S. I., from Mars would be. But there was to-day an unusual modesty about the whole picture. "I do not say that there is no room for improvement, for I know trimming and pruning is required," and significantly shook his head which appeared too large for such Martian shoulders. As for caste, it goes with civilization. In India it means the special vocation of special classes. In some places wealth and honours are the standard of measurement. For reasons wholly impersonal the Burly Raja refrained from saying which was better. Would the Bill destroy the so-called "pernicious caste system?" The Act of 1872 had failed to do that, and history, like Bhupen Babu, had a cruel way of repeating itself. In this Province of patent medicines that subsidised the Bengali journals even more liberally than the Government subsidised the Sulav Samachar, the Bill comes up to the Council with a promise of innumerable benefits. "With all the emphasis that I can command"—and he had commandeered the entire supply of the land—Burly Raja appealed to the Government to throw out the Bill. And being sure of the throwing out, could comfortably say that if the Government allowed this motion then I shall certainly begin to believe that nothing is sacrosanct in these days." No, not even the Burly Raja.

The Neutrality of British Subjects.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—A question is puzzling me and I turn to you as the source of all journalistic knowledge for information.

The Turco-Italian war has circumscribed the freedom of action of neutrals, among whom are, of course, included the subjects of His Imperial Majesty King George V. The Government of India republished from the London Gazette the declaration of Neutrality of the British Government which further contained instructions for the guidance of British subjects. The Government were perhaps apprehensive that the declaration was in danger of being forgotten so they took the step of publishing the declaration a second time warning their subjects, at their peril, against transgression of injunction of neutrality. So far so good, and I am not aware of any subject of His Majesty, in India at least, who has contravened the requirements of the declaration. But everyone knows of one British subject—and that too an Englishman and an officer of the regular army of our King—who flagrantly disobeyed the injunctions of the declaration and went to Tripoli, joined the Turks, fought the Italians and covered himself with glory. This, I need not say, refers to the now famous ex-Lieutenant. Montagu. Except that he forfeited his lieutenantancy, Mr. Montagu was not in any way called upon by His Majesty's Government to explain his conduct. Now what I wish to know is this. Does any penalty attach to such conduct of open defiance of the declaration of neutrality? [I am not discussing the ethics of such conduct, and I might here as well say that my sympathies are entirely with the Turks and I pray for the success of their arms. I only want to know the law.] Or is it, like suicide, a crime in which attempt is punishable but the commission is not?

Risaldar Major Muhammad Khan and Mr. De Souza, Head Clerk, Commissariat Department, would very much like to know how the law stands, for if Muhammad Khan will only lose his and Mr. De Souza his appointment and its perquisites by following the bent of their minds, the one thinks of at once joining the forces of Nesciat Bey, and the other, who ranks a Captain in the Volunteer forces of India and is a very devout Roman Catholic in addition, is anxious to place his services at the disposal of the intrepid General Caneva.

ZAIN-UL-ABDIN ALI.

[NOTE.—We are not prepared to accept the responsibility of being "the source of all journalistic knowledge" which has been thrust upon us by our correspondent, as greatness is thrust upon some and intervention upon others. But so far as our information goes it is at the service of our readers. The declaration of neutrality to which the correspondent refers warns His Majesty's subjects against breaches of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and against the supply of arms and munitions of war to the belligerents. But every subject of His Majesty is free to volunteer his services for either belligerent, and Risaldar-Major Mohamed Khan can share the ragged misery of Nesciat Bey's force as a volunteer; though not as a commissioned soldier, and Mr. Head Clerk DeSouza is at liberty to exchange his pay and perquisites in the Commissariat Department on the same terms for the illuminating rays of the resplendent sun of glory of the intrepid General Caneva. Lieutenant Montagu was only a volunteer, we believe, just as the ex-Viceroy Lord Minto was a volunteer fighting on the side of the Turks in the battle of Shipka Pass in the Russo-Turkish War. However, it has come to our notice that the Director of Public Instruction in Bengal has issued a secret circular enjoining on his subordinates complete abstention from showing any sympathy with either belligerent and from contributing funds for the relief of war sufferers on either side. If this is true, there seems to be some need in the Department, for private instruction on the subject of neutrality, and we trust the Government would appoint a Director for the purpose. If not, we hope the Department would publish the circular it has hitherto kept secret.—Ed. Comrade.]

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

In the House of Commons Mr Acland in reply to Mr Barton said, the British and Russian Ministers at Teheran had sent a message to Salar-Ed-Dowleh at Kermanshah strongly recommending him to leave Persia on conditions offered by the Persian Government. His Majesty's Government realised fully the serious trade conditions in Persia and the Persian Government was taking such steps as were possible.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT)

Teheran, February 15

In spite of repeated announcements that fresh elections are shortly to be held, I am able to state that there has never been any question of an immediate revival of the Mejliss. All sober politicians recognize that the Constitutional experiment is for the present over although a future revival is not impossible.

Hitherto Tabriz, Resht, Isfahan and Meshed have been the strongest adherents of the Mejliss, but they are no longer in a position to foment any effective agitation, while the South has for long been totally indifferent to the Constitution, and for the matter to the Central Government. No official communication either for or against the Mejliss has, however, been made by the British and Russian Legations, nor has the question been the subject of negotiations between the two Governments.

The technical difficulty that, so long as the Constitution is neither legally abolished nor suspended, the Mejliss alone can authorize railway or other concessions or loans is not, I understand, regarded seriously by the British and Russian Governments. A precedent exists in the concessions granted by the ex-Shah after the bombardment of the first Mejliss, although then, as now, new elections were promised. The validity of these concessions was not questioned later on, because they were supported by the British and Russian Governments.

A more real difficulty lies in finding some way of enabling the Treasurer-General to check the plundering tendencies hitherto common to all Cabinets and most high officials. Mr. Shuster always refused the Cabinet's requisitions for pay for non-existent troops and other well-known devices for lining the pockets of the grandees by saying that the Mejliss had not authorized this expenditure. This resource is denied to M. Mornard. It is believed, however, that by relying on the extensive powers which the Mejliss originally conferred on the Treasurer-General, together with the active and continual support of the British and Russian Legations, he will be enabled to exercise an effective control.

Teheran, February 18.

The Anglo-Russian Note embodying the new programme of policy was presented to the Persian Government to-day. It is very moderate in character.

The Russian Consul at Astrabad has renewed his representations to the ex-Shah, but the latter desires money to pay his followers and objects to the reduction of his pension.

Teheran, February 19.

The Anglo-Russian Note offers Persia £100,000 from each Government for immediate expenses at 7 per cent., the capital to be repaid from the next loan as a first disbursement. In the meantime all the surplus of the Northern and Southern Customs is to be devoted to the repayment of interest and principal. This sum is to be spent under the control of the Treasurer-General with the approval of the two Legations. In return the Legations desire an undertaking on four points from the Persian Government—namely (1) conformity with the principles of the Anglo-Russian Convention; (2) the dismissal from the army of the fedais and all irregulars as soon as the ex-Shah and Salar-Ed-Dowleh leave Persia; (3) that there shall be a discussion with the two Legations concerning the organization of a small regular effective army; (4) an arrangement with the ex-Shah for his departure and pensions and an amnesty to his followers.

The stipulation regarding the military reorganization appears to refer to the reduction of the present army and an increase of the Cossack Brigade under Russian officers. Nothing is said concerning railway construction nor of arrangements for a future loan.

Teheran, February 19.

Amir Mufakkam, the Bakhtiari Khan whose loyalty to the Government is not above suspicion, having failed to induce the Minister of the Interior to release a reactionary who had been arrested, sent a body of Bakhtiari forcibly to bring the Minister to his house, where he was insulted for not complying with Amir Mufakkam's wishes. It is officially stated to-night that Amir Mufakkam has been exiled and will leave Teheran to-morrow. (Reuter.)

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

St Petersburg, February 29.

Conflicting reports come from Northern Persia. The newspapers announce a movement in favour of Muhammad Ali at Meshed and in Azerbaijan province. If any such movement exists the Russian Consuls have failed to communicate a hint of it to their Government. On the other hand, the ex-Shah's household at Odessa have been apprised that he will return to Europe in a fortnight.

The Government of Teheran has not yet accepted the Anglo-Russian terms regarding the disposal of the money which the two Powers are ready to advance.

Mr Parker (Halifax, Lab.), on behalf of Mr Ramsay MacDonald (Leicester, Lab.), asked the Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether he could state the number of Russian troops, including Consular guards, now in Persia, and how many had been withdrawn owing to the acceptance by the Mejliss of the Russian Ultimatum of last November.

Sir E. Grey—I cannot give exact numbers, there are said to be about 4,000 troops at Tabriz, 2,800 in Khorassan, 4,000 between Resht, Enzeli and Kazvin, and smaller bodies distributed at other places. With the exception of Kazvin all these places are comparatively close to the Russian frontier, two regiments were withdrawn from Kazvin last month, and it is expected that a further withdrawal from there will soon take place.

Mr Lloyd (Staffordshire, W. Opp.) asked on what previous occasion Russia withdrew from Persia.

Sir E. Grey—I understand there was a withdrawal. I will make a statement to-morrow.

Mr Parker on behalf of Mr Ramsay MacDonald, asked the Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether he proposed to issue among Persian papers those relating to Mr Shuster's financial administration sent by the British representative at Teheran, and also those relating to the appointment of M. Mornard to the Treasurer-Generalship, and when Persian papers might be expected.

Sir E. Grey—The papers now in preparation, which I hope to lay next month, will include reports by His Majesty's Minister at Teheran respecting Mr Shuster's services under the Persian Government. They will not bring the correspondence up to a date sufficiently recent to include the question of M. Mornard's appointment, but this subject will be covered in further papers which will be laid without avoidable delay.

Mr Morrell (Burnley, Min.) inquired whether M. Mornard was now appointed permanently and whether the Foreign Office had agreed to his appointment.

Sir E. Grey—I will ask for notice of those questions.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Odessa, February 18.

An Astrabad dispatch of the 17th instant says that the Russian Consul at that place on the previous day communicated to Muhammad Ali Shah the condition of the Teheran Government, approved by Russia and England, for his immediate departure from Persia, with a pledge never to return, and the grant of a pension of 50,000 tomans, his future domicile to be either in Russian or British territory, as the Royal exile may elect. On Saturday the ex-Shah replied to the Russian Consul's official communication with a counter-demand that he should, instead of a pension, receive a lump sum of 20,000,000 tomans, out of which he would pay off and disband his army. This exorbitant demand will not, of course, be complied with, and it is stated here to-day that a short period of grace will be granted to Muhammad Ali to accept or refuse the conditions offered by the Teheran Government. In the latter case he will be forcibly expelled from Persian territory by the Russians, with the consent and approval of England, and under those circumstances it is understood he will be interned in Russia under police surveillance. In urging this preposterous claim Muhammad Ali assured the Russian Consul that his prospects of regaining the Persian throne have recently become extremely favourable, and he has no doubt whatever of his eventual success.

if he be not interfered with by the two protective Powers. The Russian Press regards this as a mere idle pretension put forth with the object of obtaining a larger "moral solatium" for the "abdication" of his rights and his retirement. The Russian Government is naturally desirous, if possible, of avoiding the extreme measure of arresting Muhammad Ali Shah.

Maxim Gorki on Persia.

The following letter has been received by Mr. Frederick Whelen (honorary secretary of the Persia Committee) from the distinguished Russian writer, Maxim Gorki—

I am of opinion that the actions of the Russian Government in Persia are nationally harmful to the Russian people, quite apart from the fact that they are inhuman in relation to the Persian people. I am doubtful whether it would be possible, by means of courts-martial and by executions, to secure the Persian commercial market for Russian capital, and I am convinced that the Russian Government is creating, by its senseless brutality, a new and irreconcilable enemy in Persia for the Russian people. Moreover, the conduct of the Russian troops in Persia is serving to strengthen the spread of Orthodox Pan-Islamism, which rejects the creative ideas and principles fostered in Europe, and in this way the Russian Government's actions are injurious to the interests of European culture.

Further, while the colonial policy of contemporary Europe, inasmuch as it is not ideally humanitarian, undoubtedly retards the growth of humanitarian ideals, yet England, even when importing opium into China, together with that poison took into the country ideas of constitutionalism and individual freedom.

We see to-day that while China has not been destroyed by the smoking of opium, it has, on the other hand, been stimulated to greater vigour, and is being revolutionised by the healthy and creative ideas of the West, and is now rebuilding its crowded ant-hills on an European basis, and is uniting itself to Aryan culture. From this example, one among many, we are convinced of the vital energy for good inherent in the creative ideas of European culture, and in the capacity of Englishmen for furthering those ideas. We see, also, that while English capital is forcing its way into Persia, English public opinion recognises the necessity for establishing a Committee for the protection of Persia, and that in England, not only is there a society for the study of Eastern culture, but also a special society for studying Persian culture.

I ask myself what things of great price, what principles of European culture have been taken by the Russian Government into those realms which they have seized in Central Asia—Khiva and Bokhara—what creative influences of value can Russian Sovereignty sow in old Iran (Persia)?

Russia will take a great deal of vodka into the Persian markets, but I cannot see what ideas useful to the Persians the Russian bureaucracy can possibly introduce. Finally, I think that the seizure of Persia has been due, not so much to the interest of Russian capital as to the desire of the dynasty of the Romanoffs to give to their people a new extension of territory, and by so doing to commemorate the 300th anniversary of their own establishment in Russia. This tercentenary, as is well known, is fictitious, and this gift will develop into a source of misfortune for the Russian people, for it is impossible to believe that Persia will reconcile herself to the enslavement which threatens her.

MAXIM GORKI

The Integrity of Persia.

Mr. Ponsonby (Stirling Burgess, Min.) moved the following amendment to the King's speech in the House of Commons—

"But we humbly represent to your Majesty that the failure of your Majesty's Government to take effective steps to preserve the integrity and independence of Persia in accordance with the terms of the Anglo-Russian agreement of 1907 constitutes a grave menace to your Indian Empire and to the best interests of this country." He said that the state of affairs in Persia was causing a great deal of apprehension in many minds, and he thought that an early and convenient opportunity should be taken for the Foreign Secretary to make a statement on the subject. He warmly congratulated the right hon. gentleman on the high distinction which had been conferred upon him by the King. He had been a critic of the right hon. gentleman's policy in the past, and on certain points he was a critic of the right hon. gentleman's policy still, but this fact in no way interfered with his great appreciation not only of the right hon. gentleman's rare personal qualities, but also of his great sincerity and of the high-minded and disinterested motives that had always guided him in public life. (Cheers.)

in his speech at North Sunderland on 20th January as it affected a section of the Liberal Party. Instead of being wishful to interfere with the affairs of other countries he said that their plea throughout had been non-interference. They asked that Persia should be allowed to work out her salvation for herself without the interference of other Powers, and in other foreign questions their point of view was to restrain interference in the internal affairs of other countries. Before the Anglo-Russian Convention was concluded in 1907, all through the 19th century, we had made various engagements with Russia agreeing to respect the integrity and independence of Persia, and this further instrument confirmed that idea, but the Persian Government supposed that it threatened her independence and really was a step towards partition. In order to allay that fear our Minister at Teheran in September 1907 made a statement which was handed to the Persian Foreign Minister, giving a clear interpretation of the spirit of the Convention. When this question was last debated the House was told that the Foreign Office had no knowledge of that document; but he had since sent his right hon. friend a copy and there was no doubt that it was perfectly authentic. Sir Cecil Spring Rice in that statement said that Sir Edward Grey had informed him that he and M. Izvolsky were completely in accord on two fundamental points—first, that the two Powers would not interfere in the affairs of Persia unless injury was inflicted on the persons or property of their subjects; and, secondly, that negotiations arising out of the Convention must not violate the integrity and independence of Persia. Nothing, he maintained, could be more explicit than that statement, or afford a clearer interpretation of what our intentions were.

Passing to the events since the Convention, the hon. member said it was the revolution in Persia which was really the starting-point. Persia was going through the almost superhuman task of establishing an entirely new form of Constitutional Government. At such a moment friendly nations would show their friendship best by standing aside and not interfering with the internal affairs of the country, but it was at that time that Russia first began to show activity. After a Government had been established the position appeared to some still rather hopeless, but fresh hope was raised by the appointment of Mr. Shuster as Treasurer-General. Had he been given a fair chance there was not the slightest doubt he would have succeeded in putting Persian finance in order. (Hear, hear.) He had seen Mr. Shuster and heard him speak. He had expected from all accounts to see a self-advertising and overbearing man, but he found himself listening to a fair-minded and moderate man, and his statement confirmed his worst apprehensions, not only with regard to the action of Russia towards Persia, but also with regard to the humiliating position of acquiescence adopted by this country. When the Russians saw there was a chance of a strong Government being established, they immediately made a set against Mr. Shuster and he was hounded out, two charges being made against him, one with regard to the appointment he made to a certain post and the other that he had circulated in Persia a letter he had written to the Times. On those two flimsy pretexts he was hounded out of Persia and M. Mornard was appointed his successor. He would like to know whether his right hon. friend could tell the House whether M. Mornard's appointment was permanent, whether the Government approved of the appointment, whether they had received any report as to the past reputation and competence of M. Mornard, and whether he was a suitable person for the post. Persia had given in to Russia on two occasions when ultimatums had been issued, and had grovelled in the dust before Russia, and one would have thought that Russia would have been satisfied. (Hear, hear.) Russian troops were at present occupying North Persia, and though some might have been moved he did not know that any had been withdrawn from Persian territory. There was a great deal of ground for suspicion that the Russians still favoured the return of the ex-Shah, and some of his most prominent supporters had been appointed by the Russians to high posts. The Mejlis had been swept away and there had been the atrocious act of the hanging by the Russians of one of the most prominent spiritual leaders in Persia. The national schools were closed, and all attempts to stand up for freedom, constitutionalism and patriotism were being stamped out, while people were being tyrannised into submission to the Russian Government. The right hon. gentleman had said at Manchester that what they had hoped to achieve by the Anglo-Russian agreement had been achieved, and that on both sides that agreement had been kept absolutely. He could not agree with the right hon. gentleman there. There could be no question that the agreement had been broken. If they put the present state of affairs in Persia before a fair-minded citizen of any country he could not believe that he would say that the independence and integrity of Persia had been respected. The Russian Government had acted perfectly consistently. They had gone on with their encroachments little by little, disregarding any very mild protests which we might make, and little by little they were carrying out their policy of expansion. We were not only backing them up by failing to remonstrate in Persia, but we were helping them to establish themselves as a first-class Power, and everything was being done by the Government to help British capital to flow into Russia, for without money Russia would not be able to continue her activities. The right hon. gentleman had referred at Manchester to the good relations existing between this country and Russia. There was no question about that, and he for one had the greatest admiration for the Russian people. When the right hon. gentleman had gone on to say that those good relations were assisted and helped by absurd visits he failed to understand what he meant. It was most disrespectful to the House of Commons to use it as a pawn in the diplomatic game, and through outside agencies, without consultation in the recess, to get up a Parliamentary visit. Good feeling between this country and Russia was not to be established by pleasure trips of that sort. (Hear, hear.)

He learned from the Times of yesterday that a joint Note had been submitted to the Persian Government. He did not know whether it was accompanied by any threat, he supposed it was, and that if the Persian Government did not concede the four points set out in the Note it would be subjected to further pressure. The four points represented, in his opinion, a further attack upon the integrity of Persia. The offer of a loan to Persia should not be accepted unless its acceptance were ratified by the Majlis. (Hear, hear.) The case which he submitted was not based only upon a sentimental desire to see justice done. Apart from sentiment, our national honour was at stake. It was a question also of expediency and of our commercial advantages in Persia. Strategically this country was undertaking a very foolish responsibility. Every one knew that the most vulnerable points in the defence of our Indian Empire could be approached by an advance through Persia. Our interests in the Persian Gulf were threatened. At the same time the massing of troops on the Turkish frontier was taking place, and these troops—the number of whom was unknown—were a menace to Turkey, and might cause further complication in which this country would be involved. He considered that the peace of the world was being endangered by the Government's policy. If partition were brought about we should have a long frontier common terminous with that of Russia, and the Government would have to ask for more money for troops, and we should be in a perpetual state of apprehension in that part of the globe. There was no question of fighting Russia. Surely we could persuade Russia to keep an engagement without fighting her. There was not the remotest desire on the part of Russia, nor even of the Russian Government, to fight this country. (Hear, hear.) All that was required was a little stiffening on our part and some show of determination on the part of the British Government to see that engagements were carried out. (Hear, hear.) It was difficult when one saw sentiment, honour, justice, expediency, strategy and the prestige of this country all in one balance to conceive what the Foreign Secretary found to outweigh them. He believed that our relations with Germany were at the bottom of this difficulty and of so many other difficulties. He hoped that the influence which was being brought about better relations with Germany would be taken advantage of. (Hear, hear.) He pleaded that some of the fresh air and light of democratic opinion might be allowed to penetrate into the stuffy darkness of diplomacy. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Morrell (Burnley, Min.), in seconding the amendment, said it was not based upon hostility to or disagreement with the Convention. He had never criticized it, and did not propose doing so. What he and his hon. friends objected to was that the Convention had not been fully and faithfully carried out. (Hear, hear.) When the hon. member for Leicester quoted an interpretation of the Convention a few days ago the Secretary for Foreign Affairs said the document was unknown to him.

Sir H. Grey (Northumberland, Berwick).—Quite true. The official and authorized interpretation is in the Blue-book, but that is not the document the hon. member quoted.

Mr. Morrell supposed that when Sir C. Spring Rice presented that document to the Persian Government he was acting under instructions from the Government at home.

Sir E. Grey.—He was not acting upon instructions from home. The only instructions were sent him some days later.

Mr. Morrell said somebody ought to have informed the Secretary of State of the existence of this document handed by Sir C. Spring Rice to the Persian Government, because this document, which was not communicated to the Foreign Office or to the House of Commons, concerned the honour of this country. It was a most extraordinary instance of official ignorance. Let the House look at the contrast of the condition of affairs in January to that in November. There was the Constitution destroyed, two ultimatums presented, the Shah, who had been driven out of the country returned with disorder and civil war, supporters of the Constitution condemned and executed without trial, and violent reactionaries wreaking vengeance on the people. These things would leave an indelible impression on the minds of the Persian people, and we were accomplices and jointly responsible for what had occurred in Northern Persia. (Hear, hear.) The two ultimatums were approved by the Foreign Secretary, and how would the Persian people regard England? A profound impression had been made on Moslem opinion throughout all Islam. From the speech of the right hon. gentleman at Manchester there appeared to be a slight improvement in the situation, and this he attributed to the public interest aroused in Persian affairs, and the severe condemnation of Russian action in a letter from Maxim Gorky did not stand alone among distinguished writers. The hon. member concluded with specific questions to the Foreign Secretary. What steps were being taken towards the withdrawal of Russian troops, what information had the Foreign Office of proceedings at Tabriz, would Great Britain join with Russia in insisting upon the payment of a pension to the ex-Shah, a pension he had forfeited by his return, whether Great Britain supported the appointment of M. Mornard, whether the Russian Government had waived the claim of an indemnity, and whether there was any intention to call the Majlis together, or what proposal there was for establishing Constitutional government? He hoped the Foreign Secretary would make it plain that if the entente between Great Britain and Russia was to continue it could only be on a footing different to that of the last few months and on terms more fair to the Persian population and more consonant with the honour of this country. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. M. Sykes (Hull, Central, Opp.) could not support the motion, however he might sympathize with its motive, in view of the fact that it was difficult to assume that the terms of the Treaty had been actually broken. There was not sufficient evidence. The fact that Russian officials and soldiers in Persia had inflicted punishments in a severe, and in our view an inhuman, manner was no proof that punishments were undeserved and occupation unnecessary. But certainly the present situation contained the seeds of grave danger for the future. (Hear, hear.) If we did not take certain definite lines of action we might have grave cause to regret our inaction six or seven years hence. He drew attention to the tendency to ignore the question of the Baghdad Railway. There was no overlooking the fact that two Great Powers with whom we are on friendly terms were both, necessarily from an economic point of view, gravitating towards the Persian Gulf. Russia, with an enormous population and immense resources, with ice on one side and a desert on the other, sought an outlet along the lines of least resistance to warm water. He was sure the way was being made for the Russian avalanche sliding down, either from economical pressure or from the military point of view, eventually to the Persian Gulf. On the other side there was Germany suffering from overproduction and an enormously increasing population, with a small seaboard, going down through Mesopotamia to the Persian Gulf along the line of the Baghdad Railway. It would be a very serious situation indeed if India, a poor country in spite of Durbar, had suddenly to face two concentrated Powers at the head of the Persian Gulf—one Power which was able to make the sacrifices which built the fortifications of Port Arthur, and another Power which was able to make the sacrifices which built the great German North Sea Fleet. If that occurred we should certainly have to face a serious military and economic situation, because behind it there would be the enormous resources of Mesopotamia, itself a country capable of bearing a vast population. On the other side was India, in a state of poverty and hardly able at present to meet her military expenses. Supposing the present tension in the North Sea died down, as everybody hoped it would, it would be a very difficult thing to approach the English people and ask them to make further sacrifices in order to cover India by sea and to meet further building which might take place at the head of the Persian Gulf. The time had come to consider that eventual development very seriously indeed. It was possible to avert the danger, but we must come to a clear understanding with Germany as to our policy in Persia. He hoped we should participate in the railway (hear, hear), and to such an extent that we should have a full say in regard to it. Side by side with the Baghdad Railway he hoped we should have an understanding with Russia, if possible, so that even if the Persian Empire should go to pieces, at least there should be a strong independent native State established at the northern part of the Persian Gulf, which it was absolutely essential should not be under the control of any foreign Power, or ourselves either. (Cheers.)

Mr. Dillon (Mayo, L., Nat.) had only one fault to find with the amendment, that it said nothing about the interests of Persia or the honour of this country in relation to the Persian people. The gross failure of the Anglo-Russian Agreement to protect the independence of Persia not only threatened the commercial interests of England and the interests of India, but it was really a deep wound inflicted on the honour of England as well as a horrible injury inflicted on Persia. The whole history of the treatment of the Persian question was an object-lesson as to the mischief done by the secret methods of diplomacy. He defied any one to read the speeches of the Foreign Secretary and say they gave full and frank information as to the situation in Persia. They were mainly concerned with broad general statements of policy and defence and explanation of Russian action

The Foreign Secretary in his speeches had devoted himself to the task of justifying, explaining away, and endorsing the action of Russia in Persia. Two theories had been consistently put forward by the right hon gentleman. The first theory was that had it not been for the interference of Russia at the siege of Tahriz the Nationalists in Persia would have been defeated and the Shah would have been still master of Persia. In his view there could not be a greater misrepresentation. The right hon gentleman forgot altogether that the Persians unaided overthrew the tyranny of the late Shah, and while carrying through the revolution their Assembly had been bombarded and their leaders dispersed and killed by Cossacks. Had it not been for the interference of the Russian troops the revolution would have been carried out. The second theory of the Foreign Secretary was that while his own supporters and other hon members appealed to him to maintain peace in all parts of the world, yet they were urging him to a policy of war with Russia. The right hon gentleman indeed conveyed the impression that the only alternative before him was either to assent without remonstrance to all that Russia imposed or declare war upon her.

What was the present situation of Persia and the policy of the Government? He had listened with amazement to the statement of the last speaker when he said that this was not a time for great pressure or strain. The strain was greater than it had ever been, because the country was now told that a Joint Note had been presented within the last few days by Russia and Great Britain to the Persian Government. Was not the House entitled to see that Joint Note immediately in order to learn what the policy was to which they were being committed, and also to see the reply of the Persian Government? The House was being left very much in the dark on this subject. The Times, which was exceedingly well-informed on these Foreign Office questions, published on Tuesday the main points of the Note and after reading them he asked any hon member to say how much remained of the independence of a country which was compelled to swallow the terms of this Note, supposing that the Times was correct. What vestige of self respect and independence remained to the Persians if these arrangements were accepted? The Majlis, which was a very good attempt, taking all the circumstances into account, to establish a decent democratic Government in the country and nobody could deny that it was a vast improvement—had been broken up by Russia, and they were told by the well-informed paper the Times that a revival of it was extremely unlikely. The Foreign Secretary had said that he recognized that it was the duty of the Russian and British Governments to set the Persian Government once more on its legs and keep it there. He did not know any Government more disqualified from doing that than the Russian Government. (Hear, hear.) To complete the picture, Persia was going to get a loan of £200,000, half of which was to be lent by this country at 7 per cent so that we were not above making an honest penny out of the difficulties of Persia. (Hear, hear.) This all meant the end of the independence of this ancient people, who with all their faults, had had an illustrious history, and in his opinion it was a disgrace to this country that it had had any part in opposing their efforts to set up a system of civilized and free government. (Hear, hear.)

Colonel Yate (Leicester, Melton, Opp.) said that in this matter they had to eliminate sentiment and consider, from the practical point of view, how the interests of this country were affected. Russia had insisted on her interests being respected with the result that her trade had increased, her legal claims in Persian Courts had been respected, and the roads in Northern Persia had been kept safe. In the south, on the other hand, the roads were absolutely unsafe and British trade had been reduced to a standstill. There was an absolute state of disorder, the Persian Government was absolutely powerless and, as a corollary, the independence of Persia was at this moment a fiction. (Hear, hear.) It was to the Anglo-Russian Convention that they must look for the maintenance of its independence and integrity. Only the intervention of the two Powers had saved Persia from being torn in pieces. Sanction had been applied for for the construction of new railways which would benefit both Persian and British commerce and he saw no reason why those railways should not be sanctioned without delay. If a Trans-Persian railway was constructed it was important that there should be a clear run for British goods from India. The gauge should be the same as that on the Indian railways, at any rate as far as Isfahan, the capital of Southern Persia, for if not British goods would be at so great a disadvantage as compared with Russian goods that they would be ousted altogether.

Mr. D. Macon (Coventry, Min.) said great interest was being taken in this question in other countries. He had returned recently from a visit to Washington, where he had found that great interest was being taken in the independence and integrity of Persia, both by the members of the Government and by the people of the United States. The feeling was one of sorrow that Great Britain was not maintaining her high traditions in support of a nation struggling for freedom. While he was there he was given a copy of a document drawn up by the Foreign Relations Committee containing a resolution empowering the President to communicate with Russia and Persia requesting them to refer the differences between them to the Court of Arbitration at The Hague. That resolution was only awaiting time to be brought forward seriously in the House of Representatives and the Senate. That would be done when they were convinced that sufficient support would be forthcoming both from members there and from members here. It was of vital importance to us to maintain an independent State as a buffer State for our Indian Empire. The state of Persia now was very different from that when Mr. Shuster was got rid of. There was a difference in the credit of the country. Before Mr. Shuster's dismissal there was a proposal for a loan at 5 per cent. to be issued at about 96½, which would probably cost Persia about 6 per cent. Now that the two Great Powers had taken charge of Persian finance they had compelled her to reserve a trumpery £200,000 at 7 per cent. The original loan would have increased greatly the trade of the rest of the world with Persia. He wished to ask the Foreign Secretary by what right he could make a loan of £100,000 to Persia even at 7 per cent without the matter coming before Parliament. Greater democratic control of foreign policy was needed. The genius of British policy was and ought to be a love of freedom, but this country was unable to make her voice heard or her protest of any value now because she was fettered by alliances which were alien to British sentiment. It was impossible for a freedom loving country to work in partnership with Russia unless sooner or later one Power had to give way to the other.

Mr. Lloyd (Staffordshire, W., Opp.) remarked that the amendment dealt with the attitude of Russia towards Persia and not with the attitude of this country. Apparently the mover of the amendment meant to censure the Anglo-Russian Agreement of 1907. From a political, apart from a commercial, point of view Persia had suffered nothing which she would not have had to endure in a tenfold greater degree in the absence of that Agreement. If there had been no such Agreement and Russia had taken the action which the hon member imputed to her, he could not conceive it possible that any one would have asked the British Government to get the Russian troops out of Northern Persia. Having the Agreement, this country could at least ask Russia to respect the terms of the document. (Ministerial cheers.) If the Agreement were closely adhered to by Russia and Great Britain its existence would be for the benefit of Persia. The presence of Russian troops in Persia was unsatisfactory, and the moment that order was restored his Majesty's Government should ask Russia to take her troops out of Persia and not to interfere with financial or other affairs in Northern Persia. (Hear, hear.) The manner in which foreign advisers were forced upon the Persian Government was unwise, and the association of the British Government with that of Russia in regard to the compensation question, advances by Russia, and the ultimatum was very unfortunate. With regard to the Trans-Persian Railway scheme, he thought the prospect of the introduction of a third and perhaps a fourth Power into the affairs of this troubled zone would be likely to increase friction. He hoped that unless the railway could be made under more favourable conditions that it would not be made. Personally, he opposed this amendment because he believed it would damage the relations so happily instituted between ourselves and Russia.

Sir G. Robertson (Central Bradford, Min.) said both the mover and seconder of this amendment were labouring under a distinct fallacy in thinking that Northern Persia for 50 years past ever had been under anything approaching to an independent condition. (Hear, hear.) All that time North Persia had been absolutely in the grip of Russia. The Anglo-Russian Agreement of 1907 seemed so entirely beneficial to us that he should like to know how our Foreign Secretary induced the Russian Government to enter into it. This Treaty was of enormous advantage to us, and it was the only possible hope for the independence of Persia. In his opinion the Government of St. Petersburg was bona fide anxious to keep to its Agreements. He hoped that by tact and forbearance on the part of His Majesty's Government the Agreement with Russia would be maintained. There was good prospect of that. He was anxious for the maintenance of Persian independence and fervently hoped that the result of the debate would not in any way imperil the excellent position we held with Russia in joint determination to maintain Persian independence.

Mr. A. Herbert (Somerset, S., Opp.) said that some time ago he might have felt more agreement with hon. members opposite than now he did. It was not desirable to be perpetually interfering with specialists in any undertaking, and it was most unwise in a situation where there was great tension abroad, crisis after crisis, and foreign relations strained—most unwise to call to council people who had not intimate knowledge of the facts of the case. It was impossible for him to have a thorough knowledge of what happened in Persia last year, and he looked forward to the fulfilment of the promise of the Government of information.

Persia had not had the help that might have been expected from a Liberal Government, and if the condition of the people had not altered from the time when he was there, it was not so admirable as some hon. members believed. Ever since 1865 we had been fighting a kind of rearguard action in regard to Persia, and, as in such actions, with unsatisfactory results, and remembering what the difficulties had been in the past, it must be admitted that the new policy of the Government had not been unsuccessful. Those difficulties occurred because Persia is the neighbour of Russia, and, though neighbouring British possessions, is not a neighbour of English people. Persia would have fallen to pieces, Russia would have more quickly proceeded to Teheran, and British interests would have suffered more severely but for the policy of the Government. He was not always in favour of the policy of the Government, for reasons it would now serve no useful purpose to go into. Inferences were drawn from statements made in the House that were not always justified. If he seemed to speak unsympathetically from the point of view of hon. members opposite he should not be misunderstood. It was a fine thing that there should be a feeling in this country that His Majesty's Government might have done more for the independence and integrity of Persia. There was in that feeling the real spirit of chivalry in a democracy anxious to hold out a helping hand to a people striving to reach the ideal of democracy through the gates of Constitutional freedom, but speaking impartially, it must be said that a Constitution in Europe and in the East were very different things. The word was not understood in many Eastern countries. It could not be pretended that Persia was yet fully educated in the knowledge of what a real Constitution is. You cannot alter the heart of a man by giving him a political ornament and calling it a Constitution. You can not bring the people of Persia to perfection by giving them a Constitution, any more than you can relieve the misery in this country by breaking or suspending the Constitution here. Persia had for centuries been under the worst system of oppression the world had ever known. Half the people were fanatics and half were extraordinarily apathetic, and it was impossible to teach them what a complicated European Constitution meant or to get their affection for it. Under no circumstances did we mean to fight for the improvement of Persia. The annexation of the country or a guarantee for a Constitution which would mean occupation would be a wild, adventurous policy he was certain no member would advocate. (Hear.)

Sir E. Grey, who was received with cheers, said—I should like to begin by thanking my hon. friend the member for Stirling Burghs, who initiated this debate, for his courteous references to myself, and I can say with equal sincerity with regard to him that the purity of his motives in public life and the public spirit animating the action he takes are well known to us all. (Hear, hear.) He a little resented some criticisms I made upon criticisms made upon my own speeches in a speech made to my constituents last March. But my hon. friend need not have been so sensitive about these criticisms. I was addressing my constituents, and as I have nothing to say to my constituents that I am not willing that the whole world should know I have no objection to my speeches being reported. But speeches sometimes have a somewhat personal interest between myself and my constituents, and a local rather than a general interest. In this case I was dealing with certain criticisms upon my action which had appeared in a local newspaper published in my constituency. They were extracts partly from articles which I had not seen before and I explained that having seen those extracts and my constituents having all read them, I would deal with them, as I had not time to make research or see the whole of the articles from which they came. It was with those I was dealing. I knew my knowledge was partial. My hon. friend the member for Stirling Burghs has put on the cap, and I can only say unless he is the author of the extracts which I was criticizing at the time he need not feel aggrieved about anything which I said.

Now, coming to matters which have been dealt with in the debate, I take first of all the question of this document given by the British Minister at Teheran. That document was drawn up by the British Minister in an unofficial form. On the face of it you can see that it is in unofficial form. He regarded it as so unofficial that he did not send it home at the time, and that is why I never saw it. A few days after he drew it up instructions were sent by me from the Foreign Office as to the explanation which was to be given to the Persian Government of the Anglo-Russian Agreement. Those instructions were the official authoritative explanation. They were given some days after that unofficial document. They were accepted by the Persian Government. They were regarded by me as the only authoritative official interpretation for which I was responsible, and I object entirely to this official interpretation being put on one side and entirely disregarded and this unofficial document referred to as the only official interpretation. That is not fair. I do not blame the British Minister for what he did, but I do resent its being supposed that it was done under special instructions as an official document. It is full of quotations from the Russian Foreign Minister, and that I should have had an official document drawn up basing myself on statements made by a Russian Foreign Minister, and that I should have quoted these without their context and without communication with the Russian Minister and have drawn them up as an official document, of course it is not the case. (Cheers.) In general substance it does not differ from the official interpretation except in regard to one sentence at the end, which states that the object of the British and Russian Governments in these friendly negotiations "was not to allow one another to intervene." I believe the British Minister in drawing that up did not intend it to bear the construction which has been put upon it. But the construction which has been put upon it is that we undertook some obligation to guarantee in a way we had not done before the independence and integrity of Persia. That is the construction which has been put upon the words, and which it may be contended the words naturally bear, but it is not the construction he intended, and it is not the intention or construction that ought to be put on the Anglo-Russian Agreement.

I never regarded that Agreement—and I would not have made it if I had—as an extension of our responsibilities. I regarded it as a limitation of our action rather than an extension, and as a corresponding limitation on Russian action also. It was a mutual Agreement limiting the action of the two Governments—the Russian and the English Governments respectively. That was the main object and purpose of the Agreement. To-night what has been discussed in the House? The Anglo-Russian Agreement? Not as a whole. There has not been a word about the Afghanistan part or the Tibet part, and the whole thing hangs together. Have the articles of it been discussed? Not one of the article. Has the preamble of it been discussed? Yes, partly, the first part. The whole of the attacks made on the Anglo-Russian Agreement have dealt solely with the first paragraph of the preamble—the one-third part. That is what I mean by saying that the focus and perspective is distorted. We must look at the Agreement and at the articles of the Agreement as a whole. When I said at Manchester the other day what the object of the Anglo-Russian Agreement was, I defined it as having been to secure (I forget now the exact words I used) that the British and Russian Governments, respectively, should not disturb their interests and their frontiers in Asia. And that has been absolutely kept—on both sides. The Russian Government have done nothing since that Agreement was made to disturb the Indian frontier, to intrigue so as to make disturbance on the Indian frontier, to push railways towards it, or to do any of those things which they undertook in the Agreement they would not do. And we in the same way have observed the terms. When I said that it had been absolutely kept it was to that, the main object of the Agreement, I was referring, and it is absolutely true.

My hon. friend says that what has happened under the Anglo-Russian Agreement has damaged us strategically. If any of the articles of the Agreement had been broken, if Article 2 had been broken, or any of the other articles, then you would have had a case for saying that strategically our position was worse than it is. The operative parts of the articles have not been infringed in any way. How have we been damaged strategically by the Agreement? The Indian frontier is not conscious of it. The Indian Government is not conscious of any strategical damage. Russian influence no doubt there is in Northern Persia, but Russian influence was there before the Anglo-Russian Agreement was made. The fact of Russian influence being dominant in Northern Persia is no new thing. Any one who will take the trouble to look again at the speech in which I explained the Anglo-Russian Agreement to the House in 1908 will see that I assumed as one of the premises on which the Anglo-Russian Agreement had been made that the Russian influence in the north of Persia was already there and had been there for some 20 years, and that under successive British Governments not one of them had made it their policy or made an effort to prevent Russian influence being dominant in the north of Persia. The question of whether we are strategically worse off depends on the use which is made of Russian influence in the north of Persia, whatever difficulties there may have been with regard to Persian internal affairs, whatever disputes there may have been, has not been used in any way to make the Indian frontier strategically worse. (Hear, hear.) It has not been used, as it would have been in the past, to prejudice our strategical position. It has not been used in that way and it is not being so used now.

I do not mean to push that so far as to say that it should not be the subject of comment in the House that Russian troops are in Persia and have lately been largely increased in numbers. That, of course, is a matter of comment and has been dealt with frequently. The presence of Russian troops in Northern Persia has been due to various causes, into which I need not now enter. The hon. member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) seemed to resent my giving any explanation of anything which the Russians do in Northern Persia. Whenever I have given those explanations I have been strongly pressed to protest against something or other, but I have no desire to give explanations if it is not desired that explanations should be given. But I am, of course, bound to explain to the House what the position of Russian troops in Northern Persia is. Russian troops have been sent there owing to various disputes which have arisen, but they have not been sent there, as I am informed, in order to effect the permanent occupation of the country. They have been sent there at various times during the last few years, and on one occasion at any rate they were withdrawn after they had been sent from Kazvin. In July, 1909, after the revolt of the Bakhtiari and Nationalists at Teheran the Russian Government, in order to guard all nationalities at that time landed a regiment of Cossacks, a battery, and so forth, which went to Kazvin. In November of that year we were told that 300 of those men were to return to Russia. In December, 1909, 600 or 700 were withdrawn, and on 23rd February last year all those troops were withdrawn from Kazvin except the Consular guard of about 50 or 100 men. That is an instance of troops having been sent and then withdrawn. Any one who has had experience of the sending of British troops to occupy places temporarily will realize how difficult it is to withdraw troops when they have been once sent to occupy. The fact that troops were once sent and then withdrawn ought, at any rate, to be noticed in this House as evidence that the sending of Russian troops into Northern Persia has not been from any premeditated design for the permanent occupation of the country, but due to causes which we hope will be temporary. Again, troops have been sent to Kazvin. My hon. friend who initiated the debate pointed out that Kazvin is a really important place, and that the other places did not threaten Teheran, the capital, nor the heart of Persia, and are comparatively close to the Russian frontier. Kazvin, no doubt, is on the direct route to Teheran. From Kazvin there were some of the troops withdrawn a little time ago, and we understand that the rest are soon to be withdrawn from Kazvin also. With regard to other places there is another factor to be borne in mind. Russian troops are not the only troops in Persia at the present time. There are Turkish troops over the frontier of Persia. They have been there for some time, and the contention of the Russian Government has been that the presence of the Turkish troops in Persia is for protecting strategical interests, and no one can deny that they are justified in putting forward that contention. The Turkish troops began going over the Persian frontier under the old regime in August, 1905—I am not sure about the month—and they have gradually advanced further and further, and no doubt the presence of Russian troops in Northern Persia may have led to still further advances of Turkish troops. That is the situation at the present time. The Turkish troops have advanced far in the direction of Tabriz, and the Russian troops in some places have been advanced, no doubt as strategical movements, because the strategical position has been changed to their disadvantage by the presence of the Turkish troops. That is an element which has to be borne in mind. If the strategical position of Russia is threatened, or is likely to be prejudiced by the advance of Turkish troops, Russia is entitled to claim that she must be a judge of her own strategical interests and of what measures are necessary to protect them.

With regard to Persian independence, I notice one very important admission of the Hon. Member who began the debate. He admitted that there had been Russian influence in the north of Persia before the Agreement, but he said that the Persian revolution destroyed that influence. I have been told from other sources that the Persian revolution destroyed Russian influence in the north; but any one who reads the Anglo-Russian Agreement ought to consider whether it was really consistent for us to take upon ourselves the support of the Persian Government in the destruction of Russian influence in the north of Persia, which existed before the Anglo-Russian Agreement was made. It was there when the Anglo-Russian Agreement was made. When you speak of the independence of Persia you must bear in mind that the independence of Persia was one which was already conditioned by Russian influence in North Persia at that time. Does any one suppose that we could have worked the Anglo-Russian Agreement in this way—that we should say to Russia that the Persian revolution had destroyed your influence in the north, that you must not attempt to regain that influence, you must make no effort to re-establish the influence you have lost, and that we on our side must maintain the absolute security of the Indian frontier which is guaranteed to us by the Anglo-Russian Agreement? You cannot work the Agreement in that one-sided way. To say that diplomatic despatches and representations, and so forth, based on that assumption, should have been the ordinary course of events in the north of Persia is absolutely futile. It would put an end to the Anglo-Russian Agreement, and to say that Russian influence in the north should be destroyed as a consequence of the Anglo-Russian Agreement, and that we should retain all the advantages guaranteed to us in respect of the Indian frontier is an untenable position.

I come down to the present situation, and I will take some points in detail. First of all, there is the ex-Shah. We ourselves have taken up a strong line about him, and we have said that we could not recognize him again. It has been very exasperating to us, not on account of abstract considerations connected with the Persian Government or the Russian Government, but in our own interests. The ex-Shah went back into Persia, and one consequence of his going back was that the Bakhtiari forces which had been in the habit, though in an irregular way, of keeping order on the southern roads, were drawn upon to resist the ex-Shah. The Persian Government was crippled in its struggle with him, and our trade suffered because the roads were blocked. I regard that as sufficient justification for us to say that we would not recognize the ex-Shah; and the first object of importance at the present time is to get the ex-Shah out of the country. Criticism has been made as to his pension when he leaves the country. Not for the first time in history do we find that a pension has been given not on grounds of merit. (Laughter.) He has to be got out of the country. If the Persian Government had been strong enough to turn him out by themselves there would have been no question of pension or anything else. But they are not strong enough to turn him out; how is he to be got out? I wonder how many persons who take a strong line about Persian affairs have studied the map of Persia. North Persia is out of our reach, we cannot send a force there to turn him out. Are we to go to the Russian Government and to ask them to turn the ex-Shah out of Persia? Are we to be at one moment pressed to ask them to withdraw their troops in order to protect their trade routes or interest which they consider to be in danger, and at another moment to ask them to send forces into Persia at their own expense to do something to suit our purposes? Of course we cannot, and there are no means I can see of getting him out of Persia unless he is got out on terms. (Laughter.) He is out of our reach. As far as we are concerned we have done what we can to discourage the ex-Shah by saying that we will not recognize him and a warning has been given to him now through the Russian Consul that his case is hopeless and that he had better leave the country.

Undoubtedly certain terms have been offered him to leave, and in connexion with this subject I had better give the provisions of the loan. I have not the actual Joint Note about the loan, but I have a telegram sent on 2nd February setting forth the lines of it. As soon as I get the exact terms of the Note and the Persian reply I shall be glad to communicate them to the House. There is no doubt that they are roughly to this effect—that the British and Russian Governments will advance to meet immediate requirements £2,000,000 jointly, the proceeds to be spent under the supervision of the Treasurer-General and our share of £1,000,000 to be devoted as much as possible to the Gendarmes in the South.

MR. D. MASON.—At what rate?

SIR E. GREY.—It will be at the agreed rate of 7 per cent. Someone has said that the loan is small. Of course it is small. We do not want to undertake loans ourselves, but we want to see the trade routes opened to the south, and we have limited the loan to the smallest possible amount necessary to meet immediate emergencies and to enable a start to be made with the preservation of order on the southern routes. It is not intended as a loan to finance the Persian Government as a whole. That we hope will be done by a larger loan through the ordinary financial channels as soon as it can be arranged. The advance is made as an exceptional thing of very limited amount to meet special emergencies connected with the southern roads. As the two Governments are sharing in the loan it had to be made at an agreed rate of interest. Some Hon. Members ask me about the security in Persia. The loan to be useful ought to be made quickly, and we have not had time to go into the questions of security very closely. But we have said that it is to be made on what security is available and to be the first charge on the large loan we hope Persia will be able to raise soon through the ordinary financial channels when the situation in Persia has improved. It is not a very serious liability in amount, but it will, of course, have to come before the House. The next thing was to inform the Persian Government that the ex-Shah should be requested to leave Persian territory and that neither he nor his adherents should receive encouragement or support from the Russian Government or ourselves. The text of the communication has been left to the two representatives to draw up, and the amount of the pension and the conditions on which it has been granted are being arranged. The third point deals with proposals of a general amnesty to be proclaimed, and when the ex-Shah has left Persia the Russian Government are to dismiss their irregular forces. The fourth point refers to a readiness to discuss with them a scheme for a small army. An hon. member asked whether the army would be put under Russian officers. I have said nothing in this telegram about Russian officers, but it may be that they will be employed under the Persian Government. It is no new thing. For years and long before the Anglo-Russian Agreement, Persian Consuls in Teheran were under Russian officers. Never for a moment would the Russian Government consent to see their officers employed under the Persian Government dismissed and officers of another nationality substituted for them at Teheran. The fifth point is that the Persian Government should be requested, in a form to be decided upon by negotiation, to conform to the principles of the Anglo-Russian Convention. It is a very necessary provision, because if we agree that there are certain parts of Persia in which we will not push our respective influence, it is essential that the Persian Government should not upset it. One of the reasons which gave rise to the difficulties at Teheran was undoubtedly the appointment by the Treasurer-General of the Persian Government of a British subject at Tabriz, 80 miles from the Russian frontier and within the sphere of Russian influence. If the Persian Government is to continue its business undisturbed it is essential that it should conform to the Articles in the Anglo-Russian Agreement, and should not give concessions contrary to the spirit of the Agreement, or make appointments of Russians in the British sphere or of British in the Russian sphere. There is no harm or indignity in asking the Persian Government to conform to that practice stipulated for in the Anglo-Russian Agreement, which prevents friction between the British and Russian Governments.

Now as to trade. It was a perfectly true criticism to say that our trade had suffered recently more than the Russian trade. It is true that Russia has sent forces into the north of Persia to control the routes. They are engaged in taking caravans on some of the trade routes in Northern Persia. If we could have done it for ourselves in the south of Persia the Russians would not have made any objection to our doing in the south what they had themselves done in the north; and it would have been within our rights. I admit that the reason why our trade in the south has been impeded and even blocked to an extent which has not been the case with the Russian trade in the north is that we have not ourselves taken the measures in the south which the Russians have taken in the north.

I frankly say that I think we have done right in deciding not to take steps to control these trade routes. If we had, we should have had to send between 1,000 and 2,000 men to begin with at least and, as hon. members know, the force you send at the beginning in such a case generally turns out to be far too small, and having sent you are told that unless you send a considerable number more the whole object for which you sent these men will be sacrificed. Then you are told further that you must occupy a certain point or points to secure your object. Having occupied these points you will find that your occupation is going to be of no use and that its object will not be attained unless you occupy some point further in which you are told it is absolutely essential you should occupy. That is the very reason why we have been reluctant to undertake the control of roads in Northern Persia. It would have put on us and on the Indian Government, because I suppose we should have had to share the expense, an expense which might have been very great, and might indeed have been so great as to exceed, not the profits, but the gross value of the whole of the trade involved. Suppose we had let ourselves in for an occupation of Southern Persia and had undertaken the responsibility of providing for order. I admit the trade has suffered, but, on the whole, the Government have, I think rightly, hitherto decided not to send a force into Southern Persia to control the roads, but to do all we can to co-operate both with the Persian and the Russian Governments in inducing the ex-Shah to leave the country—that will react most favourably on the southern roads—and to secure for Persia a small advance of money to devote to organizing a gendarmerie for the southern roads and in getting Swedish officers to organize that force. In this we are doing the best we can for Persia, and we hope that these measures, inconvenient though the interruption to trade may have been, if they succeed in a few weeks or a month in restoring order to Southern Persia, will make it clear that the policy we have adopted has, in the long run, secured its object, with far less expense and far less risk than would be incurred in the occupation of the country.

Then I was asked to say a word about railways in Persia. I can say very little about the trans-Persian scheme, which is still in this stage—certain financial groups, on their own account, are making a study of what the prospects of a railway would be, how it could be financed, and so forth. All we have said hitherto is that we are favourable to a railway in principle, provided certain conditions are eventually observed. Till the study of these groups has resulted in showing that some particular scheme is favourable, there is really nothing to report. So far as we are concerned I think we are right in not opposing railway development in Persia, because, sooner or later, it must come; indeed, you have no right simply for your own interest to pursue a policy of opposing railway development. In the long run you would not succeed. I think that our proper policy is not to discourage or to oppose schemes which may be put forward for the development of Railways in Persia, but to give such encouragement and support ourselves as will secure that, if and when a trans-Persian railway is made, it should be made under conditions as to breadth of gauge and as to routes taken which are satisfactory to the Indian Government which are most concerned. (Hear, hear.) We have been in close consultation with the Indian Government as to conditions and they have stipulated for certain prima facie conditions to be accepted if and when a group decides that a railway is feasible. I cannot say how much international capital may or may not be involved. That is a stage further ahead; but if and when a railway is pronounced feasible, we shall then, of course, review any scheme that is put before us in the light of the conditions stipulated for by the Indian Government and in consultation with them.

One important and definite question I was asked with reference to the terms of M. Mornard's appointment as Treasurer-General. The reports I have from our present Minister at Teheran are quite favourable to M. Mornard, and, indeed, it would be difficult to find anyone else at this moment who has the experience and knowledge of Persian affairs which it is necessary to have to transact the business of the post. Indeed, I think that to attempt in the present state of affairs to send any one there with no knowledge, or previous experience of the country would be to set that person a very hard task indeed. I think the experience M. Mornard has had is valuable in the present crisis and will enable him to take hold of the business. The reports as to M. Mornard personally that we have from our Minister at Teheran are quite favourable. Of course everything had to be done in a hurry recently and the appointment at present is temporary, the question of a definite appointment being kept in suspense.

Mr Morrell (Burnley, Min)—(Can the right hon gentleman tell me whether the Persian Government protested against the appointment?)

Sir E Grey—I would ask my hon friend to give me notice of that question. The Persian Government, I think, do not at all grudge the appointment of M. Mornard at the present time, but whether they did at any stage make a protest or not, I cannot say without notice. The appointment, though temporary, may become permanent, and, at any rate, it is the best that can be done at the present time. I have no reason to say that it will turn out other than satisfactory.

Now generally, if we are to intervene in Persia, we must base our intervention on British interests. It is impossible for us to undertake in different parts of the world, when disputes arise between other countries, to be the arbiters in those disputes and to pronounce judgment upon their merits. In this case, a dispute between Russia and Persia in the north of Persia, where admittedly we have acquiesced in the establishment of Russian influence in previous years, we cannot undertake—I cannot undertake to be continually giving accounts of all that happens and pronouncing judgment upon what has taken place. I have not got the information, in the first place, and we must, if we are to pursue a policy which is within our compass, a reasonable policy, base our intervention in Persia on British interests. I deprecate the constant attacks that are made in this House as to what has taken place and is taking place in the north of Persia, which are based upon the absolute truth of every statement which is adverse to one side, and which ignore the statements which are adverse to the other side. I am not in a position very often to have any information in regard to some of the statements. Even if I had, I do not consider it is my business to investigate all the circumstances on each side, and then to say exactly what is true. But what I deprecate is that everything that is adverse to Russian action should be accepted and that everything which is evidence of provocation to Russian interest should be ignored. Russia in the north of Persia finds it necessary to take certain measures to protect her trade or her strategic interests. Those are not necessarily a breach of the Anglo-Russian Agreement. Look at the second paragraph of the preamble, which begins—“Considering that each of the Powers, Great Britain and Russia, has for geographical and economic reasons a special interest in the maintenance of peace and order in certain provinces of Persia”—with a preamble like that, you cannot say for a moment when either country takes steps to intervene in a particular region in Persia where it has been admitted by the preamble to have special interests, for the protection of interest it considers in danger—you cannot consider that as necessarily a breach of the Anglo-Russian Agreement. There are certain things under the Anglo-Russian Agreement which would be a distinct breach and which would have to be taken up at once. A breach of Article 1 and Article 2 of the Agreement about Persia is, of course, a thing which would be taken up as a breach of Article 1 by us or a breach of Article 2 by Russia would be taken up at once by one or the other country. In all the criticism which has been offered in this House in respect to the Anglo-Russian Agreement, only once that I remember has there been any reference to the really operative articles of the Agreement or any allegation, at any rate, that any one of these had been broken. When that is the case, when one of these articles is broken, then, of course, strategic interests would be involved and must be protected.

Mr. O'Grady (Leeds, E. Labl.)—Where do the Persian people come in this case? (Hear, hear.)

Sir E Grey—We have never undertaken the responsibility for the Persian people. Are we to make ourselves responsible for people in Central Asia? (Hear, hear.)

Mr O'Grady—Are they to be wiped out? That is all.

Sir E Grey—No, no. That is the sort of statement that makes debate impossible. (Cheers.) What is in effect being pressed upon us in debate?

I am pressed to take up questions on behalf of Persia in the north of Persia, and it amounts to this, that I am in effect being asked to prevent Russia from regaining and retaining that influence in northern Persia which she had before the Anglo-Russian Agreement. (Hon. Members.—"No, no.") The hon. gentleman the member for Stirling Burghs (Mr Ponsonby) admits that the Russian influence which existed at the time of the Anglo-Russian Agreement has been destroyed. Russia has to regain and retain that influence and the criticism passed on me is that I have not prevented it. That is really what it comes to.

Mr Ponsonby—All our efforts since the time that Russian influence was damaged in the north have been to help Russia to regain that influence and make it stronger than before.

Sir E. Grey.—That is not the question that has been pressed upon me. I have been pressed to protest against certain things, to take action to prevent Russia doing certain things. The effective part of the attack is that I have not prevented that influence being regained and retained.

That comes from the very quarter which, when this Government first came into power, would have been the very first to denounce the Government if we had said that previous Governments had acquiesced in Russian influence in the north of Persia, and that we intended to do so no longer and were going to adopt a forward policy. (Cheers.) Of course the permanent Russian occupation of Northern Persia and the overthrow of the Persian Government at Teheran would alter the situation. It would greatly offend Mahomedan feeling, and no doubt the Russian occupation of Teheran, and the overthrow of the Persian Government, and the substitution for it of Russian government at Teheran would alter the situation. But Russia has assured us that is not her intention. In the first place she has not sent troops to Teheran, or attempted to occupy Teheran, and in the next place she has told us that whenever she has sent troops into Persia they have been sent for a special purpose and will be withdrawn when that purpose is served and when the situation admits of it.

Of course I do not say the situation as regards the future is free from difficulty with regard to Persia. It is not a very easy matter to keep the Persian Government on its feet and to get order re-established throughout Persia by Persian resources alone. That is what we wish to see done, what we are trying to do, and what, with patience, I think we shall succeed in doing. Without the Anglo-Russian Agreement there would be no chance of anything of the kind. Without the Anglo-Russian Agreement we should have the same jealousy and suspicion of Russian action and British action respectively which existed before the Agreement was made. That certainly would have led to far worse consequences than at the present time. Whatever Russia has done in the north of Persia has been done with the sole regard to the effect of Persian action on affairs in Persia or her interest and not for fear we should take advantage of the situation against them. If there had not been that confidence between the two Governments the action would be very much more extensive, because in the old days each Government was working against the other at Teheran not merely to protect its own interests, but to try to prevent the other from taking advantage or supposed advantage of the situation. If that motive still existed the interference would be on a much greater scale. What should we have done? We should have no security that we should not have found ourselves some day face to face with the fact that Russian influence in the north of Persia had led to concessions for a railway towards our frontier. How should we have protected ourselves against that? We should have been driven, not because our own interests required it, but because we were afraid of a change in the situation to our disadvantage, to assert our authority in those parts of Persia which it is specially necessary for us to watch in regard to our Indian frontier. Then you would really be on the way to a partition of Persia and a joint frontier. I trust anything of the kind will be avoided, that there will not be a partition of Persia, that we shall be able to keep intervention in internal Persian affairs within much narrower limits than we could have kept them if there was apprehension either on the Russian side that we were going to work against their interests in Persia or on our side that they were going to work against us. If it were a fact that we were working against each other the intervention that would then take place would be very much greater. It is natural that the House should expect papers. I gave instructions some time before the House met that papers should be got ready, but it is necessary to send them to Teheran and to send certain parts to St. Petersburg to be examined in the Embassy and Legation there before they can be presented to Parliament. I am having that done as quickly as possible, and papers which are being prepared will be laid, I hope, about the middle of next week. They will come down to a certain date because I shall not be able to have papers beyond that date, but I have given instructions that a further set of papers shall be prepared bringing events down to a later date, as I said in answer to a question the other day. I will have the papers pushed on as fast as possible, and will have them laid before Parliament down to as late a date as possible.

Mr. O'Grady urged that it would be advantageous to British interests that the Foreign Office should help to secure the restoration of the Mejliss and the Constitution in Persia. He complained that the Secretary for Foreign Affairs appeared to resent the attempts made by hon. members to obtain information relating to Persia.

Sir E. Grey said that remark was unfair, in view of the number of questions which he had answered, including supplementary questions, which used not to be allowed in regard to foreign affairs. If he had given the impression of which the hon. member spoke it was not because he resented inquiries, but was probably due to the embarrassment caused by the number of questions and the difficulties to which they might give rise.

Mr. N. Buxton (Norfolk, N., Min.) said he had been pained to hear from more than one Englishman in Persia how extremely unpleasant it had been for them to view the loss of British prestige in that country during the last few years. The Entente might not have damaged Persian interests, but its distortion, which in the last two or three years had amounted to a certain subservience to Russian interests, had been damaging to Persia. During the last three years Persian history had been a symptom and by-product of the German situation, which had affected British policy in many other parts of the world, and notably in Turkey. Turkey had an extremely urgent interest in supporting the independence of Persia, and Great Britain had not been able to support Turkey in that policy because it had been thought that the primary consideration of our diplomacy must be to win the friendship of Russia and other Powers against Germany. As a result of the recent improvement in Anglo-German relations it might be hoped that that consideration was removed, and that His Majesty's Government would be able to consider reasons for supporting Persia. He wished to know whether the policy recently pursued in regard to Persia had the support of the India Office.

Mr. Montagu (Cambridge, Chesterton, Min.)—Yes.

Mr. N. Buxton said there were divergent opinions upon whether it was to the interest of Europe to endeavour to promote the permanent welfare of the Mahomedan States, but if there was any such State clearly worth supporting it was Persia. Lord Curzon evidently thought there was a great deal more we might do. He suggested that the proposal of a Foreign Affairs Committee such as operated in France was worthy of the consideration of the Government if only for its possible value in any matters such as Persia which might arise in future.

Mr. Ponsonby was deeply disappointed with the speech of the Foreign Secretary, but withdrew the amendment.

Triplets.

EVEN as the flowers are, so art thou,
Bright and sweet and joyous,
Maiden of the sunny brow!
Even as the morn is, so art thou,
Fresh is the virgin dew
Upon thy golden brow.
Even as the stars are, so art thou,
The poetry of heaven is Under thy arched brow.
Even as the soul is, so art thou,
And love and life and light
Are circled round thy brow.
Green bank of grass and maiden hair
Wound round a purling brook
In summer, is 'passing fair:
Where roses climb half way
To trellised jessamine,
Soothing the sultry day;
And showered blooms of Vakul spread
Beneath, and yellow Champa, Blithe Spring's own bridal bed,
'Tis ever sweet; but sweeter thou
And fairer, aye, and rarer,
Maiden of the golden brow!
Do I love thee? Ask not again:
The stars above thee answer yes,
And the flowerful plain.

News of the Week.

REUTER wires from Rome on the 7th—Three thousand Turks made a series of vigorous attacks throughout Tuesday night upon the Italian positions at Murghheb. The Turks were repulsed by artillery and quickfiring and it is estimated that they had four hundred killed. The Italian casualties were one killed and five wounded.

Latest news from the Red Sea state that the Italians have occupied Sur, one of the islands of Farson, which are within Turkish limits. The Italians are reported to have landed a body of native troops in Sur and it is rumoured that they intend to hand over all the Farson islands to the Mahdi of Asir, Syed Mahomed Bin Idrees. Meanwhile, the Mahdi of Asir is investing the Turkish port of Meedi and is said to be contemplating an advance on Loheia.

The following Press communique has been issued in the Foreign Department, Government of India—Rumours have spread to the effect that it was the intention of the Italian Government to blockade the Ports of Jeddah and Yambu, and representations on the subject have been made by Muhammedan bodies to the Government of India. The Government of India have received no corroboration of these rumours, nor has any information to that effect reached His Majesty's Government. His Majesty's Government do not believe that the Italian Government have in contemplation steps which would lead to interference with the pilgrim traffic, and in order to allay anxiety on this point, have represented to the Italian Government that any such action if contemplated would create deep resentment in India.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 10th—The Tribune states that the British, German, French, Austro-Hungarian and Russian representatives called separately at the Foreign Office and asked the Minister the terms on which Italy would accept the friendly mediation of the Powers. The Minister reserved his reply.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 12th—The Chamber has passed all clauses of the Bill authorising an expenditure of £200,000 sterling on the campaign in Tripoli.

Turkish counterproposals with regard to the understanding with Great Britain on the subject of the construction of the Persian Gulf section of the Baghdad railway, negotiations for which will be conducted in London, are understood to comprise the following: The capital will be equally divided between Great Britain, France, Germany and Turkey, each equally participating on the board of Directors the Chairman of which will be an Ottoman who will have only one vote. The line shall terminate at Basra.

M. Charikoff, Ambassador at Constantinople, has been recalled presumably owing to the disapproval of his policy. It is reported that M. de Hartwig, Minister at Belgrade, will succeed him.

The Russian papers are mystified at what they regard as the disgrace of M. Charikoff who was recently recalled from his post of Ambassador in Constantinople. Their remarks imply that he carried on a policy of his own, that he was too pro-Turkish, that he deprecated any mediation by Russia in the Turco-Italian war and that he strongly favoured the "Young Turks."

Turkey has commenced laying mines in the Dardanelles. Pilot ships will meet vessels.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 12th, fierce fighting took place at Tubruck on the 11th instant the Turks attacking a new fort in process of construction. Three Italian regiments were engaged and drove back the enemy with bayonet charges aided by mountain battery. It is officially stated that the Italian casualties were 13 killed and 73 wounded. The enemy's loss was enormous.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 14th, desperate fighting has taken place at Benghazi where the Italians attacked two oases of the northeast of Foja. They routed the Turks whom they pursued with bayonet. Italian casualties were twenty-six killed and sixty-two wounded, while over a thousand Turks and Arabs were killed and more wounded.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 14th there was a scene of delirious enthusiasm in the Chamber of deputies when the Minister for War, General Spingardi recounted recent successes of Italian arms in Tripoli which culminated in the triumph at Benghazi when, declared the Minister, "The sun of victory was more resplendent than ever."

It is unofficially denied that Italian warships are at present in the Aegean sea.

The Resolutions stated below were passed at a meeting of the Indian Red Crescent Society, held on the 8th March 1912, at 4, Medical College Street, Calcutta.

I That the telegram mentioned below be sent to His Imperial Majesty the Sultan and to H. H. the Grand Vizier "Muslims respectfully express satisfaction at appointment Turco-Persian Boundary Commission and Commission of Enquiry to redress grievances. Also respectfully beg to urge conciliation of non-Muslim races."

II "The Indian Red Crescent Society expresses its sincerest thanks to the French Embassy in London, the French Foreign Office, and the British Foreign Office, for the assistance accorded by them to the Red Crescent Medical Mission sent from London to Tripoli."

Tripoli, February 18

GENERAL CANEVA, Commander-in-Chief of the Italian troops in Tripoli, has arrived here on his return from Rome and has resumed the command.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, February 19.

The Temps states that according to information from Constantinople the Italians are taking advantage of the Arab Sheikhs' quarrel with the Porte and of their internal dissensions to incite them to take up arms again. Syed Idris, in particular, is said to have received from the Italians five machine guns, seven field guns, 4,000 rifles and 50 cases of ammunition, which have been disembarked at Djisam. The Imam Yahya is organizing a corps of well-equipped troops to march against Syed Idris.

Loheia via Aden, February 15

It is reported that the Italians have landed 500 men on Farsan Island, whither 200 followers of Syed Idris sailed from Midi a few days ago. (Reuter.)

Paris, February 19.

A telegram from Sfax states that the British Red Crescent Mission composed of seven persons, including two doctors, which left London recently under the general leadership of Mr. Cuthbert Dixon-Johnson, arrived there at 11 o'clock this morning. It was received by the members of the Sfax Red Cross Committee and a number of well-known residents of Sfax, who thanked the Mission for its humane enterprise on behalf of the wounded Turks. The Mission will leave Sfax on Wednesday on board the steamer T. Magnano for El Biban. (Reuter.)

Rome, February 21.

An official Statement published here denies that 500 Italian troops have been landed on Farsan Island and declares that no Italian soldiers have been landed in any islands or locality of the Arabian shore of the Red Sea. (Reuter.)

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Cairo, February 22.

The Egyptian Government has made representations to the Italian Government on the recruiting of troops in Eritrea for employment in Tripoli, putting forward as justification for this somewhat surprising step the plea that Egypt has never renounced her rights in Eritrea. The action of Italy has evoked violent protests from a section of the native press.

Constantinople, February 22.

Though higher military and naval circles doubt whether the Italian Government will yield to the pressure of its more impatient critics and sanction a naval attack on the Dardanelles, with all its risks, the Porte is evidently determined not to be taken by surprise. The necessary defensive measures have been taken and I have reason to believe that the Ottoman Ambassadors will be instructed, or have already been instructed, to inform the Powers that should an Italian Fleet appear off the Dardanelles the Ottoman Government will be compelled to close the Straits by means of mine defences, prohibit the passage of neutral shipping, and carry out the measures already adopted in principle for the expulsion of Italian subjects and the closing of Italian establishments.

Rome, February 22

The Italian Parliament reassembled to-day amid demonstrations of extraordinary enthusiasm both in the Chamber and in the Senate. In the Chamber the President, Signor Marcora, opened proceedings with a speech in which glowing eulogies of the Italian Army and Navy were followed by a fervent appeal to the patriotism of the country. Signor Lacava evoked almost equal applause by a speech in the same tone. The Ministers of War and Marine followed with acknowledgments of the honour done to the two services and the whole Chamber then rose to their feet acclaiming a message of gratitude to be addressed to the soldiers and sailors at the scene of war.

When the outburst of enthusiasm had calmed down, the Premier, Signor Giolitti, announced the introduction of a Bill for the conversion into law of the decree dated 5th November 1911, which placed Tripoli and Cyrenaica under the full and entire sovereignty of Italy. To expedite this conversion he asked the Chamber to accept the nomination by Signor Marcora of a Special Commission to which it would be referred. The Commission, which consists of 21 members, representative of nearly all parties in the Chamber, will examine the Bill immediately and give its report to the Chamber to-morrow evening, when discussion of the Bill can begin.

The proposal was approved by the Chamber with prolonged applause and the sitting was suspended in order to allow the Ministry to present themselves before the Senate, when the same scene was enacted, evoking an even imposing and moving demonstration of patriotic fervour.

Rarely before has either House been made the scene of such unanimous enthusiasm in a common cause. Even the dissentient Socialists were caught by the wave of emotion and applauded with the rest.

Rome, February 22.

The preamble of the Bill ratifying the annexation decree says:—

Italy has always regarded the equilibrium of political influences in the Mediterranean as her vital interest and has constantly held her possession of a free and economically and politically in Tripoli and Cyrenaica to be essential thereto. Italy had for years striven to attain this end by fair and peaceful means, and would not have had recourse to arms, had any other solution been possible and had all forms of Italian activity in Lybia not met with persistent and systematic opposition from the Ottoman Government. This opposition became more intense and provocative after the establishment of the Constitutional regime in Turkey. Notwithstanding this opposition, Italy displayed patience and forbearance in Tripoli and Cyrenaica, and in her foreign policy pursued a course favourable to Turkey in matters interesting the latter. But all this was useless; this conciliatory attitude was regarded by Turkey as a proof of weakness.

We should have been exposing the future of Italy and the peace of Europe to grave dangers, had we allowed a situation—injurious to our prestige and vital interests—to continue. Such a situation could only end in a war, that war might have broken out at a time when it would have given rise to serious international complications.

Moreover, it was evident that Turkish rule could not continue in a region which borders on the possessions of highly civilized nations and which Turkey herself did nothing to improve, while preventing others from doing so, and even maintaining the slave trade on the shores of the Mediterranean. Such a situation would but have led to other nations assuming a civilizing mission, had Italy not done so, in those regions so close to Italy and so full of glorious memories of Roman civilization.

The Italo Turkish war was commenced at a time when there was the least danger of international complication and has been conducted by us in the manner best calculated to avoid them.

Popular sentiment—which often has a marvellous intuition for certain truths—would have revolted at any failure to settle the question definitely. Any solution not excluding all political domination by Turkey would have created a very dangerous state of things in international relations. By creating juridical and diplomatic difficulties, it would have deprived Italy of all prestige among the natives and brought about fresh disputes with Turkey.

The examples quoted by a portion of the foreign Press, with a view to suggesting a less radical arrangement, are not to the point, because they either relate to countries where the native Sovereign resides in the country itself and is assisted by the officials of the occupying Power, or to special conditions, as in Cyprus; or again, to circumstances in which the absolute necessity of eliminating Turkish political domination had ultimately to be acknowledged, as in Bosnia.

In effect, in the case of Cyprus, it was not to be feared that Turkey would be either desirous or able to take advantage of her sovereignty in order to create embarrassment for the British Government: in fact, the majority of the population of Cyprus are Christians and Turkey consented to the occupation of the island by the United Kingdom in order to render it easier for the latter to extend Turkey the military support she had promised and at a time when Turkish sympathies were running high in favour of Great Britain, which had saved the Ottoman Empire from the most serious consequences of the Russo-Turkish war.

The maintenance of constant, delicate and somewhat vague relations was much easier under the Ancien regime in Turkey than it is to-day when the question of sending Deputies to Constantinople raises difficulties of a constitutional nature. This is exemplified by the fact that so soon as the Constitution was proclaimed in Turkey, Austria-Hungary annexed Bosnia-Herzegovina, although the situation was there less dangerous, only a third of the population being Mussulman.

The decree we are asking you to place on the Statute-book will be supplemented by a special law laying down rules for the administration of Tripoli and Cyrenaica. We are now certain that Italy's object will be attained, but in order that it should represent a great work of civilization, the action of the Legislature and the Government must not be hampered by foreign political domination. It is, therefore, necessary that the sovereignty of Italy over Lybia shall be full and entire. (Reuter.)

Mr Dillon (Mayo, E., Nat.) asked the Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether he could give particulars of all Turkish subjects, not Egyptians, arrested in Egypt within the last three months, the grounds on which they were arrested, and the proceedings consequent on their arrest, and particulars of any goods stopped in Egypt on the ground that they were intended for Tripoli; and on what principle of international law such interference with transit of goods was based.

Sir E. Grey.—I am without information as to arrest of non-Egyptian Turkish subjects in Egypt, I will, however, inquire. The passage of belligerents across the Egyptian frontier has, however, in accordance with the obligations of neutrality, been prevented, and those attempting to violate them have been turned back. With regard to the passage of convoys of arms and munitions of war, instructions have been given by the Egyptian Government that this cannot be permitted in accordance with Article II of the 5th Hague Convention of 1907, and the necessary steps have been taken to carry out this decision.

Mr. Dillon (Mayo, E., Nat.) asked the Secretary for Foreign Affairs on what grounds the Italian Government withdrew the permission given by them last autumn to a Red Crescent expedition to proceed by sea from Egypt to Tripoli; whether it was at present possible for supplies or personnel connected with Red Crescent societies to go from Egypt to Tripoli, and, if not, whether the British Government would request the Italian Government to withdraw their prohibition.

Sir E. Grey.—I have been informed that the objections of the Italian Government to the despatch of the Red Crescent Mission by sea were based on a report from General Caneva contending that the landing of such a mission at the time would be regarded by the local population as a re-affirmation of Turkish influence in Tripoli. The Italian Government further argued that, as other missions organized by the Red Crescent had entered Tripoli from Tunis, the Turkish forces were already amply provided in this respect. They also entertained apprehensions that, though the character of the doctors attached to the mission could be established, it would be impossible to apply a similar test to the other members of the mission and thus guard against the presence among them of disguised officers. There is no prohibition against the despatch of such missions from Egypt to Tripoli by land.

News from Turkish Sources.

(FROM THE "TANIN")

(Specially Translated for the Comrade.)

THE Agence Ottomane publishes the following telegram received at the Ministry of War from Enver Bey:—

January 23rd (Old Style). During the week we attacked the enemy three times; and in spite of the fact that the Italians were protected by the guns of their fortifications, we succeeded in inflicting heavy loss on them.

Note by the Agence:—It must be added that European papers have published details of the Turkish attack on Benghazi on the 25th January, but official news has not yet been received.

From the Agence Ottomane:—

According to reliable information received by the Agence Ottomane, three Italian transport ships are sunk, one in front of Wadi-uz-Zaitun to the west of Tobruk, one near Sosa and the third near Torina. It is said that many corpses of men and animals have been thrown upon the shore by the waves.

The following is supplied by the Ministry of War:—

The following particulars relate to the three night attacks made on Benghazi up to the 20th January (old style). On the 2nd instant the fortifications of Benghazi on the south-west were assaulted, and a number of our mujahids succeeded in entering the fortifications and returning with the spoils of war. The casualties on our side comprised one shahid and four wounded. The following night, another fortification was attacked.

and redoubts erected for big guns destroyed. On the night of the 5th January the mujahids attacked the Sulemani and Zariya fortifications in the north east of the town. This encounter was very severe. Four ironclads of the enemy poured hot fire on the mujahids for five hours continuously yet the forts were taken by us, and not a single inch remained in possession of the enemy. Early in the morning two small reconnoitring forces of the enemy were met with and completely destroyed. It is estimated that the enemy lost 3,300 killed and wounded in these night attacks—a fact which is confirmed by 24 big barges full of the wounded towed by a steamer being seen by us, as well as by the fact that the town is full of the dead and wounded. We had 32 shuheds and 80 wounded in these encounters. The number of mujahids is increasing every day. They are in excellent spirits and their faith in the Government is very great.

From the Ministry of War:—

On the 4th January an attack for scouting purposes was made by us on the defences erected by the enemy to the east of Derna. In the very first encounter the Italians evacuated the defences and fled. Our party made the necessary scouting and returned and subsequently re-occupied the position. Our casualties consisted of 3 shuheds and 10 wounded.

The Alleged Massacres in Tripoli.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In a letter published in your columns on 10th February Mr. Richard Bagot makes several very grave charges against all the non-Italian correspondents who were in Tripoli at the end of October last. He calls us "unscrupulous correspondents," he asserts that we circulated "abominable calumnies" that we were tools in the hands of the Young Turks, that we were "paid agents" of the Ottomans, finally, that we were not in Tripoli at all when the oasis atrocities were committed. To quote his words on this latter point:—

"The journalists and others who described in such glowing language Italian cruelty in the suppression of the Arab revolt were many miles away from Tripoli during that suppression. The few journalists and other civilians who were present have unanimously testified to the fact that no such acts of cruelty ever took place."

This charge is not new. It was first made by the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs when, early in November 1911, he granted an interview to a German correspondent. I had hardly expected this from a Cabinet Minister who must have been familiar with the facts of the case, but I can well understand that Mr. Bagot has been misled if he has gone for information to a quarter which puts such a statement into circulation. That it is an untrue statement is proved by hundreds of witnesses. I shall only mention one, Signor Fullò Giordano, the correspondent of the New York Herald in Tripoli. Being a fanatical supporter of this war, Signor Giordano attacked me bitterly in the New York Herald (Paris), 9th November, but he admitted that I was in Tripoli when the massacres occurred, and that I voluntarily returned my papers to General Canova by way of protest against these massacres.

All the non-Italian correspondents who were in Tripoli at the end of October witnessed these massacres and described them. If we leave the Italians out of account as being prejudiced witnesses, we find that the denials came in all cases from journalists, novelists, and others living in Italy, France and England. My attention has been drawn to a denial of the massacres signed by a number of gentlemen who were not in Tripoli when these massacres occurred. One of the signatures is Monsieur Jean Carrère, the comic correspondent of the Times. I shall take his case as typical.

Monsieur Carrère did not visit Tripoli until three weeks after the massacres had occurred. While staying in Naples early in November, on my return from the Tripolitan, I noticed that all the Italian newspapers were full of what they called a complete vindication of Italy's honour and a crushing exposure of la malintende, la ignoranza, l'odio of these English hirelings of the Turks who had accused General Canova's troops of murdering innocent Arabs. The "vindication" in question was specially written for the Italian Press. It was from the pen of M. Jean Carrère, and it took the form of a long series of articles asserting, in most violent and dogmatic language, that the massacres did not occur, and taking up all the "atrocities" that have been laid at England's door since the burning of Jeanne d'Arc. Incidentally, of course, we, the British correspondents, were denounced as liars, perjurers, swindlers, and spies.

M. Carrère visited Tripoli some weeks later, and is now the great authority on that oasis "repression" which he did not see.

Another witness is the New York Herald of Paris. When my account of the massacres was published in the Westminster Gazette the editor of the New York Herald wired to his local correspondent to investigate my statements. I have already pointed out that the correspondent in question is a jingoistic Italian who would certainly have shown me no mercy if what I had said was untrue. But as he could not deny the accuracy of what I had said, he confined himself to saying that I had failed to take into account the provocation which the Italians had received. Some weeks after, an American journalist seems to have been sent to the spot by the Herald in order to confuse me. I have not seen his articles, but Italians quote them as a complete disproof of what I said. Here, then, is another witness who was not present.

A third witness is Mr. Martin Donohoe of the Daily Chronicle. Mr. Donohoe was quoted first in the Stampa of Turin and afterwards all over Italy as saying that there had been no massacres at all. In the enormous headlines which gave prominence to this statement we were told that a truthful Englishman had at last killed the whole calumny.

But Mr. Donohoe had left Tripoli before the date on which the massacres are said to have taken place, and, speaking on his behalf the Chronicle has formally and publicly denied that he ever made any such statement as that attributed to him. But the Italian Press refuses to publish that denial, and Mr. Donohoe still continues to figure in Italy as one of the innumerable journalists who have testified to the fact that there were no massacres.

Other witnesses to the same effect are Italians, who were representing prominent English and American papers, as well as very obscure Sicilian papers. Reading those men's testimony without knowing their names, the English reader might well have been excused for believing that a fair proportion of English and American journalists denied the massacres.

But if all the messages from Tripoli had been signed, the British public would have seen that while the British, German, French and other non-Italian correspondents bore witness to the massacres, the only defenders of General Canova were Sicilian or Neapolitan journalists who, from motives of economy, had been engaged by a surprisingly large number of prominent English and American papers. If those gentlemen had told the truth they would have had to leave Tripoli at once with its high pay, its freer life, its chances of journalistic distinction. If the British correspondents had concealed the truth they could have remained in Tripoli for a long time, enjoying war pay, the hospitality of officers, the applause of patriotic Italians all over the world.

So much, therefore, for the evidence on the Italian side. It is almost entirely the evidence of absences. What have we on the other side? We have impartial Englishmen, Irishmen, Scotchmen, Germans, Austrians, Frenchmen, who were all in Tripoli when the massacres took place, and who to their great regret and horror, saw those massacres. We have Reuter's correspondent, Mr. Ellis Ashmole-Bartlett. We have Mr. Davis, a young Cambridge undergraduate, who represented the Morning Post. Mr. Davis is not a professional journalist, and it was with the utmost reluctance that he gave his evidence against the Italians, for he has many friends among the Roman aristocracy. I hope, by the by, that those aristocratic friends of his will never succeed in making him attempt to weaken the statement to which, with a full knowledge of the consequences, he signed his name in the British Consulate at Tripoli last October. Then we have Mr. Grant—a canny and hard-headed Londoner of Scotch descent—who, being extremely anxious to remain in Tripoli, said as little against his hosts as he possibly could, but who felt that it would be a crime to keep entirely silent. We have Baron von Gottberg, a Prussian officer, who has long been connected with the Lokal Anzeiger, and who enjoys a high reputation in Berlin as a military critic. In addition to von Gottberg we have five other Germans, not local Italians writing for German papers, but Germans permanently connected with the greatest organs of the Press in Berlin and Vienna. The French journalists present also declared that there had been massacres. The correspondent of the Excelsior sent his paper a dreadful account of the Italian atrocities, French penny-alicers from Tunis, Marseilles and Algiers appeared on the scene long afterwards and signed statements confirming the official Italian version of an event which they had not witnessed.

Of my own testimony, Sir, I do not care to speak, but my contributions to the Westminster Gazette proved that when I arrived in Tripoli it was with strong prejudices in favour of the Italians. As an Irish Roman Catholic, I would not be likely to declare without good reason that murders had been committed by Roman Catholic soldiers wearing scapulars and religious medals.

The Times correspondent did not, it is true, go so far as the rest of us. This was because he had been at the front and had seen only the smallest fraction of the massacres carried out by the Italians in the oasis. Yet even he declared that parts of the oasis had been turned into "human abattoirs," that "the Italians having set themselves to cow the Arabs, the flood gates of blood-lust were opened, and in many cases the men got beyond control, and the innocent suffered with the guilty." Writing in the Daily Telegraph of the innocent oasis Arabs, Mr. Bennett Burleigh declared that "many unquestionably have been wantonly murdered."

Yet General Canova denies that a single innocent Arab was killed, while Mr. Richard Bagot tells us that "the most searching investigations carried out by Italian officers and civilians of the highest honour and integrity have failed to bring to light one single case in which any Arab either has been ill-treated or put to death unless convicted of treachery."

If this is true, all the non-Italian correspondents must have fabricated the news which they sent. But that they could not possibly do so will be the verdict of any reader who has accompanied war correspondents in the field. Collective action by doctors, by lawyers, or by the clergymen of any one denomination is possible, but, owing to the nature of their calling, collective action of this kind by war correspondents is impossible. The great, the primary, object of each of them is to steal a march on the others. If one of them sends false news the others will lose very little time in denouncing him.

Mr. Bagot explains our unanimity by saying that we were all bribed by the Turks. Now, does anyone seriously imagine that an impoverished, corrupt, and doomed people like the Ottomans could bribe the whole European Press outside Italy? If Constantinople had tried to do so the Turk to whom they would intrust the money would promptly disappear with it. But in the first place they have not got any money to spare for this purpose.

If there was any bribery it was on the other side. There is a close connexion in Italy between the Public Treasury and the amenable journalist who can be got to see things in a "proper" light. Baron von Gotberg and I would in all probability have been comparatively rich men to-day if after we had returned our papers to General Canova we had not resisted the numerous, determined, but excessively courteous attempts to open up a friendly "discussion" in some quiet place.

But, needless to say, Italy's principal advocate in the present controversy is not her gold but her tremendous past, her literature, her art, her old cities, her superb twilight, the bewitching beauty of her hills and coasts, the irresistible charm of her people. Those are the influences to which Mr. Richard Bagot has succumbed. Those are the influences which we all find it so hard to resist. The Bedouin of Tripoli has no such advocates. I am, Sir, &c.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Salonica, February 15.

I am now authorized to announce that, as a result of somewhat protracted negotiations, the influential "Ulema Committee" has decided to withdraw its support from the Committee of Union and Progress and to throw in its lot with the Opposition. In view of the undoubted authority exercised by the Ulema over the Mussalman population, this is a political change of considerable importance and one which may well have a most unexpected influence upon the forthcoming elections. Ahmeh Omer Effendi has been chosen as the first president of the "Entente Libérale" at Salonika, to which body the local Greek and Bulgarian organizations have already promised their adhesion. The Ulema will run their own candidate in the person of Haffa Suleiman Effendi at Salonika, and the organization and influence of the Liberals will be placed at their disposal. On the other hand, the candidate of the Opposition will receive the hearty support of the Ulema throughout the vilayet.

As some considerable surprise will doubtless be manifested at the decision of the Moslem priests to aid so substantially the Christian candidate, it is interesting to note that the Ulema now claim that in working in harmony with their Christian brethren they have the sanction of the Koran. Their representatives have assured me that they are convinced not only that in a union of the diverse races of the Empire lies the one way of salvation for Turkey, but that such a union can never now be obtained under the organization of the Committee of Union and Progress, and can only be effected under the auspices of the Moslem religion, and by convincing the Mahomedans that the Koran not only permits, but encourages, an entente with the Christian races.

The local readers of the "Entente Libérale" take a very optimistic view of their chances at the elections. Counting upon the support of the whole of the Greek and Bulgarian and half of the Mussalman populations, they hope to control three-quarters of the voting strength of the vilayet and thus heavily to defeat the Union and Progress forces. This is, however, a most improbable result in view of the enormous advantages in organization at present possessed by the party of the majority.

Constantinople, February 16.

The Tanin to-day publishes the text of a memorial addressed to the Sultan by Kiamil Pasha on 20th December. The ex-Grand Vizier's hostility to the Committee of Union and Progress, which he considers should devote itself to educational and social reform and leave the Government a free hand, is evidently unabated. The most interesting feature of the memorial is the reference to the foreign policy of the Young Turks, who are charged with having alienated old friends and with having given a pretext for Italian hostility by their provocative attitude. It expresses the opinion that the Arab world, especially Egypt, where the Khedive is hostile to the Committee, will learn from recent events that it cannot expect effective protection from Turkey, and Egypt will eventually declare her independence, after coming to an arrangement whereby she will be assured of the protection of the British Empire.

Constantinople, February 18.

In reply to Kiamil Pasha's criticisms of the internal and foreign policy of the Young Turks, Hussein Djavid Bey asks in the Tanin why Kiamil Pasha did not conclude an alliance with Great Britain during his Grand Viziership. The cordial relations between the British and Ottoman Empires did not prevent the annexation of Bosnia or the declaration of Bulgarian independence. If political events are to be regarded as the results of a general scheme of policy, the Italo-Turkish War must be considered the outcome of an agreement between Italy, France and Great Britain.

Sinapien Effendi having handed in his long-awaited resignation, an Imperial Iradeh was issued last night appointing Djavid Bey Minister of Public Works.

Radj Adil Bey, the Minister of the Interior, left for Salonika yesterday on his tour of inquiry into the condition of the European Provinces, accompanied by Mr. Graves and the Turkish members of his staff. The fact that the Minister is invested with almost dictatorial powers inspires a belief that the best elements of the Committee and the Government desire that the Mission shall succeed and the hope that its success will not be jeopardized by the fanaticism of Turkish or non-Turkish extremists. The cause of European peace can only profit by the restoration, even relative, of tranquility in Albania and Macedonia.

Salonica, February 17.

The refusal of the inhabitants of a mill at Petritch (Seres) to lend their support to the new Bulgarian revolutionary propaganda has been the cause of a particularly revolting crime which is attributed by the authorities to the komitadjis chief Donco, whose band attacked the mill and ruthlessly massacred the inhabitants. The first reports stated that but five victims had fallen to the assassins, but, as a result of the official inquiry, it is stated to-day that eight Bulgarians were killed and three others mortally wounded. The peasants being unarmed were unable to defend themselves and inflicted no loss upon the brigands.

Constantinople, February 18.

A bomb exploded yesterday in the police offices of the town of Kirchevo in Macedonia, to the north of Monastir, destroying the building and killing one person and injuring five others. Several arrests have been made. The crime is attributed to the Bulgarian Internal Revolutionary Organization. Yesterday being market day at Kirchevo, it was hoped apparently to provoke further regrettable incidents such as occurred at Ishib in December, but the authorities took prompt measures to prevent any disturbances and order was undisturbed. (Conte)

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Candia, February 16.

It is evident that the insurgents are sparing no effort to complicate the intolerable situation and to accomplish their object of forcing the Powers to take immediate steps to decide the future of Crete. The news from Retimo is alarming. Several Mahomedans in the district have been murdered by Christians, and the Mahomedan rural population, panic-stricken, have abandoned the interior and are taking refuge in the town of Retimo. The majority of the adherents of the insurrectionary movement disapprove strongly of these violent methods, and luckily the lawlessness has not spread to other parts of the island, as in the present hybrid state of the administration of the island the authorities would be unable to maintain order if disturbances became general.

Paris, February 21.

In view of the fact that the protecting Powers have recently taken steps once more to impress upon the Cretans the necessity of moderation in their treatment of the Mussalman population, M. Denys Cochin, the Academician and Deputy for Paris, communicates to the Echo de Paris a letter which was addressed a few weeks ago both to him and to M. Clemenceau by the Cretan Deputies who were detained on board a French warship in Suda Bay after their attempt to proceed to Athens. In this letter they protest against their arrest and transfer by order of the Powers from a Greek ship upon which they had embarked at Canea for the Piræus. They declare that, notwithstanding the fact that the Cretans have maintained order and have protected the Mussalmans, nothing has come of the promise made by the protecting Powers three years ago to consider the question of the union of Crete with Greece. In their opinion uncertainty with regard to the future is calculated to provoke disorder in the island.

M. Denys Cochin, who says that he has M. Clemenceau's approval for the publication of this letter, believes that the Cretan question would be solved if Greece were as strong as Austria or Italy, or if Suda Bay were not so strongly covered. He pleads for a more sympathetic understanding of the Cretans, whom he describes as loyal to their country, gallant and sensible.

which the Sassoons are stated to have large interests. A syndicate of British, Belgian and French bankers has signed a contract with the Wai-Wu-Pu for the loan of a million sterling for one year, which will be secured on the income of the Kalgan Railway. The contract is subject to the approval of the Nankin Assembly, which, however, is practically assured.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 18th.—As the result of the loan reported on the 15th instant and against which protests have been made, the group of British, French, American, German, Russian and Japanese banks who intended to finance Government until its finances were restored, did not advance a million taels last Saturday. The whole scheme of financing China until the end of June has been suspended pending home advices. The loan to the Wai-Wu-Pu is considered as a breach of faith in view of the groups' generous agreement and immediate advances.

Replying to Mr Charles Bathurst, Sir E. Grey said he was not aware that any restrictions had been imposed on British subjects regarding the sale of arms to the new Chinese Government. They were merely advised to abstain from such sales during the revolutionary struggle.

Reuter understands that the Eastern Bank which is participating in the loan of a million sterling to China is not receiving the support of the British Government.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 21st.—The Ministers of the six nations concerned have decided to present a protest to Yuan-Shi-Kai against Tangshaoyn's modus operandi in reference to the loans. They emphasise that while the groups are ready to assist China, they require a guarantee of good faith for the future. Business circles very much regret the deadlock when they believed that the crisis had been surmounted.

The "Zamindar"

The District Magistrate has directed the publisher of Zamindar, a Muhammadan vernacular paper, of Lahore, to deposit two securities of Rs. 1,000 each for its weekly and daily editions and also called upon him to make the requisite declaration for the daily edition. The District Magistrate says that its tone is exceedingly immoderate and objectionable and also that the publisher has not abided by the contract that the daily edition would be a supplement to the regular weekly and confined to the telegraphic news.

With reference to the security demanded from the Muhammadan vernacular daily and weekly, the Zamindar an open air meeting of the Muhammadans was held in the gardens near the Mochi Gate, Lahore, under the presidency of Maulvi Abdulla, a religious leader of Peshawar, on the 20th. The meeting declared the Zamindar to be a national paper of the Muhammadans and its policy unobjectionable and passed a vote of confidence in its writings.

Baghdad Railway

REUTER wires from Constantinople.—In addition to the counter-proposals concerning the reconstruction of the Persian Gulf section of the Baghdad Railway, it is understood that the Turkish Ambassador in London has been confidentially instructed to negotiate with Great Britain with a view to the continuation of the line from Basra to Kowit. It is stated that the Turks are most anxious for a settlement, and the instructions have been drafted on lines which afford hope of a complete agreement, which will probably provide for the construction of the line with Anglo-Turkish capital exclusively and the recognition of the semi-independent position of the Sheikh of Kowit.

The Week.

China.

A REMARKABLE Franco-Chinese demonstration occurred on the night of the 14th in Paris at a banquet organised by Mr. Wu, Chinese Minister to Rome. A numerous company was present, including the ex-Premier, M. Monis, M. Anatole France, many Deputies, members of the Chamber, Diplomatic corps from London, St. Petersburg and Vienna, and many students, all in European costume. Mr. Wu in a speech delivered in excellent French proclaimed that the Republic was essentially pacific. Its motto was liberty and justice.

Reuter wires from New York on the 16th.—At a luncheon in honour of the new Japanese Ambassador Mr. Jacob Schiff declared that American and European bankers had consented to invite Japan to help to finance China. Japan, he said, was the greatest guarantee for peace in the East, standing sentinel over Asia. He was thankful that Japan, instead of Russia, had been victorious.

A message to the Times from Peking states that the 'Four Nations' banks have asked their respective ministers to protest against the loan for a million sterling, reported yesterday as having been signed by a syndicate of British, Belgian and French bankers, as an infringement of the agreement by which they have advanced to the Nankin and Peking Governments more than three million taels since 28th February. The British and French Legations will presumably protest against the loan as an infringement of article 5 of the Anglo-French Peking-Hankow railway redemption loan of five million sterling, signed on 8th October 1908. The Anglo-Belgo-French syndicate mentioned yesterday is represented by La Banque Sino-Belge and the Eastern Bank, in Demand of Security from the "Zamindar."

WE PUBLISH below the correspondence relating to the demand of security from the Zamindar—

I

Copy of an order passed by the District Magistrate, Lahore, on the 12th March 1912 regarding the daily edition.

On the 31st October last I wrote an order that no fresh declaration need be filed in connection with the proposed daily edition of the Zamindar, on the assumption that it was to be of a purely temporary nature, a supplement of the regular weekly newspaper and confined to telegraphic news. These conditions have been departed from and the daily edition contains all sorts of articles. It is in fact a separate newspaper and accordingly Zafar Ali Khan must now be called upon to make the requisite declaration for the paper as publisher under section 5 of Act XXV of 1867 (as amended by Act X of 1890).

As regards security under section 5 Act I of 1910, I find no special reasons for waiving the deposit of security. The publisher has not abided by his compact with me as to the nature of the daily edition and many articles which have appeared in it are objectionable in tone. I, therefore, order that the sum of Rs. 1,000 be deposited in cash or in Government promissory notes within a fortnight of the communication of this order to Zafar Ali Khan.

II

Copy of an order passed by the District Magistrate, Lahore, on the 12th March 1912, regarding the weekly edition.

On the occasion of the last declaration by Zafar Ali Khan, publisher of the Zamindar, a weekly newspaper, made on the 4th August 1911, the publisher was not called on to deposit any security, as the newspaper was an old one and used to be devoted largely to agricultural matters. Recently, however, the scope of the newspaper has entirely changed. It is now largely devoted to political questions and controversial subjects and its tone is often exceedingly immoderate and objectionable. The special reasons therefore which led to security being waived no longer exist and the publisher, Zafar Ali Khan, is hereby called upon to furnish Rs. 1,000 (one thousand rupees) security in cash or in Government promissory notes within fifteen days of the communication of this order which is passed under proviso 2 to section 8 (1) of the Press Act (I of 1910).

Copy of Mr. Zafar Ali Khan's reply to No. II

TO THE ADDITIONAL DISTRICT MAGISTRATE,

LAHORE

SIR,

I am in receipt of your endorsement No. 326S, dated the 14th March 1912, communicating an order passed by the District Magistrate, Lahore, to the effect that under proviso 2 to section 8 (1) of the Press Act I of 1910, I should be called upon to deposit with you, within 15 days, Rs. 1,000 security in cash or in Government promissory notes, as publisher of the Zamindar, a weekly newspaper.

With due deference to the opinion of the learned District Magistrate, I venture to submit that the proviso in question under which I am called upon to pay security relates only to newspapers in respect of which a declaration is made by the publisher thereof under section 5 of the Press and Registration of Books Act, 1867, subsequent to the promulgation of the Press Act I of 1910, which received the assent of the Governor-General on the 9th February 1910. Now, the weekly Zamindar, as the District Magistrate himself admits, is an old paper and declaration was made in respect of it prior to the commencement of Act I of 1910. Proviso 2 to section 8 (1) of this Act does not apply to the weekly Zamindar, which can only be dealt with under sub-section 2, section 8 of the Act which runs as follows:—

"Whenever it appears to the Local Government that any newspaper published within its territories, in respect of which a declaration was made by the publisher thereof prior to the commencement of this Act under section 5 of the Press and Registration of Books Act 1867 contains any words, signs or visible representations of the nature described in section 4 sub-section 1, the Local Government may, by notice in writing, require the publisher to deposit with the Magistrate, within whose jurisdiction the newspaper is published, security to such an amount, not being less than 500 or more than 5,000 rupees, as the Local Government may think fit to require, in money or the equivalent thereof in securities of the Government of India."

Adverting to the sub-section 1 (section 4) above alluded to, I find that the words, signs or visible representations, etc., which are susceptible of a penal treatment are those

"Which are likely or may have a tendency directly or indirectly, whether by inference, suggestion, allusion, metaphor, implication or otherwise

(a) To incite to murder or to any offence under the explosive substances Act 1906 or to any Act of violence, or

(b) To seduce any officer, soldier or sailor in the army or navy of His Majesty from his allegiance or his duty, or

(c) To bring into hatred or contempt His Majesty or the Government established by law in British India or the administration of justice in British India or any Native Prince or Chief under the suzerainty of His Majesty in India, or to excite disaffection towards His Majesty or the said Government or any such Prince or Chief, or

(d) To put any person in fear or to cause annoyance to him and thereby induce him to deliver to any person any property or valuable security, or to do any act which he is not legally bound to do, or to omit to do any act which he is legally entitled to do, or

(e) To encourage or incite any person to interfere with the administration of the law or with the maintenance of law and order, or

(f) To convey any threat of injury to a public servant, or to any person in whom that public servant is believed to be interested with a view to inducing that public servant to do any act or to forbear or delay to do any act connected with the exercise of his public function."

Now even admitting that the weekly Zamindar has published anything included in the above category—which it stoutly maintains it has never published—it was open to the Local Government alone to deal with the Printing Press in the first instance at which the paper is being printed, in the manner prescribed by section 4, sub-section 1 of Act I of 1910, and after that to require me under section 8, sub-section 2 of the said Act, which it has not done, to furnish the necessary security.

The order of the District Magistrate who requires me to pay security because the weekly Zamindar "is now largely devoted to political questions and controversial subjects and its tone is often exceedingly immoderate and objectionable" is in my humble opinion clearly ultra vires. There are hundreds of papers conducted both in English and Vernacular in India that deal with political questions and controversial subjects, but the mere fact of their dealing with such matter cannot necessarily attach to them a humiliating legal disability against which every freeborn subject of His Imperial Majesty whose profession is journalism has a right to entertain a vigorous protest. Moreover, it is not only recently that the Zamindar has taken to politics. From the very first it has been writing on political and controversial subjects. As regards the tone of the Zamindar, it is a pity that the District Magistrate has not pointed out the particular article or articles which, in his opinion, are against law, so that I may have an opportunity of satisfying myself as to their objectionable nature and refraining from writing in a similar strain in future if needs be. In this connection, however, I am entitled as a freeborn British subject to submit that so long as the paper does not violate the clear and distinct conditions laid down in section 4, sub-section 1, it has a right under British Indian law to be as incisive and free spoken as any other paper.

However, if the District Magistrate is not prepared to reconsider his decision and cancel his orders regarding security, which I respectfully submit does not harmonise with the law laid down on this behalf by the Imperial Legislature, I have no other course but to submit to it, after reserving to myself the privilege of appealing to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor. As I may perhaps be away from Lahore for some time, I hope you will be good enough to dispense with my personal attendance in your court for the purpose of depositing security, as that purpose will be equally served by the attendance on my behalf of my printer, Maulvi Abdul Haq, to whom I am handing over the amount of Rs. 1,000 with the instruction that, in the event of this representation failing to induce the District Magistrate to revoke his decision, the amount should be deposited with you.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

(Sd.) ZAFAR ALI KHAN,

LAHORE, 18th March 1912.

TETE À TETE

POLICE CONSTABLES as well as prisoners are given a number to distinguish them readily from fellow policemen or prisoners, but the numbering of more respectable people has not yet come into disrepute on that account. Our Manager has also given to each of our readers a number, so that if Maulvi Abdul Something or Mr. Almost Brown desire to have their addresses changed in one year, they may not have to wait till the next, and in the absence of such distinctions as Smith Minor and Smith Major the subscription of one may not be credited to the other. For reasons best known to Managers, these numbers have been altered now and arranged on a different basis, the letters of the alphabet affixed to them making matters easier for the office. We are, therefore, asked by the Manager to request our readers in the first place to forget their old numbers, and in the next, to remember the new. But, we are also asked to state, that in the third place, our readers must not grudge us the solitary number which the Post Office has allotted to us to distinguish us numerically also from our contemporaries. That solitary number is "C 596" and we declare it to be our own particular and sole monopoly. The wrapper bears this number, while the numerical distinction of each subscriber is printed on the address slip pasted on the wrapper. It would facilitate work if our readers will kindly quote their number whenever writing to the Manager. It is to be hoped that no more changes will be rung by the management, for this "Spring cleaning" is likely to delay the despatch of this issue.

Our readers could not have forgotten so soon "the exposure" of the Bengalee which formed the subject of one of our leading articles in the issue of the 19th instant. It was our painful duty on that occasion to expose what we called the "deliberate misrepresentation which beats everything that occurred previously by its phenomenal audacity." It was nothing less than the alteration of a most important word in the speech of the Nawab Bahadur of Dacca and the inclusion of a substitute with a totally different significance in inverted commas, with the additional deliberateness of the phrase, "in the words of Sir Salimullah" prefixed to the altered word. To leave no room for doubt about the deliberateness of the intention, when the pronoun "it," which unmistakably referred to "the annulment of the Partition" in the Nawab's speech, and for which the word "government" was furiously substituted by the Bengalee—occurred in the next sentence, the word "government" was again inserted, this time in brackets. And on the foundation of this misquotation, perpetrated of malice aforethought, the Bengalee built up the superstructure of sedition, with canting references to the "respect due to government" and "the august personality of His Majesty." We could not help admiring the boldness of the enterprise, for our audacious contemporary relied not on any interpretation that could be questioned or inference that could be denied, but on the unquestionable and undeniable "words of Sir Salimullah." It wrote, "We could scarcely believe our eyes when we read this sentence as coming from an Indian nobleman, especially one on whom the Government has lavished its favours and bounties. But the words are there; and all may read them. We confess to a sense of painful surprise that the Nawab should have been betrayed into such language and sentiments." Well could we say with Hafiz,

چه دلاور است دزدی که بکف چراغ دارد

(How bold is the thief that he holds a lamp in his hand!) Little did the Bengalee think that any of its readers would also turn to the "words" that "are there" and "read them." The situation resembles that of Donna Julia and Don Alfonso in Byron's

Don Juan. Our practised contemporary had evidently the wit of Antonia, if also the weakness of Donna Julia, and thought it could easily throw dust in the eyes of all intruding Alfonso. It is related that when Don Alfonso had arrived "with torches, friends, and servants in great number,"

"Without a word of previous admonition
"To hold a keeve round his lady's bed,
"And summon lackeys, armed with fire and sword,
"To prove himself the thing he most abhorred,
"Poor Donna Julia, starting as from sleep
"Began at once to scream, and yawn and weep.
"Her maid, Antonia, who was an adept,
"Contrived to fling the bedclothes in a heap."

The poet goes on to say that after these preliminaries had been gone through, Donna Julia boldly addressed her husband as any virtuous lady would have done

"Dare you suspect me, whom the thought would kill,
"Search then the room"—Alfonso said, "I will,"

And what was the result?

"He search'd, they search'd and rummaged everywhere,
"Closet and clothes press, chest and window-seat,
"Under the bed they search'd, and there they found
"No matter what—it was not what they sought,
"They open'd windows, gazing if the ground
"Had signs or footmarks, but the earth said nought
"And then they stared each other's faces round,
"Tis odd, not one of all these seekers thought,
"And seems to me almost a sort of blunder,
"Of looking in the bed as well as under."

Well, profiting by the experience of Don Alfonso, we were not content to look merely under the bed, but also looked in it, and who can say that our search has not been rewarded with a find that would be scandalous anywhere except, perhaps, in Bengal? Our only comment on that occasion was the question, "if the Bay of Bengal is deep enough for the Bengalee." We waited patiently for an answer from one that had evidently sounded the lowest depths, but in vain. However, we congratulate our contemporary, the Mussalman, on succeeding where we failed, and after ten whole days the answer comes and practically amounts to this, that, like much else in Bengal, the Bay is exasperatingly shallow.

In its issue of the 19th instant, more than a week after our exposure of it, the Bengalee is tempted to offer an explanation. It begins with the Pharisee's preface that "as a rule we do not take any notice of personal attacks made upon us," and this after having made the vilest personal attack on one in the position of the Hon. Nawab Sir Salimullah of Dacca, accusing him of crimes under sections 124 A and 153 A of the Indian Penal Code. However, it is something if the Bengalee is made to realize that "when there is an obvious misunderstanding we think it our duty to offer an explanation." But may one ask why it took the Bengalee no less than ten days to discover the "obvious misunderstanding"? And what is this "obvious misunderstanding"? It could not plead that it had received an inaccurate report of the Nawab Bahadur's speech, for we had taken good care to ascertain that even the Bengalee had correctly reported it a couple of days before its mischievous leader with the misquotation was published. Was it the sub-editor this time, or the printer's devil? Nothing of the kind. The Bengalee has the courage of its mendacity, and in spite of the fact that it has both the versions of the speech, it refuses to disown either. It writes, "It is obvious that there was no misquotation on our part, but if anything there was a misinterpretation of a particular sentence. We fail to see how the interpretation now put, and we are willing to accept it as the correct interpretation, at all improves the Nawab's case." Whatsoever the Bengalee may be willing to accept, for our part we are sure we are not at all willing to accept this explanation. Not once but twice a word is substituted for another and declared to be the precise word used by the speaker with the aid of inverted commas and the explicit assurance that the words are those of Nawab Sir Salimullah. If this is not misquotation but only a misinterpretation, we ask the Bengalee to give us an example of its misquotation, a sample of the genuine brand. We do not care whether any interpretation "at all improves the Nawab's case." All that concerns us just now is that this explanation does not at all improve the case of the Bengalee. It goes on to argue that because the annulment of the Partition was the work of the Government, and with it is associated "the honoured personality of His Majesty the King-Emperor," therefore "in the opinion of the Nawab the British Government and His Majesty the King-Emperor brought discredit upon British rule." We make a present of this so-called "analysis of the statement" to the brilliant lawyers of Bengal who have so often to deal with the niceties of the Penal Code and more particularly with the bearings of Section 124 A. on the critical genius of their innumerable clients. We are even prepared to ask for the prosecution and punishment of the Nawab Bahadur if the Bengalee can give an undertaking such as anyone that knows it can rely upon that in future it will not criticise any act or measure of the Government simply because the Government had done or enacted it or that His Majesty's august personality was associated with it. What does our popular contemporary live on but the criticism of the acts and measures of Government, and if its interpretation of the law of sedition was applied to its own past record, would not the cumulative sentence on its own modest endeavours carry the imprisonment of its publisher well beyond the Kaliyuga. Its excuse is worse than the crime itself, and we mean to keep it pilloried up so long as the confession of guilt is not forthcoming. We do not think Mr. Mackarness would call it torture, though the Bengalee may well feel it to be torture of the worst sort. But our only apology for this ruthlessness is that it is not every day that the thief is caught with the bunch of assorted keys and jenny and all, and with the stolen goods also in its hands. Now that he is caught in the very act, let the punishment be sufficiently deterrent. We trust the Mussalman would assist us in making the punishment fit the crime.

ALTHOUGH we deal with the "debate" on Mr. Gokhale's Bill elsewhere, it strikes us that it is a misnomer to call such a recitation of printed and typed speeches a discussion or debate. Each of the so-called speakers not only makes up his mind which side to vote—a proceeding inevitable in case of official members—but also decides what he should say to justify his vote, and for all practical purposes says it before he has heard a word of his opponent's speech. Mr. Gokhale recently refused to pay Sir Gangadhar Chitnavis the compliment of a reply to his criticisms because the latter had poured out his own previously prepared declamation in which no element of a reference to Mr. Gokhale's arguments could possibly enter. In this debate also most of the speeches were of the same character, and although we are loth to add anything to the stern criticism which the Hon. Mr. Dadabhai met with at the hands of Mr. Gokhale we cannot help mentioning that it is an insult to the Council as well to the mover of the motion to pretend to "have listened to the Hon. Mr. Gokhale's speech with the close attention, sympathy, and respect which such an able speaker and disinterested worker deserves," and to make out that in spite of this one was "impressed more than ever that the scheme embodied in the Bill" would not prove successful. How could one listen at all, not to mention "the close attention, sympathy, and respect" with which Mr. Dadabhai says he listened, and how could one be impressed more than ever or less than ever on any point, when almost every word of his speech had been written out several days ago and it was read out in the Council from a printed paper? The Quran has some emphatic remarks about those to whom it is the same if you warn or not, for "Allah has sealed their hearts and on their eyes is a veil." Unless an hon. member wishes to have such a description applied to him, it is better to leave some room in one's convictions for the results of an adversary's arguments. It is true that seldom does the head of a Department see the error of his ways, as according to the Hon. Mr. Bhupendra Nath Basu Mr. Clark did in a small matter on the 18th instant, and in another small matter some days previously. As a rule of official replies it is almost true that "the moving finger writes, and, having writ, moves on." But it need not be so with non-official opinions. In their case it should be possible for arguments and eloquence to lure back the finger to cancel many a line and wash out a multitude of words, adding other lines and maturer words in their place. As it is, the non-officials are the worst sinners in this respect, and the Hon. Mr. Dadabhai perhaps the worst among the non-officials. Surely the debates take place for the benefit of those who came to discuss great and vital issues in the Council, and not for self-advertisement among their constituents out of it or others in the country, and a Council debate is not a schoolboys' competition in essay writing, with the official in charge of the Department to which the question relates, with his frowns and smiles, in the place of the headmaster awarding the prize to the best writer. We are not averse to some of the points of a speaker being elaborated and even written out, for unfortunately only in too many cases are a slovenliness in arrangement, an absence of proportion and even relevance, and a looseness of expression apparent in some of the non-official speeches. But that is wholly different to the rapid recitation from a printed screed of enormous size. The members of the Council must recognise that they are in the same world with others, and though each must see for himself, they are there to compare notes and profit by each other's observation. What they appear to be at present are spectators shut up each in his own small panorama, or prisoners in their narrow solitary cells without any means of communication between them.

It is with extreme pleasure that we hear of the visit to India of Syed Rasheed Raza, the Editor of Al Manar of Cairo, to take part in the deliberations of the Nadwat-ul-Ulama this year as its president. Syed Rasheed's name is not unknown in Islamic countries, for he has devoted his great talents and the whole of his life to the revival of the true spirituality of Islam, which, while menacing nobody, would weld together the Mussalmans of the world into the fraternity of faith which they were designed to form. Only the other day Professor Margolouth, in lecturing on Pan-Islamism, spoke of Syed Rasheed with great appreciation, and we understand that he is a strong Anglophil. We are confident that he would receive from his co-religionists here a warm welcome proving in some measure that the brotherhood of Islam is not altogether a fiction. The present session of the Nadwah opens on the 5th April and lasts till the 7th at Lucknow and we trust it will attract a record gathering. If only the younger Mussalmans educated in our colleges and schools would take a more active interest in the work of the Nadwah, not only would they and the Nadwah be mutually benefited, but the un-Islamic separation of Mussalmans into theologian and laymen would also disappear. However, just at present it is not the theologian who is so much indifferent to the cares of this world as the laymen who ignores those of the next. A combined effort on the part of both would not only make the Mullah recognise the requirements of our mundane existence but also spiritualize the man of the "New Light." The services of Shams-ul-Ulama Maulvi Shibli Nomani in this connection deserve at least a keener interest on the part of the younger Mussalmans—who know the history of Islam mainly through his books and are in many cases his old pupils—in the work which has now almost wholly engaged his great talents for some years.

WE ARE asked to state that the Annual Re-union of the Old Boys of Aligarh takes place on the 6th and 7th April. Among other items of interest are the proposed election of Mr. Syed Sajid Hyder, the brilliant writer of Urdu, as a Trustee of the College on behalf of the Old Boys' Association, and of Mr. Shaukar Ali as Honorary Secretary of the Association which he has done so much to develop. We trust there will be a large gathering of the Old Boys. In view of the share in the administration of the proposed Moslem University which the Old Boys have secured, it is necessary for them to take stock of their position and to revive their declining Association.

THE rapid growth in popularity of the Zamindar, an Urdu journal of the Punjab, has been the outstanding feature of Indian and Journalism during the last year. Before Mr. Zafar Ali Khan, B.A. (Alig.), took up the editorial work, at first at Karamabad, and latterly at Lahore, the circulation of the paper was, we believe, confined to a small number of people either interested in the work and the advocacy of the cause of the zamindars of the Punjab, or personally acquainted with Mr. Zafar Ali Khan's late lamented father. Although even then the paper dealt with general topics also, it did not then carry more weight in a discussion of such questions than provincial vernacular papers generally do. What led to the rapid rise of the paper subsequently is the fact that a very able man, a graduate of Aligarh, and one not only experienced in the management of affairs in more than one province of India, but also in touch with modern culture and politics, and in sympathy with the Islamic world in India and abroad, took up the profession of journalism, which had never attracted such men before, and possessing, in addition to a good knowledge of English, a brilliant style in Urdu prose and a rare facility in Urdu versification, swept his readers off their feet in a remarkably short time. He habituated them to a class of Urdu composition to which they were hitherto complete strangers, at least in newspapers, and after which the ordinary Urdu newspapers tasted insipid and stale. We trust we shall not be misunderstood when we say that if the Zamindar in Mr. Zafar Ali Khan's hand was not as staid and dull as the Paisa Akbar, it had not also the quiet dignity of the Talil. But for several purposes it had a more effective style than any other Moslem journal, and we were sure that a man of the education of Mr. Zafar Ali Khan would use his brilliant gifts for the elevation of his readers. When the Turco-Italian war broke out and the Russo-Persian affairs reached a critical stage, these gifts naturally lent themselves to impassioned writing about the immoral tendencies of European international politics. The Zamindar preached the right of the already converted and its resourcefulness, its excellent translations from English papers—for Mr. Zafar Ali Khan is one of the best translators in the country—its closer acquaintance with Europe and its ways, together with the brilliant style of its compositions in prose and rhyme, made it the ideal paper for these times and increased its already growing circulation. Knowing India as we do, we would not be surprised to find that there was a great deal of truth in Mr. Zafar Ali Khan's assertion that "the professional jealousy" of some brother journalists "could ill brook the phenomenal progress of a rival paper." Add to this the nervous apprehensions of those nice old ladies who often go by the name of "leaders," especially in the sturdy North, who consider a condemnation of Italy as high treason and the expression of doubts about Russian good faith as sedition against the British Government, who would never dream of collecting funds themselves for war sufferers in Tripoli, and would pay a little to others, if their heart bled too much for their suffering co-religionists, on condition that their participation in a humanitarian cause was kept "strictly confidential." The Zamindar says that it has criticised the doings of these so-called leaders in its columns and that its writings "were instrumental in pulling them down from the high pedestals to which they had very little title." We may be sure it has done that only too effectively in the Punjab, and we are even less sorry for the result of its activities in this direction than for the passion it has aroused against Italian and Russian aggressions. Now, the Zamindar suspected that its rivals and the so-called leaders had been doing not a little backbiting, and that the officials, whose knowledge of Indian languages is, with extremely few exceptions, very meagre, were made to believe that the Zamindar had been publishing articles of a dangerous character. One of the cock and bull stories to which it alludes is that, according to one official, he had suggested that the Bible be consigned to the flames. The result is that although, Mr. Zafar Ali Khan tells us, only last December H. H. Sir Louis Dane had shown his approval of the Zamindar's work, early this month a high official is said to have told the Editor that the paper was "in every way objectionable," and now the District Magistrate of Lahore has demanded a security of Rs. 1,000 each for the weekly and the daily editions, and the Additional District Magistrate, of whose manner when warning journalists the Zamindar and other papers had complained, adds an order of his own calling upon Mr. Zafar Ali Khan to explain what he proposes to do. We publish elsewhere the two orders and Mr. Zafar Ali Khan's reply, and shall not deal with the legal aspect of the question at present partly because the latter has himself dealt with it and partly because we do not wish to prejudice the Magistrate who has to deal with the matter in a day or two one way or the other. But it is our plain duty to draw the attention of the Government to one aspect of the matter. What has the Press Act to do with the war in Persia or Russian action in Persia? Are we subjects of His Majesty King George V, Emperor of India, or of King Victor Emmanuel and of the Tsar of All the Russias? Again, does one come under section 124 A. of the Indian Penal Code because one exposes the hollow pretensions of so-called "leaders" and thereby brings "their leaderships" into contempt? The District Magistrate has strangely enough specified no passage of the paper which can even remotely come under the provisions of the Press Act, and this seems to confirm the suspicion that he has based the charge of an objectionable tone and want of moderation on general grounds possibly only hinted at by others. But the term "objectionable" is too vague. What we want to know is the nature of the objection. There are many things which are perfectly legal yet otherwise objectionable, and one of these may be vulgar abuse of Italy or Russia. As for want of moderation, the charge is not clear. Moderation in what? In the absence of a more clear and precise accusation, it seems to us to be just possible that the Magistrate has mixed up his duties as a Magistrate who has to deal with crime with those of a literary critic who has to judge of tone and taste. In all conscience, the Press Laws and the Penal Code are wide enough for any Magistrate who has time on his hand and a desire to use authority. He may well leave tone and taste to the readers and the literary critics, and with the undoubted journalistic jealousies in India he may be sure no paper is going to be spared by its rivals. When we read, as we have occasionally to do for our sins, the taunts and gibes of the Watan and the Zamindar against each other, we confess we have to hold our head down in shame. Only the other day these two papers had formed a Press Association which we too were invited to join. For various reasons it was impossible for us to join it, but we are now glad we did not join, for the quarrels of two of its members supported by a few others would have been an excellent comment on the character and tendencies of the rest also. A movement is afoot among the subscribers of the Zamindar to contribute the whole of the amount demanded as a security, and others too are anxious to show Mr. Zafar Ali Khan their sympathy. We hope this will be unnecessary, but should the Magistrate persist, it is only right and just that the readers who wish the paper to continue should contribute towards its maintenance. The Magistrate's order has not convinced us that his action is justified, and so long as he does not do so, we shall extend to a brother journalist our fullest sympathy and support. We have no desire to obtrude this on public notice, and would have kept the fact that we telegraphed our offer of help to Mr. Zafar Ali Khan wholly to ourselves. But journalists, like others in difficult times, must stand together, for who knows who may be led next from the tumble to the guillotine. If anything that we and other contemporaries write on this subject makes the Lahore Magistrate reconsider his decision, or induces the Punjab Government to intervene when it can do so without sacrificing even official "prestige," we should have done something to help not the Zamindar alone but indirectly ourselves also. We must not fail to express here our appreciation of the action of the Tribune in dealing from time to time and very effectively with the legal aspect of this case. We trust its efforts would prove successful.

A LITTLE book named "Khwab-o Khayal" or "Visions of the Past" was published recently as the "official text book "Vision of the Past." for the examination of Civil and Military Officers by the Higher Standard in Hindustani."

Some of our vernacular contemporaries rightly took exception to certain passages in that part of the book which contains the memoirs of Sita Ram who rose in the first sixty years of the last century from a sepoy to a subedar. In one of these passages Sita Ram spoke disparagingly of Mussalman sepoys who, along with low caste Hindus, were said to be supplying their women as concubines to the European officers of their regiments in order to please the latter and obtain favours, or even to secure bribes through the women. In another the Hindus were extolled at the expense of the Mussalmans. It was asserted that the Hindus would never revolt first, but would join a rebellion afterwards. As for the Mussalmans, the Government was asked never to trust them because they were the originators of every mischief and retained malice against the Government in their hearts. They were compared to the viper which a man had kept in his bed to warm it but which requited the kindness of its benefactor by biting him. Further, it was declared that the creed of the Mussalman taught him to kill every one whom he regarded a Kafir, and assured him of seven admissions into each of seven paradises for each of such murders. There was a good deal more of this mischievous rignmarole, ending with the unique remark that according to the Pundits everybody spoke the truth in India before the Mussalmans came here, and that all evils had been brought into the country by them, crime having been unknown before their mauspicious feet trod on its soil. We sent for this book some time ago, and are thankful to Lieutenant-Colonel Phillott for sending us a complimentary copy. We were informed by the learned Secretary to the Board of Examiners that the book was used as an English text-book in some Indian Schools and that its Urdu translation—for through originally written in Hindi the manuscript specially written for its translator, Colonel Norgate, is not extant, and these memoirs are available only in a few copies of the English translation which are themselves rare—ran as a serial in the Panji Akhbar. It is said that no one has hitherto taken offence at Sita Ram's remarks, and that the opinions of a bigoted and semi-educated Hindu, though interesting as showing the thought of many people of his time, are hardly likely to sway the opinions of men to-day. As a matter of precaution, however, the worst passage in the book had a footnote inserted below it, explaining that "these are of course the ideas of Sita Ram only." It is also mentioned that Sita Ram has made most uncomplimentary remarks about the Government of his time and the mismanagement of the Kabul expedition of 1842 than he has about the Moslems, and that if the English do not cry out, the Muhammadans need not do so. It is stated that the idea that young officers will be influenced against Moslems by the remarks of old Sita Ram is not very complimentary to the intelligence of the officers. We have given our most careful consideration to all these arguments, but we regret to say that they do not convince us that the publication of such a book under official auspices and its selection as an official text-book were well advised. We do not know when and where the book was used as an English text-book in Indian Schools, and had we known of it we would certainly have objected. The Panji Akhbar, as everybody knows, is almost as official as the text-book itself, and none but the Sepoys read it. As for them, their conception of military discipline is such that an objection to anything published in the Panji Akhbar may well have been looked upon as tantamount to sedition. Writings such as those of Sita Ram could easily lead to breaches of the peace, and we are surprised that those responsible for the contents of the Panji Akhbar at all allowed these passages to go in. We have a high enough respect for the intelligence of the military officers, but we also know that when mud is splashed about, some of it also sticks, and that much may stick in the case of officers who come to India at an impressionable period of their life, who seldom read vernacular books other than those prescribed for the language tests by the Board of Examiners and get few opportunities of correcting by personal observation the statements contained in the text books. We attribute no motives whatever to the selection of this book, but we must say that in point of interest too it is not so remarkable as to merit a re-translation from its English translation. In its present form it is highly objectionable and, if we may be permitted to say so, the language of the translation is neither idiomatic and literary nor free from an admixture of words "not used by uneducated Moslems of Delhi, Lucknow, Behar, etc." as is claimed for it in the preface. So far, however, as the objectionable portions of the book are concerned, we are happy to state that they are being pasted out and will not appear in future editions. We hear that the military authorities are not satisfied with the book, and it is quite possible that it may very soon cease to be an official text-book. We regret sufficient forethought was not exercised in the beginning, but in any case, "all's well that ends well."

The Comrade.

The Compulsory Education Debate.

It was by no means a sneering or flippant remark which the Hon. Mr. Clark made in moving an amendment to the Life Assurance Companies' Bill that he would not like to take much of the time of the Council with the arid bones of commercial legislation when there were more stimulating topics to follow. The debate on the Hon. Mr. Gokhale's Bill was indeed stimulating, and although the motion to refer the Bill to a Select Committee has been thrown out, we are confident that in one form or another it would come up again before the Council, and the stimulus which the discussion of a measure of such far-reaching and beneficial character provides would continue and steadily grow.

The Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler was in no way unjust to the advocates of this measure in saying that "the genesis of the Bill was not a spontaneous demand by the people affected by it," and although this point was stretched too far, there is no doubt that the services which Mr. Gokhale has rendered in popularising mass education have been, as Sir Harcourt said, splendid, and that it is he who has "awakened enthusiasm for elementary education in classes which have hitherto been indifferent to its diffusion." Only a decade ago Lord Curzon was afraid of incurring considerable odium for advocating the same cause, because it was generally thought at the time that the man who laid stress on this branch of education ignored the claims of higher education. Four years later, Lord Curzon again insisted on the importance of elementary education, and called it the foundation of the structure of Indian society as compared with the coping-stone of higher education. It is today Mr. Gokhale and the advocates of his Bill have gone "beyond the views of the Government," as the Hon. Mr. Sharpe told the Council, the Government must not feel wrath with so apt a pupil, and India must thank not only Mr. Gokhale but also Lord Curzon. We are even prepared to concede to Sir Harcourt Butler that in the majority of cases the support given to Mr. Gokhale by his countrymen is founded on "a vague desire for progress, based on a statistical comparison of India with other countries," and we are also disposed to agree with Mr. Sharpe that Mr. Gokhale has not only "gone beyond the views of the Government," but also "beyond the views of so many of his countrymen." But as Mr. Sharpe himself rightly added, "a propaganda is seldom effective unless it is advanced," and it is no disparagement to the leadership of Mr. Gokhale if he is marching at the head of his troops and is himself leading the van, while men like the Hon. Sir Gangadhar Chitambar and Mr. Shafi are lagging behind, and men like the Hon. Nawa's Abdul Majid, not to mention the captain of the Tiwari, are sounding a retreat. The discussion of the Bill also disclosed a certain regrettable lack of freedom in the expression of true convictions, and Mr. Gokhale will be amply revenged on some of those who opposed him or who withheld from him their support on account of a timid mistaking of the official reserve for the forces of the enemy. Shelley spoke of a hope "too like fear," but the "fears" of the Member for Education were much akin to "hope," and it does not seem as if it would be long before the rear-guard, the reserve, and the deserters would all march along with the vanguard and the main body of the country's army as willing warriors under the conscript flag of compulsion to crush the general enemy, the illiteracy and ignorance of the masses. But just as in the history of Islam a distinction was made between the Emigrants (Muhajirun), the Succourers (Ansar) and the laggards whose sincerity in entering the faith after the conquest of Mecca remained doubtful (Mulatat-ul-qulub), so too the loud claims of those who hesitate to-day but would be the most clamant and forward to-morrow would be considerably discounted when the victory is achieved. If whole armies then enter the land of Allah, it ought not to be resented if they are called upon to ask forgiveness for their sin of omission, with the assurance that Allah is forgiving. But leaving all these aside, the debate, in spite of the rejection of the motion, would convert many more to Mr. Gokhale's side, and is sure to stimulate a more general enthusiasm for mass education.

Although, as we have explained elsewhere, the position of official members in debates handicaps them not a little and makes a frank expression of their opinion no easy matter, they try nevertheless to meet the criticism of their opponents and are among the few real debaters in the Council. Hence it was that in the debate on the 18th and 19th instant, all real interest in the discussion was centered in the speeches of Sir Harcourt Butler and Mr. Sharpe and the two speeches of Mr. Gokhale, and so far as the question itself is concerned an examination of these four speeches will suffice, though we shall have to deal with other speeches also on a subsequent occasion in discussing some ancillary issues. Mr.

Gokhale had made last year in moving for leave to introduce the Bill a comparison of literacy in British India with other countries and with Baroda and had also quoted comparative statistics to show how much each of them spent on mass education. He had then dealt with the methods they had adopted in banishing illiteracy more or less successfully or in attempting to do so, and had supplied historical parallels for the guidance of India. All this was therefore now unnecessary, and in his opening speech, which was a model of arrangement and proportion, he now dealt with the support and the opposition his Bill had met with during the year, and answered the objections that had been raised against it.

To deal with those points in some detail, Mr. Gokhale was well within his rights and the bounds of modesty in claiming that "the promoters of the Bill"—and we commend this entire absence of personal gratification to those who always deal in the "first person singular," and preface the most meagre argument with Boswellian personal details without even the altruism of the hero worship of Boswell—we say Mr. Gokhale was well within his rights and the bounds of modesty in claiming that "the promoters of the Bill are entitled to regard with the utmost satisfaction the reception which the Bill has met with in this country, for no measure of our time has received such weighty, such enthusiastic and such overwhelming public support as the Bill before the Council." The Hon. the Member for Education may feel justified in claiming that "the majority of non-official opinions are in favour of the Bill but the weight of authority is against the Bill as a practical measure." But, considering the fact that hitherto few measures emanating from the people and opposed by Government were acknowledged to possess even a non-official majority—and the baseless suggestion of Mr. Sharpe that the support of the Moslem League itself is doubtful—shows how officials and sinking men catch at straws—and in view of the fact that the official weights and measures are not the universal standard of the country and are often designed for the occasion, Sir Harcourt's simple assertion is not likely to disturb the convictions of people who think for themselves and do not ask the officials to do their thinking for them. As a matter of fact we can push the battle into the enemy's own quarter, and say that the remarkable support of so many European officials shows not only "a deep and genuine and earnest desire for the welfare of the people," which is entirely true, but is also a better indication of the weight of real official authority than the ominously unanimous opposition of the Local Governments. The contrast is glaring enough to make the world doubt if the "mirror of consciousness" supplied by the Secretariat reflects accurately the truth as known to the "automaton" of the Mofussil Station.

As regards the opposition, Mr. Gokhale's analysis of the feeble non-official dissent was masterly and displays a talent for terse expression and biting sarcasm of which few had hitherto suspected him. There was not the least exaggeration and not a shadow of disrespect in the description of those "elders" whose "minds cast in the mould of a previous generation had not the elasticity to advance with the advancing requirements of the country." Their services to the country as a whole or to their own individual community entitled their dissent to all respect, but it could not also fail to produce great regret. It is only those who can periodically adjust their views by the chronometer of the world's progress that possess the real secret of perpetual youth. A good many elderly men happen to agree at a particular moment with the generality of younger men around them, but in these cases it mostly happens that they were extremists in their own time and, failing to progress, have been only overtaken by the age, just as the sight of myopic men may become normal in old age when that of the average man begins to fail. In dealing with another class of men Mr. Gokhale discovered not the absence of growth, as in the first case, but a congenital defect, the absence of a comprehension of the dignity of man as a man. Such men judge the world from the point of view of the Zemindar's Karnata or the Domestic Servants' Agency, and believe that, like the poor, the ignorant not only are, but also should always be with us. What meaning can the emboling words of our King have for their ears when in the true nobility of his heart and the kingliness of his soul he said, "And it is my wish that the homes of my Indian subjects may be brightened and their labour sweetened by the spread of knowledge with what follows in its train, a higher level of thought, of comfort, and of health?" The sarcasm of Mr. Gokhale was, however, reserved for those that never fail to consult the official weathercock before they declare the direction of the wind. Of this class of the opponents of his Bill he said, "they were against the Bill either because the officials had so much to give, or else because they were so constituted that official favour was to them as the oream of their nostrils and an official frown was a heavy misfortune, and because they thought nothing of bartering the birth-right of their common humanity for something even less substantial than the proverbial mess of pottage." We may be sure all this was said more in sorrow than in anger, for the humiliation of even these men is our own humiliation and their shame our shame. How true the description was, and how many even in a small Council came under the category can be understood from the fact that more than one attempt was made to reject the cap as a misfit, in utter forgetfulness of the Indian proverb that "the abuse of the Bazar applies to him who turns round."

Mr Gokhale was justified in complaining that the opinions of all local bodies had either not been ascertained by Local Governments or had not been forwarded to the Government of India. In view of the fact that if the Bill became law the initiative in regard to its working would have to come from local bodies, it was of the utmost importance to know what the local bodies themselves had to say. Nevertheless it is gratifying to know that of such local bodies as were consulted "an overwhelming majority of Municipalities and a large number amounting to a clear majority of District Boards were in favour of the Bill." All these cannot be disposed of as lightly as Sir Harcourt Butler tried to do. If Mr. Gokhale "had to stump the country hard to do it," it must be remembered that even so autocratic a Viceroy as Lord Curzon tried to do the same about the Partition of Africa. Mr. Gokhale is one of the people and the people cannot be faced by him with "accomplished facts" buttressed by "irrevocable words." It may be that some of these local bodies which now favour the Bill may not screw their courage to the sticking point and fail Mr. Gokhale when a res has to be levied. But there is no reason at present to regard these blown surmises as axioms and compare the prestige of a publicist with that of a seventeenth century Political whose administrative proposals to "Purbars" receive the customary meed of "warm approval" in words and cold neglect in action. As for the three tailors of Tooley Street, after all they claimed to be only "the citizens of Great Britain"—which was a fact while Sir Harcourt's vast experience in aristocratic rather than sartorial circles in India must have brought him into close touch with a Taluqdarism that claims the "natural leadership" of British India. If we could be assured that in Sir Harcourt's estimation the number of acres did not make a wisacre, and that aristocratic resolutions were always duly discounted, we would readily re-adjust the values of humbler resolutions. We are still more surprised at the sneering reference of the Hon. Mr. Shafi to public meetings and "how resolutions are obtained in them." Had his own reputation among officials as well as his own people been less dependent than it is upon the resolutions obtained in the usual manner in public meetings the reference would have been helpful. As it is, it is a double-edged sword, and the edge that is turned towards him is perhaps the sharper of the two.

We now come to the official opinions. We are prepared to go ever further than Mr. Gokhale, who said that "considering the distrust of education largely prevalent among European officers in the country, the proportion of those who had favoured the Bill was by no means unsatisfactory." We consider the support of 51 European officials out of 160, or 30 per cent. far more satisfactory than the support of 39 Indian officials out of 115. We do not know what status each of these 65 has in the administration, nor whether he falls in the first, second or third circle of Mr. Gokhale's inferno. But the independence of European officials can hardly be questioned, and it is a happy sign of the times and a precursor of better relations between European officials and the Indian subjects of His Majesty that 30 per cent. of them can support the principle of compulsion in education in spite of the official distrust of education and the alleged dangers of compulsion in the case of a foreign Government. It is still more hopeful that more than one Director of Public Instruction favours the principle of the Bill, though this support is to some extent counterbalanced by the cynical disbelief in mass education expressed by an Inspector of Schools. Mr. Gokhale rightly suggests that "the least that a kind Government could do to him was to transfer him to a more congenial Department, say, the Forest." He groups official opponents of the Bill under three heads, the R. P. Van Winkles and cynics, those who were opposed to all popular progress, believing that "every step gained by the people was one lost by them"; and lastly the critics of the Bill on its merits. This is a fair classification, and while we are prepared to admit the bona fides of the last group, we must not be asked to certify that no official is guided by considerations of official prestige in determining issues submitted to him. The officials have neither the wings of angels nor the cloven hoofs of devils. They are men, and with most of the virtues and also some of the weaknesses of men whose circumstances and their own insularity have made a much too exclusive caste. If non-official approval is of any value to the officials, it must be discriminating, and when the officials and we ourselves question the motives of some of our countrymen who perpetually criticise the Government, nobody should be shocked if some officials are suspected of the conscious and the unconscious bias of the caste. We reserve a consideration in some detail of the unanimous opposition of the Local Governments for another occasion, and will only say here that this strange disparity between the support of 30 per cent. European officials and the opposition of all the provincial satraps either suggests the working of some political suspicion in the minds of the latter, or their shedding all enthusiasm and the vitality to deal with an altered set of circumstances.

But before we deal with Mr. Gokhale's reply to the objections raised before the debate, it would be better to determine to what extent he was right in dealing in what Sir Harcourt Butler calls transmarine analogies and in asking whether the British Government is content to lag behind Baroda. Sir Harcourt's contention that in England compulsory provision of schools preceded the introduction of compulsory attendance by 6 or 10 years was rebutted by Mr. Gokhale, who pointed out that the Act of 1870 which provided for compulsory educational facilities also empowered local authorities to frame bye-laws for compelling the attendance of children at school. In other words, compulsion became permissive for local bodies in 1870 and obligatory 6 or 10 years later. His Bill too wants it to become permissive and not obligatory, and it is surprising that the educational experts who refer to the professional point of view so obtrusively had forgotten so important a detail of the Act of 1870. Sir Harcourt's second point about the difference between Indian conditions and English, namely, the fact that Primary Schools were mainly staffed by women, there being 111,000 women to only 35,000 men—an argument which seems to have found peculiar favour with the non-official opponents of the Bill representing the Central Provinces—is partly answered by the fact that proportionately there is a larger female population in England than in India, and partly by the fact that the least efficient teachers in England are the women who are often untrained. As regards Japan, it is astonishing that Sir Harcourt should think of comparing India to the Japan of to-day, stating that there education is so generally advanced and respected that compulsion is in fact not required or enforced and the teachers are paid about six times as much as in India. The India of to-day should rather be compared with the Japan before the Imperial rescript of 1872. As regards the Philippines, what purpose it was intended to serve by mentioning that education is not compulsory is not clear, because Mr. Gokhale had himself stated with commendable precision that although the State had not yet made it so, many Municipalities had issued local ordinances making education compulsory. What was the result? They achieved a school attendance of 6 lakhs of children out of a population of 75 lakhs in 13 years as against less than 7 lakhs in the Bombay Presidency out of 250 lakhs after 66 years. Does it help the Government at all to refer to "the financial strain of a too rapid extension of cheap education" when in a period five times as large the best province of British India has done only a third as well as the Philippines? Mr. Gokhale does not suggest that the development of India should be as rapid as that of the Philippines, but it would never do to add another 115 years to the century of British rule that has already passed away in order to achieve what the Philippines did in 13 years. As for Ceylon, the only difference between it and Southern India that Sir Harcourt Butler could point out was that 60 per cent. of the Ceylonese were Buddhists and had no caste. Surely in India too there are places where 60 per cent. of the inhabitants are of one caste and creed. It would be well to point this out when it is intended to apply compulsion to such places. We shall deal next week with the question of Baroda, and also reserve our comments on Mr. Gokhale's reply to the objections raised before the debate and during it for the next issue. But so far as "transmarine analogies" go, Sir Harcourt Butler has failed to convince us that compulsion is like "the fur coat of Canada," impossible for the climatic conditions of the Deccan and the rest of India.

Crete.

Those who never tire of lecturing Moslem Turkey on the evils of "Turkification" and the alleged inequality in the treatment of her Christian and Moslem subjects will probably find it inconvenient to explain the "Greecefication" of Crete and the barbarous treatment meted out by the Christian vassals of Turkey to the Moslem minority in that island. Since 1669 the island of Crete has been a part of the Ottoman Empire, but as Turkey grew weak and Christian Europe came to the assistance of Greece between 1821 and 1829, the Cretans found sufficient inducement to carry on a perpetual insurrection against the Ottoman authorities which lasted for some 70 years. The Cretan problem was at the bottom of the war which Greece declared against Turkey towards the end of that period. Had Greece been victorious Crete was certain to have become an integral part of that kingdom, but once more the best laid schemes of men and men proved futile and Athens was rescued from the Turks by the intervention of the Concert of Europe. The Most Christian Powers which forced Turkey to give up the fruits of her well-earned victory also intervened to provide for the "better" government of Crete.

In 1898, Russia, France, Italy and Great Britain constituted the Island, with the adjacent islets, an autonomous state under a High Commissioner of the Powers, and all that Turkey got for her victory over Greece was an empty suzerainty bereft even of a monetary tribute. But in appointing the High Commissioner the Powers once more helped Greece and its King, who was related to most of the important reigning families of Europe by the ties of his sisters' marriages. His second son, Prince George, was appointed the first High Commissioner of Crete, and during the years between 1898 and 1906 proved himself to be as incompetent as an administrator as he had proved as a warrior in the Greco-Turkish War.

When Prince George disappeared from the scene a worse thing happened. Since August 14, 1906, the Powers recognised the right of the King of the Hellenes to propose the High Commissioner, for Crete and Greek officers were handed over the direction of the Gendarmerie and Militia. Had not the Young Turks altered the internal situation in Turkey soon after, Crete would no doubt have by now been annexed to Greece. But even the revolution has not succeeded in doing more than stopping the progress of Crete in the direction of Greece. The Young Turks now demand the rectification of the anomalous condition of the Island, while the Cretans themselves are for its annexation to Greece. The Powers await a favorable opportunity for settling things, but the Cretans fear that with delay the Young Turks would be too strong for them and Greece and the supporters of the two in Europe, and have consequently tried more than once to force their own solution on their supporters. With a view to do this, they once more annexed the Island to Greece and elected Cretan Deputies to the Chamber at Athens. These Deputies were prevented from taking their seats in the Chamber by the artifice of a quarantine and were conveyed back thereafter to Crete, and now the Cretans have revenged themselves for this on the Moslem population of the Island.

According to the Census of 1900, the Island, which is about 160 miles long and from 7 to 35 miles broad, was inhabited by a population of 310,000, of which 270,000 were Christians and 33,500 or a little more than a fourth were Mussalmans. What effect the action of the Powers in giving autonomy to Crete has had on the Mussalmans can be judged from the fact that the Moslem population of Crete which was 88,000 in 1895 had sunk to 40,000 in 1907. In the next three years another 6,500 were expatriated or died, and by this time the Moslem population is probably no more than a fourth of what it was twenty years ago. In spite of all this the Powers have been granting more extensive powers to the Cretan administration, and all the troops of the Powers were withdrawn by July 1909. Moslem protests notwithstanding. When the Mussalmans complained of continuous ill-treatment, having for its object their complete expatriation, Sir Edward Grey, in answer to a question in Parliament, declared the complaints to be exaggerated. However, the loss to the Island in wealth exported and land going out of cultivation has in some measure punished its Christian population. The financial situation has been far from satisfactory. The Christians of the Island have not been able to develop agriculture though Mussalmans have been turned out of the land. They lack industrious habits and find their true métier in political agitation.

Even the remaining Mussalmans are a thorn in the side of the Christians, and the Athenian correspondents of the Times wired on the 26th February that "owing to the assassinations of Moslem peasants in the Retimo district at the beginning of the month the rural population began to take refuge in the towns," but that just as confidence was being restored three other Moslems were murdered in a village near Canea. This was not enough for the Cretan pots of the Most Christian Powers, for we hear that "their bodies were brought into Canea to-day, followed by a number of Moslems, and the sight of the funeral procession appears to have exasperated the Christians. Gendarmes appeared on the scene and a conflict ensued, resulting in the death of another Moslem." When alive the Moslem is a source of worry to the Christians of Crete, and when dead he exasperates them. What middle state can the Moslem find then between life and death which would leave the Christians happy and satisfied? Writing two days later the same correspondent says Much anxiety is felt in responsible quarters here with regard to possible developments. The election in Greece took place on March 24 and should the Powers meantime proceed to the occupation of Crete every effort will be made by the Opposition group to profit by their action in order to discredit the Government of M. Venizelos and to proclaim the failure of all Cretan policy. It is further doubted whether occupation of the island will effectively prevent the despatch of the Cretan Deputies to Athens, whose efforts to enter the Chamber may furnish unscrupulous politicians here with the wished-for opportunity of provoking popular manifestations and of upsetting the Government. It is hoped that an arrangement, which while safeguarding Turkish supremacy, will enable the Cretans to fulfil their desire of representation in the Greek Chamber, will even now be considered by the Powers, however unwilling they may be to make any concession to Cretan turbulence at the present moment.

This is indeed characteristic of a Times correspondent. We had referred you now to the search of a middle state between life and death as if the quest would be futile. Yet here is another middle state equally absurd which is suggested in all seriousness by this limb of the Times, the election of representatives of Crete to the Greek Chamber "while safeguarding Turkish suzerainty." The news of these assassinations, coupled with the fact that though a massacre was avoided with great difficulty, the shops of the Mussalmans were still closed, led to the despatch of H.M.'s cruiser Lancaster from Malta to Crete, and according to the Paris correspondent of the Times, it seems that the news from Crete was considered by the French Government "sufficiently disquieting to warrant the despatch of two more armoured cruisers—the Waldeck-Rousseau and the Ernest Renan—to join the Edgar Quinet in the Suda Bay." Russia has also been invited to join, though "in the special circumstances" Italy can do no more than "sympathise with the objects of the demonstration." But mark the mild admonition, the clear encouragement to Cretan hopes and the motive of the action. The Paris correspondent of the Times writes:—

The revival of what appears to be premeditated attacks on Mussalmans in the island has compelled the Powers to inform the Cretan authorities that if they are unable to maintain public order steps will forthwith be taken to secure peace in a manner which may not prove favourable to Cretan aspirations. The Powers are determined that no agitation in Crete shall be allowed to furnish Turkey with a pretext for attempting to win military successes in Europe.

Oh, the Unspeakable Turk and the Most Christian Powers of Europe! Well may Mr Sidney Low ask in the Fortnightly Review if all this is going to convince a disciple of Buddha, or Confucius or Mohammed "that Christianity leads to a higher standard of personal and national ethics, that the individual Christian is a better man than the adherent of any Asiatic form of religion, and that the Christian nations are imbued with a more austere morality, a deeper sense of law, a larger idea of justice and mercy, and a greater reluctance to employ force in order to overpower the weak and oppress the helpless." Only a week before these happenings in Crete, Mr Denys Cochin, the Academician and Deputy for Paris, declared with the approval of M. Clemenceau, both of whom had been addressed a letter by the Cretan Deputies who were detained on board a French warship in Suda Bay after their attempt to proceed to Athens, that "the Cretan question would be solved if Greece were as strong as Austria or Italy, or if Suda Bay were not so strongly coveted." He pleads for "a more sympathetic understanding of the Cretans whom he describes as loyal to their country gallant and sensible." If the crimes of a Christian are virtues and the virtues of a Moslem his worst crime then we have little to hope from Christian Europe. "They have, in fact," says Mr Sidney Low, "asserted the claim of the strong to prey upon the weak, and the utter impotence of all ethical considerations in the face of armed force with a crude nakedness which few Eastern military conquerors could well have surpassed." But even if we do not complain of this ignoring of the might of right, surely there is some ground for complaint in refusing to the Moslem nations even the right of might.

The Council.

By THE HON. MR. GUJ

"As large a charter as the wind to blow on whom I please"

—As You Like It

February 26th (contd.)

When the great Burly Raja had finished his pronouncement, up rose the shy figure of Cheery Chitnis, and he need not have drawn attention to the contrast between the two personalities by prefacing his remarks with the phrase, "unlike the Burly Raja, I realize," etc., etc. He realized the hardships of that cultured class of people who are "firm in the faith of their forefathers" but terribly shaky about all that the faith enjoins them to do. The Council heard with a sympathetic laugh the frank confession of Cheery Chitnis that "personally I like intermarriage." Oh, these ladies of Bengal! They had catballed the bright little representative of the Orange State also, not to mention more south-westerly regions. By the way, it must be very consoling to Cheery Chitnis with his few many inches that "elevating influences are operating to produce the desired result." He may be sure that a foot or two more and Reggie would see to it that "the present restrictions to marriage are removed by a special enactment exclusive to Cheery Chitnis. Who that ever saw him seeking inspiration in a face opposite to him this session would want to be told that Cheery Chitnis is fond of "the lines of least resistance." What he needs is the hand of an Eastern maiden with "the lines of least resistance" well developed to match his own.

In inverse relation to the general belief, it was Reggie who now followed Cheery Chitnis. Declared one of two conditions absolutely necessary before Government could legislate. Either existing marriage laws should constitute an outrage on the fundamental laws of humanity or an overwhelming majority should ask for reform. But existing marriages were not outrages and the overwhelming majority happens to be on the wrong side. And after all there are still too many people who could marry one another without the Bill but did not. Rather thoughtful this of Reggie and deserving of the gratitude of Indian spinsterhood.

Sobraon, the Pantaloon, who had last year been shocked by the all-embracing character of the Bill under which "everybody could marry everybody else," now found that there was no chance for Bhupen Babu's matrimonial enterprise after Reggie's forbidding the banns, and thought to himself what harm could it do if he now showered his sympathy on the baffled Bhupen. So wholly belied his description as the "sturdy champion of Orthodoxy in the South" and did not oppose the motion. Only declared that the present Bill bristled with more difficulties than the chin of Bhupen with the grey, hirsute growth of declining years.

The Khan Bahadur was more sympathetic but less supporting. Referred to "the well-known case" of Rani Bhagwan Kaur, the civil case, not the criminal. Approvingly mentioned that the Arya Samaj had already solved the matrimonial problem in its customary fashion of Kandamo Shud. As in the case of Niyoga, this go-ahead community acted according to its own impulses and left the lazy sons of law to settle the legality of it. The Khan Bahadur of Baghbanpura is something of an expert in horticulture, but he liked the wild growth of matrimonial usages "in preference to the hot-house growth manured by legislative action." The conservatory is indeed too often the battle-field of such conquests, but it was rather unkind of the Khan Bahadur to characterize the Legislative Department as a dung heap.

While the Khan Bahadur was making his great speech, punctuated by acrobatic jerks of his slender waist, Beethoven, with a soul full of music, marked time with the official blue pencil like an orchestra conductor.

The Moslem Dowager trod in the footsteps of the Khan Bahadur, and while showing unmistakable glimpses of sympathy towards "idolaters" and "idolatreesses" in preference to "servants" and "maid servants" and playing a little with "hell-fire", with held his support. He had listened to Bhupen Babu's speech with much interest, and the interest in his case was of many kinds. An Indian first, a Moslem afterwards, he was the Law Member of the Government foremost. But rather strange that even as a Muhammadan the Moslem Dowager takes interest, forgetting the prohibition of riba. Although no more a counsel himself, the Dowager is still jealous of a solicitor poaching on the preserves he has deserted. "There was a very able counsel who was advancing every possible point that he could in support of his case, and yet behind it all he knew that he had a very weak one, and that it was not likely to be decided in his favour." Praised the earnestness of Bhupen Babu but on second thoughts and specially in consideration of long acquaintance with the caste, withheld the testimonial of his sobriety. After explaining the conflict between the Bill and the Christian Marriage Act, and the provisions of the Quran against inter-marriages with mushrikeen, turned to the Hindu law and its essential features. "It may be urged that an advanced Indian may think—what does it matter if a certain fire is not lit; what does it matter if an oblation of ghee is not poured on the fire; what good is there in making an appeal to an imaginary being like Agni? That is all very well for the advanced Indian to say." Perhaps the unadvanced could ask if it also did not matter whether the fire of Prem is not lit, if the oblation of fiery liquids such as champagne is not poured on the dying flame of attraction and what good is there in making an appeal to a still more imaginary thing called Love? After all Bhupen Babu was cutting the first sod, and knows that he has a very long journey before him till he reaches the destination of an India united on Nationalistic lines. Didn't know if he was a Nationalist or not. But if he was, he was an honour to that community and that creed. And this high praise ought to be enough as a first instalment of his support. The Dowager knew that even if the Bill was rejected by him, it won't be the last that the Council would hear of it. Bhupen would come to the charge again, and if it happened when some other Hon. Member had the Law Portfolio, who knows the Moslem

Dowager may not forget all about hell-fire or quench it in the deluge that is always welcome "after us."

The Bombay Duck said that "Equity in the strict sense of the word is in favour of the measure." But he forgot that Equity, in the strict sense of the word or otherwise, had no Hon. Member in charge of it and Law had. Asked that if Moslem Law had previously been abrogated it should be abrogated once more, and showed his intimate acquaintance with the spirit of Moslem Law by laying it down as an indisputable point that children of a Moslem by a Hindu wife would succeed to him according to his personal law, the Muhammadan Law, which he had already defied in the matter of matrimony. In conclusion appealed on behalf of the man who wants to have the rules of his matrimonial contract governed by "the most civilized standard," forgetting that "the most civilized standard" regarded the matrimonial contract itself as obsolete, old-fashioned and uncivilized. He asked why Government should ignore the claim of this class on account of the disavowal of the masses. "Here, at least, you have a very strong minority (Longfellow looks at his burps approvingly)—an intellectual minority (Longfellow taps his brains as one may doubtfully tap a barometer in an English April)—supporting this measure." Thereupon all who wished to be classed as "intellectuals" cheered and the Bombay Duck quietly went under water.

The Nawab of Jaunpur said that an evil spirit had taken possession of many members in the Council and tried his best to enchant away that evil spirit—the Spirit of Reform.

Mud Holkar pointed out that the marriages of high caste Hindu women with men of lower castes were not illegal according to Hindu Law but were merely "discountenanced in the same way as misalliances among Western peoples." Surely 'twould be an insult to place a romantic elopement of Bhupen Babu with a fair Brahmin maid on the same footing as the mesalliance of an English lady with her chauffeur. Mud Holkar is the great custodian of the prestige of Indian politicians against the attacks of Indian Ministers of the Crown. Last year had come down heavily on the Moslem Dowager for talking of "the gentlemen opposite." This time read a sinister meaning into his reference to Indian Nationalism. Showed his readiness to swear before a multitude of J. P.'s that he and his friends who supported the Bill had nothing to do with so horrid a thing as the unification of India on nationalistic lines. It is true that "the first rod has now been broken," but not for those awful, unthinkable, unmentionable reasons, the "political reasons."

While Mud Holkar went on minimising the importance of customs singularly ("As there has been customs," etc.) and magnifying the feelings of his supporters ("Causing innumerable anxiety," etc.) Hooda Sahab read on the report of one of his numerous Committees, and coming good fortunes cast their shadow in front, inasmuch as Sir Orator Meston corrected the proofs of the Budget. In the Visitors' gallery the two arms of Law, the one that made and the one that applied it, were joined, for the Hon Moslem Dowager sat side by side with his judicial brother.

The Sword of Alt was unsheathed for once but only for a little while. Hooda was short but emphatic and spared not the feelings of the "intellectual minority." If at any time he could not represent the views of those through whose indulgence he found himself in the Council, he felt it to be his duty to give them an opportunity of sending another representative. If the "intellectual minority" said "take our opinion, we shall think for them," it may become necessary to close the Council and let the officials think for all. Bhupen Babu wants to satisfy the peculiar sentiments of certain people, and this sentiment has appealed so strongly to Bombay Duck that he would abrogate Moslem Law to satisfy the yearning of his heart. But then why sail under false colours? "There is a great deal of hypocrisy in the world, especially in matters of religion, and I do not feel that we are called upon to give it legislative sanction. If this is the frame of mind in which interference with the religion of Muhammadans is looked upon by the Bombay Duck, I think that he does not represent the wishes of his constituency. As many Bombay Ducks in the sea as out of it, eh?"

The white robed Pandit and his brothers the Mussalmans generally went this time ranged on the same side. He promised a short speech as the pronouncement of Reggie had made it "unnecessary to discuss it at the length at which it would have been necessary to do so in the absence of such a pronouncement," and when it came to performance he took more than a solid half-hour. One felt glad that the pronouncement had been made, for a while might siting was otherwise in store for the Council. Forgetting that even the 5,504 Brahmos were not despised when it came to the taking of Census, excluded the handful from the Hindu religion and found their declaration of separation necessary. Described with evident approval the wide field of choice in the ancient days for a Brahmin in search of spouses, and elaborated a Warrant of Precedence in which a Vaishya wife of a polygamous Brahmin stood to his Brahmin wife in the relation of a Director-General to a Home Member, and talked of the "disagreeable distinctions and hearburnings" which found an echo of sympathy in the bosoms of General Post and St. Luke. It was this consideration which had led to the abolition of inter-caste marriages "in recent time—it may be 2,000 or 3,000 years ago." Clearly the Pandit is up-to-date. Referred to "my humble brother, the sweeper," whose purity of blood would be destroyed and whose progeny defiled by marrying a Kulin or Kayasth bride. No Mussalman could therefore take objection to the Pandit's remark that the marriages of Rajput princesses to Moghal Emperors did not commend themselves to the Hindus. Lightly passed over "the overpowering pressure of the unfavourable circumstances in which they found themselves" under Moslem rule. From his "humble brother, the sweeper," turned to his "hon brother, the sweeper," who "does not feel any difficulty in sweeping aside any of the objections which have been raised," and concluded one of the most closely reasoned and moderate speeches ever delivered in the Council in spite of the "impertinent" provocation to which he referred.

The Hon Longfellow rose in the height of rectitude and temper, and after expressing surprise at a Law Member committing the inconceivable crime of agreeing with the Government had a mighty fling at the "semi-official view" of Hooda. But while guarding himself from a possible misapprehension allowed himself to fall into one that was certain. "I should like to guard myself from one misapprehension, and that is that the views that I am giving expression to are my personal views." Is that a misapprehension, and if so whose were the views? However, let us "take it as read"—rather "as meant"—and proceed. "I know that my community does not share my views. It is not yet educated enough for that." Here is a sample of the self-satisfaction of Modern Behar,—first the praise of his own honesty and next the confession of his community's lack of education. Modesty, thy height is 6 feet 6 inches! Hon. Longfellow found occasion to praise the eminent Moslem jurist, the Right Hon. Mr. Ameer Ali, and for once agreed with him for the good reason—the best reason of all—that Mr. Ameer Ali agreed with him. Let the eminent Moslem jurist beware. He would disagree with Longfellow in future at the eminent peril of his juristic eminence. The king-maker can unmake kings as easily as he can make them. For the present Hon Longfellow has made him by Special Appointment his Sole Leader. "I refuse to follow others, however eminent they be." One thing particularly good about Hon Longfellow. There is no mistaking his meaning. He argues this wise. If the Bill is in conformity with Moslem Law, Government should support. If against it, he would be the last to advocate it. It is undoubtedly in conformity with Moslem Law, for he and Mr. Ameer Ali say that Mussalmans can marry Hindu women and Akbar did it, and even if the Bill was passed, who would ever think of giving a Moslem girl in marriage to a Hindu? Do you say, in that case the Bill is superfluous? But do not forget that a single bridegroom does not make a wedding. Imitate not the absent-minded bridegroom who came to the church with best man and wedding ring, clergyman and all, but had forgotten to propose to a girl and be accepted by her. And if you remember that a bride is equally necessary, you can forget if you like that Hon Longfellow would not advocate the passage of the Bill if not in conformity with Moslem Law and as a good Behari should not advocate it if it conflicts with Hindu Law. As for Roland Wilson, what does he know? Has he read "the great histories written in the Persian language" which are too numerous to name? No; Moslem Law allows the marriage of Moslems not only with Christian and Jewish women, but also with free-thinkers and Zoroastrians, and Dashing Boy should note that Moslem affections not confined to Jodhba but may travel in the direction of the spectacled, badminton playing, Home-Sweet-Home-singing Reshmiba as well. But there was another consideration which induced Hon. Longfellow to accord Bhupen Babu his emphatic support. Islamic countries throughout the world in a state of general stagnation. "My community has ceased to produce liberal thinkers. We have reached the senith of our degradation." All that is needed is intermarriage and little Abu Hanifas and tiny Ghazalis would soon litter up the domestic floors of the intermarried couples. Would not that be the nadir of Longfellow's elevation? Prophesied the approaching millennium "in the precincts of the renana," and the coming of Christabel Pankhursts demanding the rights "given to them by God and nature but denied to them by man in India." Wonder whether their war-cry would be "Votes for women" or "Mixed wives for men." As a parting shot, denounced the views of Hooda on representation. Once having scrambled in, "I do not like to resign my seat and give opportunity to people like Hooda with the rusty conservative views of 2,000 years ago." Shabash, Modern Behar. "Shovanallah, Shovanallah" as the Patrika would say.

Late in the day, the Mild Hindu came in with a reasonable appeal, but as Cheery Chutnis had said, "ignorant conservatism was deaf to reason." Even the Brahmos were not permitted to be something positive instead of a bundle of negations. The Council then adjourned for dinner and breakfast, for it was past six.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

Italy replied to the Powers' enquiry as to the terms on which she would accept friendly mediation, and has stated her terms.

The Aden correspondent of the Times of India, writing on 10th March says that the Mahdi, of Asir is now investing the Turkish port of Meedi which lies about two days from Hodeida and is garrisoned by some 200 Turkish troops. The Mahdi is reported to have sent in an ultimatum to the Turkish garrison asking them to evacuate the port or surrender, but as the Turks refused to comply with the request the Mahdi has despatched a force of several thousands to besiege and take the port.

According to private letters received by a native dhow from the Red Sea, the Mahdi's supporters have captured Meedi. It is rumoured that the Mahdi is intending to march against Lohia and other Turkish ports.

Advices state that General Saeed Facha, who has recently left Hodeida with a force of Turkish troops, has reached Azzohra, which is some hours away from the Turkish port of Lohia. It is expected that the General will advance from Azzohra with several battalions of Turkish troops, equipped with quick-firing guns, against the Mahdi and drive him out of Meedi.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on the 18th that it is understood that Italy's reply to the enquiries from the Powers suggests that Turkey will not be called upon to recognise the annexation of Tripoli, but that Turkish troops shall be withdrawn from Northern Africa. It is considered certain that the Porte will not accede to the proposals.

The Porte has received assurances that the Powers do not intend, as rumoured, to bring energetic pressure to bear for the purpose of ending the war, nor do they intend to depart from their policy of strict neutrality.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Rome, February 23

The Bill ratifying the decree for the annexation of Tripoli was discussed to day before an unusually full Chamber, 472 Deputies being present. The temper of the House warily permitted hostile comment.

Baron Sonnino, in a coldly impartial speech, while reserving for later discussion the responsibility of the Government in regard to its defective diplomatic and military preparations, announced the consent of his party to complete the annexation.

Signor Bissolati, Socialist, made a moderate speech in which, while deprecating the enterprises in Tripoli, declared his unwillingness to dissociate himself from the voice of the country.

Signor Cicotti, the only Radical speaker, entirely hostile, gave as his opinion that a costly war would result in Italy's becoming a simple appendix to Tripoli.

The Chamber refused to hear Signor Turati, the leader of the Socialist majority, who was practically shouted down.

Rome, February 27

Signor Giolitti, the Premier, winding up the debate on the Annexation Bill, said he agreed with Baron Sonnino that that day's vote should not be regarded as signifying political confidence in the Government. The matter was a much more lofty one, as it touched the supreme interests of the country. The example of all civilized countries proved that the colonial problem made itself felt as a supreme necessity. He wished with all his heart that there were no wars other than colonial wars, which were wars of civilization. Signor Giolitti then proceeded to give the true reasons which determined him and his colleagues in the Cabinet to enter on their enterprise, not through enthusiasm, but with calm reflection and conviction, as a really national necessity in order to avoid very grave dangers which in a short time they would have had to deplore. Italy could never have tolerated the occupation of Tripoli, her steadfast goal by others, and further delay might have led to terrible conflicts. Italy, he said, could not consent to Turkish sovereignty continuing over Tripoli. In order to dispel all illusions, to demonstrate that the country was determined at all price to refuse any compromise, and so that friends, allies, and foes might know the point beyond which Italy could not go in her concessions, the decree was an absolute necessity. (Loud and prolonged applause.)

The Chamber then voted by secret ballot on the Bill, and adopted it by 423 votes to 9.—(Reuter.)

It was announced in the Times that representations had been made by the Egyptian Government to the Italian Government on the question of the recruiting of troops in Eritrea for employment in Tripoli. There is reason to believe that the view taken by the Italian Government of its rights in the matter is supported by the British Government.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Rome, February 25.

The Italian Government has no reason to regret its appeal to Parliament. Out of an unusually full Chamber of 470 Deputies 431 voted for the Tripoli Annexation Bill. In the Senate yesterday all the members present, 222 in number, including the Dukes of Aosta and Genoa, voted for the measure unanimously. The intervention in debate of two members of the Royal Family added not a little both to the solemnity of the occasion and to the warmth of the patriotic demonstration made by the Upper House.

A Stefani Agency telegram announces that the officer commanding the Italian blockading squadron in the Red Sea has permitted the approach to Hodeidah of the Messageries Maritimes steamer Armand Ribu which embarked and brought away from that port 31 Europeans and six Somalis, French subjects. No opposition was offered by the Turkish authorities.

Letters received from Yemen announce that the Imam Yahya remains on good terms with the local authorities and will co-operate with them against Syed Idris of Assyr, who is said to have received two machine guns and a large amount of ammunition from the Italians and to be contemplating an advance into Hedjaz. The Turkish garrison of the province has suffered rather severely from fever and dysentery, it having become necessary to station a considerable number of units on the unhealthy coast of the Red Sea to prevent smuggling and to protect the coast towns from an Italian raid.

We have received a copy of a memorandum, issued by the Italian Foreign Office, which gives in detail the evidence supplied by the military authorities in Tripoli of the atrocities alleged against the Arabs in the actions of 23rd and 26th October. The evidence is supplemented with photographs, and some reasons are given for the belief that dum-dum bullets have been used against the Italian troops.

The main evidence was summarized in a telegram despatched by our correspondent in Tripoli after a visit to El Henni, the scene of the atrocities of 23rd October and published in the Times of 30th November.

Constantinople, February 27.

An Italian warship was sighted off Mersina, in Asiatic Turkey, yesterday. She intercepted an Austrian Lloyd steamer conveying material destined for the Baghdad Railway, but, after examining the vessel, allowed her to proceed.

The Council of Ministers to day discussed the question of how to deal with the property and other effects of Italians, whose expulsion from Palestine and Syria has already been decreed. The Council has also decided to expel the Italians from the Lebanon region.—(Reuter.)

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Rome, February 28.

GENERAL REISOLI, commanding at Homs, telegraphs that yesterday morning at 7 o'clock the Italian troops occupied the heights of Mercheli, putting to flight the Turkish and Arab forces after sharp fighting. The enemy suffered heavy losses, and the bodies of many Turkish regulars were found on the field. Among others, the killed included a Turkish captain and an Arab chief, the brother of the Turkish Deputy for Mesellata. The Italians lost 11 killed and 82 wounded.

February 26.

The Bill introduced in the Chamber last Saturday, authorizing the extraordinary expenditure made on behalf of the expedition to Tripoli, deals with a total sum of little over £8,000,000. Of this nearly £4,000,000 goes to defray the cost of the expeditionary corps from the end of last September to the end of this month of February, five months in all, it includes the transport of troops and stores of every kind from food and clothing to aeroplanes, and the actual maintenance of the troops in Tripoli. The value of material of all kinds which, removed to Tripoli, has had to be replaced in Italy is estimated at £1,680,000. The increased naval expenditure involved by the expedition is estimated at £1,200,000. Another sum of £800,000 will be necessary to complete the restoration of material removed to the seat of war. And, finally, £600,000 is already engaged for the purchase of animals, mules, camels, and other accessories necessary for the formation of the new colonial corps. The total sum of £8,000,000 will be provided for by the Treasury balance, June, 1911, of £2,280,000; by the balance expected on the Budget of 1911-12; and the remainder will be distributed in six equal portions over the Budgets from 1912 to 1918.

Rome, February 20.

The engagement at Margheb on Tuesday was one of the most hotly contested in the campaign. It is calculated that at least 5,000 of the enemy took part in the fight, and that probably more than 500 of these were killed. The Italian casualties were 14 killed, including two officers, and 100 wounded, including 11 officers. A good deal of hand-to-hand fighting took place, in which the Italian troops, especially the Alpini, displayed admirable dash and tenacity. More than one attempt was made yesterday to recapture the position, but the enemy were always easily repulsed, and the post is now furnished with artillery for its defence. The result of the operation will be to free Homs from the incessant and harassing attacks made upon it from that quarter.

Intervention.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, February 23.

The French Press comments favourably on the unanimity displayed at yesterday's sitting of the Italian Chamber. The action of a number of Socialists and advanced Radicals in voting with the Government is considered to be sufficient proof that the nation as a whole is determined on the prosecution of the war. The Temps says that Italy has been the gainer by the improved condition of international affairs. Her relations with Austria-Hungary have become more cordial, there is a better understanding between Vienna and St. Petersburg, and quarrels between England and Germany have already resulted in creating a salutary détente between those two countries. The Italian Government, therefore, stands in a better position either for inspiring Turkey with a desire for peace or for prosecuting the war with less fear of intervention on the part of Europe.

Vienna, February 23.

The Italian support of Syed Idris, the visit of Maitre Salem to Rome "on business," the unanimous enthusiasm of the Italian Chamber, and the untidy situation in Macedonia encourage a belief, or at least a hope, in several quarters here that negotiations for peace may be within sight. Maitre Salem, although for some years past technically an Italian subject, is an influential Turkish Freemason, a close friend of Djavid and Talaat Beys, and an influential member of the Sephardic Jewish community in the Levant. While ostensibly in Rome for the purpose of securing Italian financial help for the Salonika Jewish bankers, Allatini and Modiano, Maitre Salem, who enjoys the reputation of being one of the deepest wells in Turkey, has been received by the Marquess di San Giuliano, Signor Giolitti—and by the Grand Orient of Rome. It is thought possible in diplomatic circles here that his reports—albeit quite unofficial and, indeed, brotherly—to Djavid and Talaat Beys and the Committee of Union and Progress may help to clarify Turkish notions as to the imminent bankruptcy of Italy, and the chances both of a Parliamentary revolt against the Giolitti Cabinet and of a popular revolt against the House of Savoy.

However little truth there may be in a despatch from Salonika to the Zürich this evening that the Turkish commander at Uskub, Djavid Pasha, has been ordered by Mahmut Shevket to concentrate at Uskub without delay the garrisons of Semtza, Plevne, Priepolie and Yenibazar in view of a possible Austro-Hungarian occupation of the Sanjak of Novi Bazar, it is certain that the Austro-Hungarian authorities would regard the Balkan outlook with greater composure were the Turco-Italian conflict to be settled before the "melting of the snows."

Vienna, February 27.

An official telegram from Constantinople states that the Ottoman Ambassadors have been instructed to declare emphatically to the Great Powers that no agreement with Italy is possible on the basis of the Italian decree of annexation.

Seeing that the decree of annexation has been ratified by an enormous majority in the Italian Chamber and unanimously by the Senate, the attitude of Turkey would appear to exclude all prospect of peace in the near future. Nothing positive is known here concerning the reported action of Russia with the support of Great Britain and France in favour of peace, but it is not believed that, if such action be contemplated, Austria-Hungary and Germany will associate themselves very energetically with it. The mood of Turkey is apparently not thought favourable for successful intervention at present.

Paris, February 27.

The French Ambassador in Rome has been instructed to ask the Italian Government for detailed information with regard to the Beirut incident, and to draw attention to the importance of French interests in Syria, and to the consequences which would attend any extension of Italian naval operations in the Eastern Mediterranean.

Various reports have been current with regard to the eventual attitude of France if the Powers should agree to intervene with a view to ending the war between Italy and Turkey. According to these reports, France and the two other members of the Triple Entente are disposed—provided that Germany and Austria-Hungary joined in their action—to exert pressure on the Porte in order to secure the withdrawal of Turkish Troops from Tripoli and the cessation of hostilities. The French telegraph agency this evening issues a statement to the effect that the French Government is prepared to associate itself in any steps which the Powers may collectively take in order to approach both belligerents with a view to discovering a basis for mediation.

From this statement it is clear that, in the opinion of responsible French quarters, if attempts at mediation are to be successful, they must be collective and must apply to both belligerents. The difficulty of the situation is that, in face of the Italian annexation decree, Turkey can scarcely be expected to withdraw her troops from Tripoli and thus expose the Constantinople Government to the resentment of the Arab populations throughout the Ottoman Empire. But, if the Powers exerted their joint efforts in favour of peace it is not likely that Turkey would be urged to accept the Italian terms unconditionally and without an equitable arrangement.

Constantinople, February 28.

The German Embassy has protested to the Porte against any distinction being made in the treatment of Italian religious establishments in Palestine hitherto under the protection of the Italian Government and those under the protection of other Powers inasmuch as German protection has now been extended to the institutions which formerly enjoyed Italian protection.

It is estimated that between 6,000 and 7,000 persons will be affected by the decree for the expulsion of Italian subjects, a large number of them being workmen employed on the Baghdad Railway at Aleppo. Material difficulties in the way of expulsion will probably compel the Government to extend the respite of 15 days, especially as it will be necessary to charter neutral vessels to carry the exiles.—Reuter

Paris, February 28.

The prospect of developments in Crete which might provoke a conflagration in the Balkans has stimulated discussion of the chances of successful mediation by the Powers between Italy and Turkey. It is a hopeful sign that possibilities of this kind should continue to be discussed, notwithstanding the fact that the annexation vote in the Italian Parliament appears to have precluded any settlement on the basis either of Turkish suzerainty in Tripoli or of the status quo ante in Cyrenaica.

As a great Mussalman Power, and in view of her extensive interests in the Levant, France cannot afford to take any initiative which would have the effect of compromising her position in the Mahomedan world. But the French Government is perfectly willing to associate itself with any collective action which the neutral Powers may agree to take provided that their influence is brought to bear equally upon both belligerents. As the Nigaro observes, there is no reason why, notwithstanding the official annexation of Tripoli by Italy, the Powers should not attempt to discover a scheme of mutual concessions upon the basis of which peace might be concluded. If as M. André Mévil, in the Echo de Paris, asserts, Russia's mediation proposals were not marked by sufficient regard for Turkish susceptibilities to render them acceptable to Germany, there ought not to be any serious difficulty in making good this deficiency. The hope is expressed that the views which are attributed to the new Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister, Count Berchtold, may prove to be significant in this sense.

As regards Italy the French Ambassador's inquiries in Rome yesterday with regard to the Beirut incident are calculated to make the Italian Government reflect upon the problematic consequences from an international point of view of an indiscriminate extension of naval operations in the Eastern Mediterranean.

Vienna, February 28.

The Neue Freie Presse confirms to-day, in a telegram from Berlin, the announcement of the Matin in regard to mediation by the Powers in favour of peace, but suggests that the present moment is scarcely adapted for such an initiative. The semi-official Wiener Allgemeine Zeitung argues this evening that peace is impossible as long as Turkey and Italy maintain their respective standpoints, and concludes that the only means of attaining peace will be for Italy to crush the Turkish forces in Tripoli, and to conquer the territory she has annexed.

Berlin, February 29.

Although no formal announcement has been published here, it is now being made evident that Germany and Austria-Hungary have given a favourable reception to the Russian proposals for a view to the restoration of peace between Italy and Turkey. The more favourable attitude of the German Government towards joint efforts by the Powers has already been commented upon. In view of some unfortunate statements, especially in a Paris newspaper, to the effect that Germany and Austria-Hungary were hindering mediation, two Berlin journals assert to-night that both Germany and Austria-Hungary even anticipated England and France in showing favour to the suggestions of Russia. The point is a small one, but indicates a sensitiveness which will have to be respected, if the present tentative efforts are to bear any good fruit.

For the present the Russian proposals for the co-operation of the five Powers are necessarily vague. The version of them is no doubt correct which says that inquiries are in the first instance to be addressed to Rome in order that the Powers might then be able, roughly speaking, to approach Constantinople with a knowledge of what Italy could and would give under the sanction and guarantee of the mediating Powers. There is obviously no great reason for optimism regarding the ultimate success of the mediation, but, as the Cologne Gazette remarks to-night, it is matter for satisfaction that the Great Powers have now emerged from their attitude of reserve. So far as can be seen the present proposals of Russia do not differ considerably from those which were made and rejected many weeks ago. The new proposals differ in fact from the old mainly in the time of their presentation.

The attitude of the journals which are in the closest touch with the Foreign Office is, of course, in sympathy with the attitude which has been adopted by Herr von Kiderlen-Waechter. A few Chauvinist journals—and the epithet Chauvinist is in this matter about equivalent to either anti-Italian or pro Turkish—continue to argue on behalf of "absolute neutrality." It is, however, doubtful whether even these quarters can develop a serious campaign against mediation, in view of the general weariness at the war, and at the ambiguous position which Germany occupies in view of her respective relations to Italy and to Turkey.

Rome, February 29.

The Italian newspapers, Ministerial and other, adopt a reserved attitude in discussing the peace overtures set on foot by Russia. The anxiety of the five Powers to discover a means of putting an end to the war is considered as a recognition on their part of the loyal attempts made by Italy to restrict in their common interests her field of combat. As Italy, however, has clearly announced the sole terms upon which peace would be possible—namely, her full and absolute sovereignty in Tripoli—it is taken for granted that any overtures made by the peace-making Powers will be based upon those irreducible terms. With those overtures, therefore, Italy cannot be immediately concerned, since, by the nature of the case, they must be addressed directly to the Sublime Porte, and not to her. In no Italian journal is there any hint of the possibility of a compromise on any terms.

A violent scene was created in the Chamber to-day by the Socialists on the pretence that their votes during the secret ballot on the Annexation Bill had not been correctly registered. Their complaints, however, failed to find any sympathy in the Chamber which plainly disbelieved that the officials could have been in fault, and the matter was dropped by common consent.

Italian Action in Beirut.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, Feb. 25.

According to the latest news from Beirut, the local authorities are confident of their ability to prevent disturbances. The refusal of the Moslems who plundered the arms depot to surrender their arms aroused natural alarm in the foreign and Christian communities but panic was largely allayed by the promptitude with which the Vali took measures for the maintenance of order and summoned Turkish troops from Damascus. An attempt by a number of prisoners to escape from the local goal was frustrated by the police and martial law has since been proclaimed.

The Italian warships remained all night in the offing but made no further hostile demonstration.

There is reason to believe that the two Turkish warships were scuttled by their own crews as soon as the attack began, neither being in a position to offer any effective resistance. The Angora was only a torpedo-boat. The Awmi-Allah, however interesting as a naval antiquity, was utterly useless as a fighting ship. She belonged to the group of ancient coast defence ironclads facetiously described by the British officers in the Ottoman service as the "Buffalo class" on account of their constant need of water to replenish their boilers.

The casualties on shore were caused by splinters and ricochets, it being as impossible to sink vessels by shell fire in the small harbour of Beirut without doing damage ashore as it would be to shell a company of infantry out of Trafalgar-square without breaking windows. It may, indeed, be asked whether the Italian triumph was worth the loss of non-combatant life actually caused or the risk of provoking a serious riot in a turbulent town.

In Turkish official circles the suggestion that such operations are likely to weaken the Government's determination to continue the struggle is laughed to scorn. Meanwhile the Council of Ministers has decided, as a retaliatory, perhaps too as a precautionary, measure to instruct the Governors of Aleppo, Beirut and Damascus to warn Italian residents in these provinces to leave the Turkish dominions within a fortnight's time. It is believed that further attacks on the Ottoman coasts will be followed by an extension of this measure to other vilayets. The necessary orders were communicated to-night to the Syrian Valis, who are at the same time bidden to protect Italians, pending expulsion, against popular hostility. The Turkish battleship Avni-Allah was built at Blackwall in 1869 and reconstructed in 1903-06 by the Italian firm Ansaldo. Originally her speed was from 12.5 to 14 knots. Her displacement was 2,314 tons, and she carried four 6 in. quick-firing guns in addition to smaller armament.

The Turkish torpedo-boat Angora was built in 1906. She was of 177 tons displacement and her extreme speed was 27 knots.

The Garibaldi and the Ferruccio are armoured cruisers of 7,400 tons displacement with a speed of 20 knots. Their principal armament consists of one 10 in. breech-loading gun forward and two 8 in. breech-loading guns aft and 14 6 in. quick-firing guns. The former vessel was laid down in September, 1898, and the latter in 1899.

Beirut is not fortified or protected by any long-range guns. The harbour, which is an artificial one with an undefended entrance, was constructed under French auspices about 15 years ago. It is an open but deep-watered bay with a granite pier thrown across the mouth, a narrow entrance being left at the north-west between the pier and the northern point of the bay. The ground rises gradually from the harbour all round, giving the town the appearance of an amphitheatre. The old walled city lies close to the water on low ground, the official residence of the Vali being just outside its walls to the north. The barracks stand on the higher ground behind and are the most prominent buildings in the place. The length of the harbour face is not more than 400 yards and its breadth about 300. It is usually well filled with shipping. French, Austrian and Khedivial mail steamers ply regularly to it and it is seldom without one or two British tramp-steamers. There is always a good number also of smaller local sailing craft engaged in coastal trade. There is a small foreign population resident in the town, which includes a number of Italians.

Constantinople, Feb. 24.

It was recently announced that the Porte had under consideration a proposal to memorialize the Powers, warning them of its determination to close the Dardanelles and to expel all Italians from Turkey in the event of the Italian warships extending operations to the Aegean Sea. Notwithstanding advice to the contrary from diplomatic quarters, the Porte to-day addressed a circular to that effect to the Powers in consequence of the reports of the departure of Admiral Aubry's squadron from Otranto.—Reuter

Malta, Feb. 25.

His Majesty's cruiser Lancaster has left. It is stated that she is going to protect British interests in the Aegean Sea.—Reuter.

Reuter's Agency learns that on Sunday night the Turkish Ambassador communicated to the British Government a protest of the Ottoman Government against the action of the Italians in firing upon the Turkish ships at Beirut when 20 minutes only had elapsed after the first Italian notice. The Porte insists that this conduct is a violation of Articles 1 and 2 of the Ninth Convention of The Hague.

The Turkish Ambassador in London yesterday officially communicated to the Foreign Office a Note addressed by the Porte to the Powers which guarantee the integrity of the Turkish Empire, protesting against the law just passed by the Italian Parliament annexing the Turkish provinces of Tripoli and Cyrenaica.

In the House of Commons, Mr. M. Sykes (Hull, Central Opp.) asked whether the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had any official information regarding the events which took place in Beirut during and after the time Italian warships were engaged in sinking two Turkish warships in Beirut harbour; whether the action of the Italian warships endangered the lives or property of British subjects, and whether such action had had a prejudicial effect on the security of British residents and native Christians in Syria and Palestine.

Mr. Asquith in reply said.—I am informed by His Majesty's Consul-General that, during the sinking of the Turkish warships, the Ottoman Bank, the Salonica Bank, the Custom House and an hotel were damaged by shells. The buildings hit are on the quay near the harbour, and the damage done to them is entirely connected with the sinking of the Turkish vessels which replied to the Italian fire. His Majesty's Consul-General has reported no injury to British subjects, and states that the civil and military authorities acted promptly to prevent disorder. His Majesty's Consul-General, who was consulted as to whether the presence of a British vessel was advisable, has replied that it is unnecessary and that the town is quiet.

News from Turkish Sources.

(FROM THE "TANIN.")

(Specially Translated for the "Comrade.")

From the Agencé Ottomane

According to the investigations of the Commander-General at Benghazi it appears that the Italians are subjecting the people of the town of Derna to very harsh treatment. So far six have been hanged and seventy banished to Italy. The people of the town are full of feelings of hatred against Italians.

From the Ministry of War.

The Commandant near Benghazi reports as under: On the 30th January (old style) a night attack was made on Derna a little after midnight. In spite of the fact that in addition to mitrailleuses and the artillery on shore, the guns of the fleet of the enemy also took part in the engagement, and they turned their searchlights also on us, we entered two forts and partially destroyed them. A party of our Mujahids succeeded in reaching the place where the guns were put in position, and having killed some gunners silenced their guns. Meanwhile some shells from the guns of their fleet dropped on their own forts and killed a considerable number of the enemy. Hand grenades were used by the Italians. The encounter lasted three hours, and it is estimated that the loss of the enemy was very great.

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURC")

(Specially translated for the "Comrade.")

Our friend Emir Suleiman, a well known Ottoman patriot, residing in Hungary, has just arrived from Benghazi, where he spent some months in the Ottoman camps. He assured us that the state of our combatants in Cyrenaica is excellent in every way. They have an enormous quantity of ammunitions and provisions which would enable them to resist for several years. As to their enthusiasm it is above all that can be imagined: it even surpasses their deep hatred of the Italians. They therefore look upon the end of the war calmly. Redjeb Effendi Mohamed, who accompanied the Emir in his travels, has also returned to Constantinople.

We gave some days ago details of the new plan of campaign worked out by General Caneva, and approved of by the Italian Government. The detailed information transmitted by the correspondent of the Times at Rome on this subject, which will be read as a further confirmation of our own information, shows that after the bitter disillusionment about the "military airing" which was to have lasted some weeks only and to end in the desired result, they have decided in Italy to hang on on a programme of colonial campaign of long duration. Will Italy be able to bear the heavy burden of the sacrifices called upon by such a war, which may last long years? The future will reveal it to us.

It is true they count on eventual troubles in Yemen. But what have they not counted upon since the beginning of hostilities? And yet we have seen the results of it. The reason is that these calculations fail in their foundation. The share of the Southern imagination is stronger there than that of reason and of the real knowledge of things. Time will show!

General Caneva has induced the Government to approve of his programme of action in Africa, a programme which may be summed up thus: to consolidate and complete the occupation of the coast, and conquer the interior step by step. The occupation of Tripoli, Khonia, Benghazi, Derna and of Tobruk, will be followed perhaps by those of some other coasting places, always with the object, quite understood, of cutting the communications of the enemy with the sea. The Turco-Arabs, forced to remain in the desert, or in unproductive regions in the interior, will not be long, as assured by General Caneva, in experiencing the full rigour of the sufferings of famine, and in dispersing themselves. In the meantime, the Italians will bring about a political action with the Arabs, in order to separate them by degrees from the Turks. It is with this double politico-military operation, accompanied by vigorous attacks against the enemy each time, that there will be an opportunity which the Commander-in-Chief of the army in Africa thinks is quite sure to lead the colonial campaign to the decisive submission of the Tripolitaine and Cyrenaica. Besides it is stated with assurance that he is training native troops who are expected to fight along with the Italians. The Ascarri battalions of Erythra, mostly Mussalmans, arriving lately in Tripoli, are going to be the first nucleus around which will be grouped the native soldiers. Italy can depend on the loyalty of those Ascaris of Erythra though they be Mussalmans, their faithfulness having been tried on numberless occasions in their own country without a single failure. On the other hand, Italy has already a blissful experience of the endurance of the Ascarri Arabs. In fact in the Southern Somali (Bacadir) there are militias formed of Arabs of Yemen who have fought well and are admirably organized. And for some weeks they have formed at Benghazi, with Arabs from Cyrenaica, a first battalion of native cavalry, to serve for Italy, composed of about a hundred cavalry men who have fought bravely against the Bedouins in a brisk encounter some days ago. Surrounded by the Ascaris of Erythra, of whom other battalions will be coming in the towns occupied by the Italians, the Arabs will always be, according to the provisions of General Caneva, excellent soldiers who will oppose to the Turco-Arabs the same rapidity, frugality and tactics, and could render serious services, especially in the flying operations.

Will the Italians get to the heights of Garian? Undoubtedly in time, and even yet beyond, but it is one thing to reach it by a tactical march ahead, and another thing to arrive by a colonial march.

To lead with tact an expedition of a corps of twenty thousand men through hundred kilometers of desert, carrying everything from water to wood, from the artillery to the smallest quantity of food, at the same time obliged to safeguard the communications between the base of operation and the vanguard, all this presents great difficulties and enormous expense. But the Commander-in-Chief has the necessary means to carry out this plan, and he has even prepared it in its smallest details.

It seems, however, that General Caneva has proved to the Government that the result of such an enterprise will not justify the financial and military effort necessary to accomplish it. In fact the Turks would run away before the invading army as they have always done when the Italians have tried to march forward, dispersing rapidly on every side, worrying the rear-guard, harassing the columns of rwataillment, and always avoiding to give to the Italians the means of having a decisive tactical success. It would be, on the whole, to favour the plans of the Turks, who wish to lure their adversaries into the desert, obliging them to make a great effort without even leaving them the satisfaction of a real battle, and wearing them out by a long guerilla war.

General Caneva is of opinion that Italy must not commit such an error, and the Government approved of it.

Youssef Chetvan Bey, ex-Deputy of Benghazi, had addressed to the Minister of War the following despatch dated 13th February:—The enemy that had been defeated at each attempt at rallying out had come to the decision not to rally out any more but to remain in its own entrenchments. Last night an attack directed by Enver Bey against the positions of the enemy was a brilliant success. Two important forts built by the Italians at half an hour's distance from Derna have been destroyed and several hundred of the enemy have been killed. A large quantity of arms and ammunition was taken from the enemy. We had 40 killed and 50 wounded. This attack has completely demoralized the Italians.

Mr Tedesco, Minister of the Treasury, has deposited with the Committee of the Chamber a project tending to convert into law the decrees opening extraordinary credit of 140 millions of lira (Italian money) in favor of the Minister of War and 30 millions in favor of the Minister of the Marine. From the 140 millions allotted to the Minister of War, 98 millions are destined to cover the expenses of the expeditionary corps up to the end of February. The project provides also a new loan of 35 millions for the expenses of re-warehousing of material and other expenses for the army.

The whole expenditure will be covered by the balances of the budgets and by a trust (loan) entered in the budget up to 1917-18.

The project provides besides a loan of 10,600,000 lira, for harbour works and the establishment of diverse services in Lybia.

Anglo-Turkish Relations.

(FROM THE "TANIN.")

(Specially Translated for the "Comrade.")

LATELY the papers have written a good deal about Anglo-Turkish relations. . . . In an article in Sabah, discussing the recent memorial from London, the contention is made that the memorial does not contain any reference to any party or personality. Thinking that perhaps I had not read it with sufficient attention in the Times, I read it again in the Nor East received this week. And I found that the tone of the memorial was really more commanding and aggressive than I had at first imagined. From it one gathers that there is in Turkey a dominant tyrannous community as also subject and oppressed nationalities.

As to who are the alleged oppressed nationalities one has not been left in doubt. There only remains a community accused by the memorialists of tyranny and maladministration, and they are Turks. I belong to Anatoli and am a Turk from my mother's as well as father's side. Now reading it with the feelings of a Turk I could not follow the logic of the writers.

Based on historical ground, the Turks have, all of them, shown very deep affection for Englishmen. And to-day too they is a large number of them still animated by the same feelings. I have lived for eighteen years in England and am an admirer of the solid and sterling individual qualities of the people of that country and the greatness of their public. During this long period I tried to the best of my ability to understand the Eastern policy of England. For us the friendship of England is a great desideratum. Granted. But the British Government of the day should also be expected to give us actual and material assistance in reciprocity for this friendship. On the establishment of the Constitution we were the recipients of the good wishes and courtesies of the British public. We are grateful for these attentions. To us were addressed innumerable "counsels of perfection" from the British Government and the organs of its foreign policy. To-day's Ikdam regrets that we did not act according to these counsels. I admit the necessity of getting English experts to administer certain of our departments, but I pity that Government which should formulate its policy on the advice of a foreign Government whose policy naturally rests on securing advantage to itself. If people who discuss these questions did only give some thought to the dignity of Ottoman independence, I believe our international status will be treated with greater consideration.

In fine, I am not aware of England having extended any very great material help to our Constitutional régime. After the promulgation of the Constitution at a time when the premiership of Kiamil Pasha was at its brightest, efforts were made to secure a loan through our Embassy in London. The great plutocrat Lord Rothschild was approached. The time for a great loan had not, we were reminded, arrived yet, and friendly advice was offered that if such and such reforms were carried out, means for a loan would be found. Many mistakes have been made in carrying the work of Government, but all the same the path of improvement has been steadily pursued.

If the British Government had at that time supported the proposal of the Cabinet of Kiamil Pasha, English capitalists would certainly have arranged the loan. When the Ottoman Government began to try to get some money from other quarters, quite a large number of English papers, headed by the Times, indulged in every conceivable criticism to frustrate the negotiations. The Turks were accused of arming themselves excessively and harbouring aggressive military designs. Such deliberate misrepresentation of a step for home defence causes a wound in the heart of every Turk. We should not increase by improving our military power, the defensive capacity of our country, already under the focus of foreign designs; then should we leave our territorial integrity to the sweet will of others? We have seen bitter examples of the violation of our territorial integrity guaranteed from outside. If there are still amongst us people who pin faith on that compact of integrity, I cannot help pitying them.

What compelled me to write against the Eastern policy of the present British Foreign Minister, Sir Edward Grey, is this point, which I want to elucidate a little further, as it has a great bearing on the Anglo-Turkish relations, i.e., I wish to refer to the attitude adopted by him with regard to the Turco-Italian war. The Italians, who have proved that they are incapable of declaring and carrying a war according to the ethics of civilization, have not left neutral ships unmolested. The French taught a lesson to the Italians when they offered an insult to the French flag. But we see that Italy is playing ducks and drakes with many ships on which the Union Jack flutters; and yet not a word of remonstrance is heard from the British Government. Had a Palmerston, a Beaconsfield, I can even say a Gladstone—that enemy of our nationality and religion—been living, not one of them would have hesitated to order his admirals to send the Italian men-of-war to the bottom if they defied the flag on the high seas in such manner.

In conclusion, let me say that if, as is hoped, the friendly relations between the British Government and ours will be strengthened as a result of the feelings of regard and amity that we entertain, we may also see the refreshing sight of indications of such feeling in the pages of the daily and periodical press of England.

The British Red Crescent Mission.

We have received from the Rt. Hon'ble Mr. Ameer Ali the following letter addressed to him by the Manager of the British Red Crescent Mission to Tripoli despatched for the relief of the Turkish sick and wounded and starving non-combatants:—

Sfax, 20th February 1912.

DEAR MR. AMEER ALI,

First I must thank you for myself and for the staff of the Mission for your kind telegram wishing us Godspeed. We all very much appreciate your kind thought.

We left Marseilles in beautiful weather sharp at 12 noon on the 16th instant. We reached Bizerta at 6.30 P.M. Saturday evening. The Consul Mr. Burke came on board to receive us and to offer us any assistance we might require. We left again at 12 midnight and reached Tunis the following morning about 7 A.M. The Dragoman from the Consulate awaited us on the quay. At 9.30 I visited the Consulate and saw the Vice-Consul Mr. Goodwin who went with me to the French Residency and we ascertained that the frontier officers had all been communicated with and instructed to give us assistance and facilitate our journey. We left again at 2 P.M., and reached here the following day about 9.30 A.M. A deputation of French ladies and also one English lady belonging to the local Red Cross Society came on board to welcome us, also Mr. Leonardi, the Consul, and his brother, Mr. William Leonardi. On the quay we were introduced to all the leading Arab chiefs, who gave us a most hearty welcome; it was really quite touching to see how pleased they were to see us. They all seemed so grateful that help should have been sent. They had carriages waiting and we drove in state to the hotel. Mr. Leonardi has done a very great deal for us.

This afternoon a deputation of the Arab chiefs called upon us and invited us to dine with them to-morrow, and of course we accepted. They also expressed to us their great love for England and their gratitude at our arrival. I said I would write and tell you and the other members of the Society in England what a kind welcome they had given us. I explained to them how funds had been subscribed to send the mission both in England and in India, and how pleased the subscribers would be to hear what a reception we had received as their representatives.

I do wish the English people, and especially the Government, would realize what a marvellous sympathy there is for England amongst these people, and in fact amongst all the Mohammedan races.

It is a great bond of sympathy which might be turned to such enormous mutual advantage.

Yours sincerely,

C. F. DIXON-JOHNSON.

England, Egypt and the War in Tripoli.

THE 29th of September was Lord Kitchener's first day as British Agent in Cairo. On the very next day Italy sent her ultimatum to Turkey, and on October 1st declared war upon the Ottoman Empire, of which Egypt forms an integral part. For many years the Italians had coveted that portion of the North African coast which lies opposite to their native shores, and both in speeches and in books their statesmen had advocated with the greatest vehemence the seizure of Tripoli. Italy's only rival in this proposed game of "grab" was Germany, and when events in Morocco were beginning to point to Germany's failure to obtain any footing in that country, there was some reason to suppose that the Kaiser would turn his attention to Tripoli. The Italians, therefore, felt that if the desired territory was not to slip from their grasp, they must seize upon it without delay. Preparations for war were hurriedly made, and already in the early summer of last year the plans were formulated.

Now it must be remembered that Italy is a nation with whom we are on the most friendly terms, but with whom Austria and Germany, in spite of the Triple Alliance, have many bones to pick. The events of last July showed the Italian statesmen very clearly that the strong policy of England and France would require all the attention of Austria and Germany for the next few months, and that the moment was thus opportune for an attack upon Tripoli which should not be impeded by European interference. Austria would not interfere, lest in so doing she should fail to be ready to help Germany in her war with England and France, which, at the time, seemed imminent and, in view of that coming war, neither France nor Germany were likely to worry her. England, however, had to be reckoned with, for, though our attention was fully occupied in Europe, it lay in our power to make the Tripoli expedition a most hazardous affair simply by permitting the Turks to march through Egypt to the seat of hostilities. Before the projected expedition could be launched, therefore, it was necessary for Italy to ascertain the attitude of England and to obtain her promise to hold Egypt neutral. This promise, however, could not be lightly given, for it might lead to grave complications with the Porte. Egypt is a vassal of Turkey, and is under the obligation to provide the suzerain State with an unlimited number of troops should she require them; and had the British not been the occupying power, the Nile Valley would certainly have formed the Turkish base. England, therefore, had to be consulted with regard to Tripoli, and her attitude to Italy recognised as absolutely friendly, before war could be declared.

No public statement has yet been made which would indicate that the British Government made any agreement with Italy last summer; but there can be very little doubt that some sort of understanding was arrived at. England, it would seem probable, consented to prevent Turkish troops from entering Tripoli via Egypt, and so far as possible to put a stop to all gun running or other belligerent enterprises. She appears to have undertaken to keep Egypt absolutely neutral and to allow the Porte no assistance from its vassal. The granting of these concessions to Italy are clearly indicated by our present actions in Egypt, which, as will be related below, are of a very deliberate nature; while the despatch of Lord Kitchener to Cairo and the outbreak of hostilities as soon as he had arrived in his new abode, can hardly be attributed to mere coincidence. It seems quite evident that our attitude to Italy was as follows. "Since it appears to be inevitable," said we, "that some European Power will pounce upon Tripoli, we in Egypt much prefer you as our neighbours to, say, the Germans, and though we do not wish to offend Turkey by actively taking your part, we will show our friendliness to you by holding Egypt neutral. To do this, however, we shall require to send a very strong man to Cairo, and you must promise not to declare war until he has arrived there. In return for our kindness to you we shall expect you to play a friendly part towards us in the event of a European conflagration."

Lord Kitchener, if the above suppositions are correct, found himself, on arriving in Egypt, in a situation which required very delicate handling, and when the expected Italian ultimatum was despatched and the expedition to Tripoli at last became a reality, he was called upon to face a possible crisis of the most violent nature. It is commonly said in Egypt that had he not been in that country during the early stages of the war, the situation would have been most dangerous. Thanks, however, to his great reputation and to the awe and reverence in which he is held, the situation is, on the whole, tranquil, and, so far as one can see, contains no elements of great danger. The Egyptians were delighted with his politeness and cordiality, and felt that in him they had a friend who would show them how to act in this difficult situation. Their sympathies are entirely with the Turks, their brother Mussalmans, and they believed that Lord Kitchener's prejudices were on the same side.

Early in the war he is said to have been approached by a number of Egyptian officers who asked permission to volunteer for active service in Tripoli. Lord Kitchener replied that he would gladly give them permission to do so, but that their vacant posts would have to be filled by junior officers, and they themselves would probably find on their return that they had been placed on the retired list, not by his wishes, but by reason of the upward pressure due to the congestion in the junior ranks. He advised them, therefore, to curb their heroic ambitions, so natural to Egyptians, and to stay at home which they did. At another time certain notables proposed that Egypt should send three or four regiments to the aid of the Turks. Lord Kitchener said that he would have no objection, but that, in order to preserve internal quiet, he would be obliged to replace the absent troops by an equal number of British regiments, at which the proposal was hastily withdrawn. A few weeks later a deputation of Bedouin chieftains waited on Lord Kitchener to ask him to permit them to gather their tribes and to travel into Tripoli to fight the Italians. His lordship congratulated them most heartily on their warlike qualities, which, he admitted, he had overlooked. He reminded them that up till now they, as nomads, had been exempt from service in the Egyptian Army, but that since they were thirsting in this manner for military glory, he felt that Egypt could ill afford to lose them, and he would see that they were conscripted for the army like the Bedouin. To these remarks he is said to have added that slight suggestion of a wink which is so well understood by the native to mean that it is best to keep quiet. Needless to say, they did not go to the war.

Thus, with the greatest tact he kept the country quiet, and even managed to enlist the sympathies of the native Press. It is true that he was prepared instantly to suppress any paper which published inflammatory articles, and actually did so in more than one case, but at the same time there is no doubt that at the time the editors was, on the whole, very friendly. Even the violent Sheikh Shari'ah told his readers that, after all, the English were not so bad, and that an amicable understanding with them was possible. British prestige rose to a level to which it had not attained since the first ten years of the Occupation, and the various English inspectors in the provinces state that the attitude of the natives towards them was unusually deferential.

When one remembers that at this time Christian Italy was attacking Moslem Turkey, Christian France and Spain were taking possession of Moslem Morocco and Christian Russia was preparing to advance into Moslem Persia, an outbreak of anti-Christian feeling in Egypt was naturally to be expected, and it came as no surprise, therefore, when a riot occurred in Alexandria which, for a short time, had a very ugly appearance. One day towards the end of October news reached Egypt that the Turks had driven the Italians out of Tripoli and that the war was at an end. This was received with the utmost joy by the low-class inhabitants of Alexandria, who are seldom on good terms with the Italians living in their midst, and they began to act in much the same manner as that in which we Londoners behaved after the relief of Mafeking. They paraded the streets, shouting and singing, and in many cases they "ragged" the Italians with whom they met, knocking their hats off and hustling them. The victims at once took fright, and, the news being spread, the mob was met at a certain street corner by a compact body of Italians, who opened fire upon them with their revolvers, with the result that two or three natives were killed and several wounded. The police managed to disperse the crowd and on the next day, when the demonstration was renewed, the hoses of the municipal fire-engines were turned upon the mob and order was quickly restored. A detachment of British marines and bluejackets, which was landed from one of the battleships in the harbour for the ostensible purpose of carrying out certain ordinary manoeuvres, was received with wild enthusiasm by the European population, as though it had come to save them from dire peril. In Cairo on the same day there was a small disturbance in the native quarter, and an old man was arrested in the bazaars for preaching the Holy War. A much exaggerated account of the riot was cabled to certain London newspapers, and caused a flutter of nervousness amongst those persons who had intended to spend the winter in Egypt, many of whom wrote to the Egyptian hotel managers cancelling the accommodation which they had engaged. This single untruthful cablegram has caused an immense loss to those Egyptians and Europeans who cater for the tourist, for the season has been, in consequence, a bad one up till now, although the tranquillity of the country is far greater than it was three or four years ago, or so it seems to a visitor.

When the late King George's passage through the Suez Canal drew near, the Egyptian nationalists evinced a keen desire that a Turkish prince of the Imperial House should be present at Port Said to greet His Majesty, it being felt by them that in this manner they might demonstrate to the world that Egypt really was a part of the Turkish Empire. Lord Kitchener, wishing to show friendliness to the Porte in order to mollify any ill-feeling that might there exist in regard to the neutrality of Egypt, consented to the proposed meeting, so far as he was concerned, and in due course it was arranged. The Turkish prince who was sent over to Port Said had lived for so many years as a prisoner in Constantinople during the reign of the deposed Sultan that his manners are said to have been somewhat inelegant, and his natural awkwardness was accentuated by the fact that he could only speak Turkish. Coming across the Mediterranean he was terribly seasick, and thus his appearance on his arrival was not of the kind which was likely to inspire respect in the minds of the critical Egyptians. On board the Medina he is said, perhaps on doubtful authority, to have sat in the sun contentedly picking his teeth, or playing with the buttons of his clothes, while the very smart and absolutely European Khedive—vassal of the Porte—discussed high affairs of State with the King.

Very soon it was apparent to educated Egyptians that, far from the Turkish prince honouring the Khedive with his presence, the Khedive was involuntarily placed in the position of patron to this ill-educated young man, and the effect caused by this reversed status has been more far-reaching than is generally supposed. The unfortunate prince seems to have had a somewhat unpleasant time during the three days in which he was the Khedive's guest in Cairo, for, owing to the determination of Lord Kitchener to avoid all risk of the Turkish prince's appearance in public acting as an incentive to anti-Italian rioting, his Imperial Highness was obliged to make all his movements at a different hour from that which had been announced. Instead of travelling from Port Said to Cairo by day, according to the official programme, he was sent there by night, arriving in the biting cold of daybreak, and being met only by a few sleepy officials. When it was announced that he would visit the Zoo or the Pyramids, he was whisked away in a small motor-brougham to the Museum or to Helopolis; and when the crowds had gathered to see him as he entered the front gate of the palace, the unprepared loiterers at the back door were permitted to gaze for a brief moment on the hurrying little figure.

Thus the Imperial visit passed off without commotion, Turkish confidence in English friendship and Egyptian confidence in their own superiority to the Turks, being at one and the same time assured.

Shortly after this, however, the Italian Government seems to have made representations to England with regard to the gun-running which was being practised along the western borders of Egypt, and already in December it was rumoured that a detachment of the 21st Lancers was to be sent to the frontier to check this. "You see," said the officers' mess, "we must play fair to Italy;" but the question as to why we must do so does not seem to have been put. On the face of it, our friendship to Turkey would seem more urgent politically than our friendship to Italy. The effect on our vast Mohammedan possessions of an entente with the Porte is obvious; and in Egypt it must be admitted that our easiest hours have been those in which we were on friendly terms with Turkey, and our most anxious hours those in which our relations with that country were bad. The Sultan is the head of the Mohammedan faith, and since there is no nationality in Islam, all race differences being lost in the community of religion, an insult to Turkey is an insult to everyone of the twenty-four million Moslem subjects of our King. Yet, in spite of this recognised fact, we take the strongest steps to prevent any aid passing from Egypt to the Turks in Tripoli, and we sternly suppress the little breaches of neutrality at which we might so easily wink. And it is to be remembered that this neutrality itself is such a forced attitude that we might be expected to have insisted upon it as quietly as possible, avoiding actions which are calculated to bring our attitude to public notice. If we were not in Egypt there would have been a direct road for Turkish troops from Constantinople to the seat of war, and by now, in all probability, Italy, if she had been so rash as to attack Tripoli at all, would have been driven into the sea. Since we hold Egypt, however, it is quite natural that we should more or less dissociate the country from Turkish affairs, and should silently ignore the ancient statute which declares that the Egyptian army is at the disposal of the Porte in time of war, and that the high-road from Syria to Tripoli is open to the Turks. But surely an explanation is required of our conduct in boldly forcing this attitude on public attention by military propaganda.

During January, the Arabs of the Eastern desert which lies between Syria and Egypt began to show signs of restlessness, and there was some reason to suppose that they would attempt to slip across the Delta, either singly or in small bodies, in order to travel through to Tripoli for the defence of Islam. Lord Kitchener, therefore, built forts along the Suez Canal, and sent troops to hold them, thus once more demonstrating the uncompromising attitude of England to the Porte and calling public attention to our vigilance in preventing the Turks from receiving any help whatsoever from that portion of their Empire which we hold for them. In February certain well-known Turkish officers who were trying to cross Egypt disguised as Arabs were arrested and were sent back to Constantinople in spite of all their protests.

Such occurrences as these show clearly enough that we have an understanding with Italy, based on our desire to wean her from the Triple Alliance. It was a contract forced from us, in all probability, at a time of great peril, when it was absolutely necessary that we should buy Italy's support in the great war which threatened us. It is England, and England alone, that has given Italy the opportunity of seizing her coveted portion of North Africa, and by giving this to her, it may be said that we have won no less a prize than the peace of Europe. As long as Italy's attitude to the Triple Alliance was in doubt, as long as there was a chance that she would throw in her lot with Austria and Germany, then war was imminent. But now that we have bought her friendship, as seems so probable in view of our strong action on her behalf in Egypt we need fear no war, for we have hemmed Germany and Austria around in such a manner that they could only fight a campaign of defence. The support of the Italian fleet was absolutely essential to us, as securing the Mediterranean for the free passage of our transports from India and Malta, and releasing our fleet in those waters for service in the North Sea. England on the north, France on the west, very possibly Russia on the east, and now Italy on the south, are leagued around the Teuton race, not to menace, but to pacify, not to make war, but to make war impossible. To prevent the terrible calamity of a European conflagration, to dispel the imminent shadow of Armageddon, we appear to have secured Italy at her own price, and that price was our active sanction of her seizure of Tripoli.

If this supposition be correct, we may understand why Lord Kitchener was sent to Egypt, and we may now see the reason of our actions in that country. The risk which we took was twofold. Firstly, there was that of a rupture with the Porte, but this was not a serious danger, for we could always say to Turkey, "If you make trouble with us, we will take Egypt from you altogether, and you will lose the tribute of £682,000 per annum from her, which at present we guarantee to you, and have scrupulously paid for the last thirty years." The second risk was that of a rising in Egypt. Lord Kitchener was perhaps the only man who, by his presence, could remove all chance of a serious outbreak, and very rightly he was chosen for the work. Had he not been available, it is doubtful whether we could have accepted Italy's price; for a concentration of British troops in Egypt, which would have been the alternative method of ensuring quiet there, would have been awkward for us and provocative to the Moslems.

Our future relations with Turkey present a field for further speculation. For the sake of European peace, we seem to have been obliged to aid Italy; but, apart from this, it is clearly our policy to remain on good terms with the Porte, and the better the understanding between us the easier will be our task in Egypt. As long as Turkey remains a worthy nation, we shall be her friend. The status quo suits us. We do not desire to see a sudden scramble for her possessions; we wish for the present that the Porte should be strong enough to hold Syria, Asia Minor, and Arabia. As long as she shows internal signs of holding together and keeping a stiff back, she may count on our support; and it is unlikely that we shall take any hostile step, such as the seizure of Egypt. But should she fall to pieces, and degenerate into a shattered and worthless nation, then our policy may have to be revised, and we must even be prepared to participate in the division of her possessions. Now, we very naturally do not wish to be forced by competition into such an unbecoming attitude towards Turkey, and therefore we must quietly wait to see what will happen, and must continue to hold Egypt in the anomalous manner now obtaining, unless, of course, circumstances arise which make the defining of our status on the Nile a necessity. In that event it is hardly to be supposed that the existing position could be regularised. According to the Firman of 1892, all Egyptians are to be regarded as Turkish subjects; the land of Egypt is a part of the Turkish Empire, and no separate nationality is recognised: the taxes are to be levied in the name of the Sultan, the coinage is issued in his name, the Turkish flag is used, all military ranks are described in the Turkish language, and the words of command are given in that language, the whole Egyptian army is at the service of the Sultan; and the above-mentioned tribute is paid each year to the Porte. In actual fact, the Anglo-Egyptian Government does not recognise any of the really important clauses of the Firman except the last; and the war in Tripoli has made it quite clear that they are a dead letter. Thus, it must be admitted that Egypt's relations with Turkey will bear no scrutiny, and there can be little doubt that if the matter is discussed at all, it will bring the question of our annexing the country into immediate prominence. A forcible annexation would be extremely dangerous, for the Egyptians are loyal to the Sultan in his capacity as head of Islam, and they would speedily rise against the foreigners, while a war with Turkey at a time when our attention is so occupied in Europe, would be sheer madness. To purchase Egypt for, say, £20,000,000 might be agreeable to the Porte. The sum might be raised by a 3 per cent loan, the interest upon which would be £82,000 less per annum than the present tribute to Turkey. But this might well be considered an unnecessary extravagance, since in the event of Turkey's total collapse it is to be presumed that we should take Egypt without payment. Moreover, such a payment of money to the Porte would be considered as a hostile act by any Power which happened to be in dispute with Turkey at the moment.

The future of Egypt, as a part of the British Empire, would be replete with brilliant possibilities, and there is some reason to suppose that Lord Kitchener would like to see the annexation carried out during his tenure of office, and would welcome the combination of circumstances which would make it possible. As part of the Empire, Egypt might receive some mild form of Home Rule, such as that obtaining in certain other dominions; and her position in the federation of nations which own allegiance to our King might become one of considerable dignity. Should Turkey fall, Egypt might well step into her shoes. There is no reason why the Khedive should not usurp the place of the Sultan as head of Islam, fantastic as such a statement may seem at first sight. Egypt would then become the protecting power of the Hedjaz, and would be mistress of Mecca. When we consider what it would mean to the 94,000,000 Mohammedan subjects of Britain to feel that England was the protector of their Holy City, we may well speculate for a while upon the possibility of realising this mighty dream, which, be it understood, has already passed through the minds of many Egyptians. The Egyptian Empire of the past once more be built up. Syria and Palestine might be brought under the control of Cairo, as in bygone years, all Arabia would be added to her without a blow, and those tribes of the Yemen who are in revolt against the Turks would be, and now are, ready to give their allegiance to England after their kind.

Should Turkey fall . . . But for the present, while we are building up a great nation out of the wreck of Egypt which we found in 1882, we may rest satisfied with the status quo. It is always to be remembered, however, that the Egyptian question is not one which deals simply with the good Government of the Nile Valley, but it is a subject that involves vast problems, the solution of which affect the history of England in the deepest possible manner.

Lord Kitchener's task in Egypt has been facilitated by his excellent personal relations with the French. It is not generally known that he fought on the side of France in the Franco-Prussian War; and the recognised fact that he would "like to have another snack at the Germans" provides him with a common basis of friendship with every Frenchman. It is rumoured that our attitude last summer in so strongly supporting France in Morocco was largely due to Lord Kitchener's influence. In Egypt the French give him every assistance, and there is an atmosphere of complacency in this respect which does not fail to have its effect on the native mind. Thus whatever be the future of Turkey and Egypt, and whatever changes the next few years may bring, we may feel confident that we shall have the support both of France and Italy, and there is even some likelihood of an alliance. The English, French, and Italians now hold between them the entire coast of North Africa, from the Atlantic along the Mediterranean, and down the Red Sea to the Indian Ocean; and, in fact, between them they possess about seven-eighths of the whole of Africa this side of the Equator. With such interest in common an alliance is both natural and necessary, while its effect on Europe can only be pacific, in view of the fact that it makes us far too strong to be attacked.—The Fortnightly Review.

Italy (to the Powers): "This is a much longer macaroni than I ever thought of swallowing. Will none of you share it with me?"

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

The 150 men of the 7th Rajputs who were despatched recently to protect the British Consulate at Lingah landed at Lingah on 12th March.

Sir Edward Grey, replying to Sir John Lonsdale explained the situation prevailing at Lingah on March 12. Sir Edward's statement was similar to the account published by Reuter on 11th March. "In the circumstances," added Sir Edward, "the action of His Majesty's local officers in moving up men from Jask to be landed, if in the opinion of the Consul-General at Bushire, the protection of British lives and property demanded it, had been approved."

Reuter wires from Baku on the 14th that the ex-Shah has left for Europe.

A telegram to the Times from Teheran says that in spite of the arrival of the Indian detachments, the situation at Lingah is developing seriously. The situation at Kermanshah is growing worse. It is reported that Salar-ed-Dowleh has had the Governor's legs cut off and burned him alive.

The Turkish Ambassador has arrived at Teheran and was received with great honours. The Government has still not replied to the Anglo-Russian Note. There are some differences in the Cabinet on the subject.

Russian military movements in the Caucasus, which have excited some alarm in Europe, have been suspended, Turkey having given satisfactory assurances concerning the movements of her troops towards Persia.

Sir Edward Grey replying to Lord Ronaldsday in the House of Commons said the Government had intimated that it had no objection to the preliminary surveys for the proposed railway from the Russo-Persian frontier to Karachi, but it reserved complete freedom regarding the management of the Railway, the representation of British interests, alignment, rates, etc., should construction be actually proposed.

Reuter wires from St. Petersburg on the 20th—Persia has replied satisfactorily on all points to the Anglo-Russian Note containing the conditions of the advance of £200,000 at 7 per cent.

Lord Lamington, who is a passenger by the incoming steamer Mooltan, proceeds direct to Karachi without landing at Bombay. From Karachi he goes on to Bushire.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

St. Petersburg, February 23.

Sir Edward Grey's explanation of the strategical motives underlying the presence of Russian troops in Northern Persia appeals convincingly to the Rokh, which has hitherto been invariably suspicious about the intentions of the Russian Government. The Nova Zemlya regrets that Anglo-Russian diplomacy is not always as clear in its attitude towards Persian affairs. It foresees a renewal of the old difficulties, unless both Powers make up their minds once for all either actively to intervene to establish order and Government in Persia or entirely to abstain from intervention. It considers that mere warnings to Mahomed Ali are either superfluous or insufficient.

Stringent instructions have been telegraphed to the Russian Consul at Meshed to refrain from lending any countenance whatsoever to intrigues in favour of the ex-Shah.

Teheran, February 20.

Government advices state that Salar-ed-Dowleh, brother of the ex-Shah, has recaptured Kirmanshah.

Teheran, February 27.

The boycott of the British at Shiraz is over.

Brussels, February 28.

M. Mornard, the provisional Treasurer-General in Persia, who held the post of Controller in the Belgian Customs, has been appointed to the grade of Director and has received the insignia of an Officier de la Couronne as a recompense for the services which he has rendered.

Teheran, February 28.

It is stated that, although Russian garrisons will be maintained in Tabriz and Resht, a sensible diminution of the troops in Tabriz will soon take place and possibly all the troops will be withdrawn from Kazvin.

Salar-ed-Dowleh's troops, according to telegrams received here, have looted Kirmanshah and the tribesmen have created a reign of terror.

Teheran, February 29.

A serio-comic incident has arisen in connexion with the arrival of Emin Bey, the new Turkish Ambassador. Last Saturday the Persian Government drew the attention of the Russian Minister to the fact that the Russian troops had seized the guns at Enzeli which were used for the customary salute given to all new Ministers on landing on Persian soil and which were now required to welcome the Turkish Ambassador. Instructions were immediately telegraphed to the Russian Consul at Resht that the guns must be restored. The Russians, however, refused to restore the guns and the Turkish Ambassador landed without any salute. He telegraphed to the Porte complaining of the indignity put upon him and refuses to proceed to his post from Resht until reparation has been made. The incident emphasizes the total disregard to instructions displayed by the Russian Consuls in Northern Persia ever since M. Pokhtomoff's successful insubordination in the matter of Shua-es-Sultaneh's property.

The Russian Consul General at Meshed, although warned by his Government, continues, it is reported, to conduct a public campaign in favour of the ex-Shah, and a serious movement of this nature is reported to-day from Khorassan.

Colonel Yate (Melton, Opp.) asked the Secretary for Foreign Affairs what was the total amount of British and Indian claims outstanding against Persia, and what steps were being taken to secure their adjustment.

Mr. Acland (Cornwall, Camborne, Min.), who replied, said:—My right hon. friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs is detained at the coal conference. The total amount of British and Indian claims against the Persian Government is, so far as I am aware, about £75,000. The detailed claims are, however, filed at His Majesty's Legation at Teheran. In the event of any considerable loan being raised by the Persian Government which would include in its objects the payment of their creditors, His Majesty's Government will press for the payment of British claims.

Colonel Yate—What is the gross value of the whole of the British and Indian trade involved in connexion with the trade routes of Southern Persia and what was it four years ago?

Mr. Acland—The figures, which are not quite complete, are very detailed, and I will therefore send them to the hon. and gallant member separately, but the rough totals of the available figures of imports and exports together from Great Britain and India for 1907-8 are £1,920,000 and for 1910-11 £1,860,000.

Mr. Ramsay Macdonald (Leicester, Lab.) asked whether the Secretary for Foreign Affairs would communicate to the House at once the text of the communication made to the Persian Government on behalf of His Majesty's Government based on the instructions given to our representative at Teheran on 7th September last for the purpose of explaining the Anglo-Russian Agreement and also the text of the acceptance by the Persian Government of the terms of this communication.

Mr. Acland—It was considered unnecessary to lay the communication because it was in identical terms with the instruction which are given on page 48 of the First Persian Blue-book of 1909, except for two slight alterations which are of no importance. The paper can, however, be laid if desired. No answer was returned to it by the Persian Government.

Mr. Macdonald—Were we not informed that the Persian had Government accepted this intimation?

Mr. Acland—The fact that they had accepted it and made no comment was taken that they had accepted it.

In reply to Mr. Ponsonby (Stirling Burghs, Min.)—

Mr. Acland said—According to the latest information in my possession there are no Russian officers in the Regular Army. The number of Russian officers with the Persian Cossack Brigade is five. I am unable to state how many foreign officers were employed before the conclusion of the Anglo-Russian Convention and I have no information that there are such officers serving with the Regular Army at present.

Mr. Ponsonby asked whether any representatives of British commercial interests in Persia had made representations protesting against the appointment of M. Mornard as Treasurer-General for Persia; and if so whether, before the acquiescence of His Majesty's Government in the permanent appointment of M. Mornard to that post was given, its effect on British interests were considered.

Mr. Acland.—The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative, as regards the second part, I would refer the hon. member to the speech made by my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the 21st February, when he stated that reports from His Majesty's Minister at Teheran are favourable to M. Mornard and that his appointment at present is temporary.

Sir Edward Grey on Persia.

SIR EDWARD GREY was the principal guest at the house dinner of the Manchester Reform Club recently. Sir George Kemp, M.P., presided.

In the course of the reply to the toast Sir Edward Grey referring to Persia said:—I should like to take one subject connected with foreign affairs which I know has been the subject of special attention in this part of the world. I cannot deal with it exhaustively to-night because it is too large a subject—the subject of Persia. I should like to touch on at least one or two points and see if I cannot do something to rectify what I take to be a wrong perspective of the view taken of the recent events in Persia, and of the Anglo-Russian Agreement in particular. If you look at a thing out of focus it presents a very different appearance from what it does if you look at it in the right focus. There has been a tendency to review the Anglo-Russian Agreement from what it seems to me is the wrong point of view and to look at it in the wrong focus, there has been a tendency to review the Anglo-Russian Agreement as if, under that Agreement, we had to assume some new responsibilities in regard to Persia and had undertaken something that had not existed before the obligation to protect the independence and integrity of Persia. We have always wished to see the independence and integrity of Persia preserved, but when we made the Anglo-Russian Agreement we had no intention of adding to our responsibilities. It was not any increase of responsibility we were seeking. Another thing which has been left out of the Anglo-Russian Agreement is this. When that Agreement was made, Russian influence was already dominant in the North of Persia. That had happened years before the Agreement was made. It was something which had gone on gradually, which had been existing for several years, and was a state of things in which we had acquiesced. To attempt to interpret the Anglo-Russian Agreement as having the object of working against Russian influence in North Persia is not only to read into the Agreement something which is not there, but to read into it something which was entirely contrary to the spirit of the Agreement.

What was the Anglo-Russian Agreement? What is it? It does not deal with Persia alone, it deals also with Afghanistan and Tibet. The object of the Anglo-Russian Agreement was this. Two great nations who had frequently been at diplomatic tension and friction with each other came to the conclusion that if they were to live together peaceably in Asia they must not work against each other's interests. (Cheers.) That was the origin of the Anglo-Russian Agreement—that neither should make trouble for each other in their respective territories in regard to the frontiers of their respective territories in Asia. That which we hoped to achieve by the Anglo-Russian Agreement has been achieved, and the Agreement on both sides has been absolutely kept to. (Cheers.) As far as we are concerned we have pursued no forward policy, we have done nothing to cause apprehension or anxiety to the Russian Government (renewed cheers), and, as far as they are concerned, all the rumours and apprehensions which have existed in regard to strategic movement towards the Persian frontier have entirely disappeared.

But more than that has flown from the Agreement. Those of us who have read in the newspapers of the visit which was paid by some distinguished countrymen of ours the other day must have realized that from that Agreement has come not only good relations between the two Governments, but a great access of good feeling between the two peoples. Speak to any of those who paid a visit to Russia the other day and they will undoubtedly impress upon you how really genuine, cordial, and sincere was the welcome they received, not merely from the Government, but from the people as a whole, of every class. Now that we wish to preserve, and if people think that if the Anglo-Russian Agreement had not existed things would have been better in Persia than they are now, I can only say that, as far as one can predict anything as being humanly certain, it is this: that but for the Anglo-Russian Agreement they would have been infinitely worse. When that Agreement was made Persia was on the eve of revolution, the country was falling into chaos, the Government was breaking up, when the Agreement was made. Imagine the state of things that would have come to pass had there been no Anglo-Russian Agreement, if the same suspicion and mistrust had been existing between the British and Russian Governments as existed in previous years and gave rise to so much friction before. If that had been the case now, what would have happened in Persia? Undoubtedly what would have happened when there came internal revolution in Persia would have been that the Russians would have pressed to Teheran; having their influence already dominant in Northern Persia, they would have consolidated that influence, not merely to protect their interests, not merely to establish themselves firmly in Teheran, though we might have taken advantage of the situation to their disadvantage. And on our side what might have happened? We should have had no security that Russian influence in the North of Persia would not have been used to push on strategic movements, railway extensions, and so forth, to the Indian frontier, and we should have been pressed, I think to take measures in the territory bordering on the Indian frontier in order to secure ourselves there against military aggression and strategic expansion on the part of Russia towards that part. That would have been the case. There would have been perpetual friction arising out of that between the two Governments which undoubtedly would have weakened the position of both. With perpetual friction and with increasing anxiety with regard to the Indian frontier, by this time Lord Haldane, I think, undoubtedly would have been asking the House of Commons for increased Army Estimates to provide for a further strengthening of our position on the Indian frontier. If that had been the course of events, if that had happened, I am pretty sure that there would have been considerable complaints by people in this country against the man whom they would have considered the jingo of the Foreign Office, who, by continuing the old policy of jealousy and suspicion and the forward policy in Asia, was putting his country to increased expense and diplomatic friction. Unless I am very much mistaken, some of those who have been most active recently in criticizing the Anglo-Russian Agreement would have been leading the hue and cry against the Foreign Secretary for conducting a forward policy in Asia.

How do we stand? I do not for a moment wish you to suppose that everything has been for the best in this best of all possible worlds. There has been a great deal of tragedy in Persia; our trade in Persia undoubtedly suffered. The blocking of the roads in Southern Persia has been considerably caused by the incursion of the ex Shah into Persia. That has exhausted the resources of the Persian Government, drawn away those who might have preserved order on the roads in the south, and has undoubtedly done considerable injury to our trade for the time being. Temporarily you might, of course, remedy that injury to trade by ourselves undertaking the protection of the roads. I never thought that would be a wise step. It would have required a large expedition in the South of Persia, and it is exceedingly difficult to withdraw those expeditions when once they are sent. Much as I regret the injury to trade, it is not, if I may use Sir George Kemp's simile—it is not business to incur expenditure in yourselves undertaking the protection of trade routes of which the cost may perhaps in itself amount to more than the gross volume of the trade, not merely the profit which you have undertaken to protect. Nevertheless, it is a state of things which it is our duty to do all in our power to remedy. As long as there was constant friction and dispute between the Persian Government, or the agents of the Persian Government, and the Russian Government, or the agents of the Russian Government, it was impossible for us, and would have been quite contrary to the spirit of the Anglo-Russian Agreement, which recognized Russian interests in the North of Persia—it would have been quite contrary to that to give our support and to take part in disputes. But to day, when the Persian Government has shown every disposition to respect Russian interests, to be careful not to injure them, to see that they are maintained, the time has come when I think we are entitled to expect, and, indeed, we are receiving, real co-operation from the Russian Government in support of the authority of the Government of Persia, which has removed every ground for saying that it was not friendly to Russian interests. In the first place, the Russians have given the strongest warning to the ex Shah that his case is hopeless and he has been ordered to leave the country. That is not the only thing. In the next place, the Russian Government has already begun to withdraw its troops from Kazvin, the place to which they were recently sent, and is proceeding with the withdrawal of them, it has given definite evidence of its intention and desire not to embark on any permanent occupation of Persian territory, but as soon as there is tolerable order in that part of Persia, and as long as it is sure that the Persian Government is friendly to it, not to maintain a permanent occupation but to withdraw its troops and support Persian authority in maintaining order in Persian territory. I have not dealt exhaustively with what is a large subject, but so much I have said because I think there has been a wrong perspective, and I wish, if possible, that those who have criticized, and may still continue to criticize, the policy of the Government in regard to the Anglo-Russian Agreement would do so from the point of view in accordance with which the Anglo-Russian Agreement was made and would not expect it to produce results which it was never intended to produce.

The "Times" on Sir Edward Grey and Persia.

One of our existing friendships—that with Russia—has been the object of some of the most insolent attacks made by Sir Edward Grey's critics in his own party upon his conduct of foreign affairs. Manchester has been the headquarters of the campaign against him, and the Persian question has played a more important part than any other in that campaign. With his usual courage he devoted the greater part of his speech on Friday to that question, and explained clearly and succinctly the relationship in which it stands to the Anglo-Russian Agreement of 1907. The main purpose of the Agreement was to avert the danger of further friction, by a frank recognition of existing interests and mutual assurances that neither side would in future attempt to extend its influence at the expense, or to the prejudice, of the other contracting Power. Hence, whilst with regard to Tibet the Agreement took the shape of a declaration de désintéressement on both sides, it fully recognised British ascendancy in Afghanistan, and with regard to Persia it defined certain spheres in which the two Powers at the time respectively enjoyed, and were in a position to assert and to maintain, a distinct priority of interests and influence. It follows therefore—and we cannot do better than quote the Foreign Secretary's admirable statement of the case—that "to attempt to interpret the Anglo-Russian Agreement as having the object of working against Russian influence in North Persia is not only to read into the Agreement something which is not there, but to read into it something which was entirely contrary to the spirit of the Agreement." Equally pertinent was Sir Edward Grey's statement of what would have happened by this time had there been no Anglo-Russian Agreement. There would have been nothing to allay the mistrust with which Russia had hitherto viewed British policy throughout Central Asia, or to stay her hand in pressing to the utmost against Persia the advantages which her geographical position and her overwhelming military superiority conferred upon her. The action of Russian Agents, even of the Russian Government, on various occasions during the last few years may have been open to criticism. But be that as it may, the fact remains that, thanks to the Anglo-Russian Agreement, Russia has remained, and remains, true to her assurances that, so long as the Persian Government shows a reasonable disposition to respect Russian interests, she neither desires nor intends to annex, or permanently to occupy, any part of Persian territory.

Sir Edward Grey, in addition to this general defence of his policy, was able to declare that we are receiving real co-operation from the Russian Government in support of the authority of the Government of Persia. The Russians have given the strongest warning to the ex-Shah that his case is hopeless, and he has been ordered to leave the country; and the Russian Government has already begun to withdraw its troops from Kazvin. Much danger and trouble might, perhaps, have been avoided if Sir Edward Grey had persuaded the Russian Government to give its warning to the ex-Shah some months ago, and it may be that in the recent past the co-operation between the two Governments in Persian affairs left something to be desired. However that may be, the statement which Sir Edward Grey was able to make on Friday should reassure our Moslem fellow subjects in India, who without real ground have shown a very marked fear that their legitimate susceptibilities and their natural sympathies with their fellow believers outside the Empire were being held of too little account. It should also reassure those in this country who were beginning to be anxious about the future of Anglo-Russian relations in the Middle East. There is, we believe, at the present moment, a genuine feeling of good will and of confidence towards this country amongst all classes in Russia. It would be unwise to exaggerate the significance of even such unprecedented manifestations of cordiality as those which took place in both St. Petersburg and Moscow during the recent British visit to Russia. But it would be still more foolish to pretend that they meant nothing beyond an ordinary display of proverbial Russian hospitality. They were, we take it, a tribute to the growing sense of friendliness between the two nations as well as between the two Governments, and of the growing appreciation of its value to the Russian people. To that extent we believe that the British visit has done far more to strengthen the moral influence of our Government in favour of peace and international good will both with the rulers and with the people of Russia than the harsh and often essentially unjust denunciation of Russian methods in which some of our fellow-countrymen are so fond of indulging, whilst claiming in the same breath a monopoly of genuine peaceful endeavour.

Professor Browne on Sir Edward Grey and the "Times."

To the Editor of the "Times."

SIR,—In the leading article which you published under the above title in your issue of 19th February you are, as it seems to me, so anxious to render homage to Sir E. Grey that you are scarcely fair to his critics, and (no doubt unwittingly) ignore the real grounds of their criticisms, which are not so much that he does not "speak frequently or fully enough on foreign affairs," as that his statements are unsatisfactory in the following amongst other respects.—

(1) Forgetfulness of important facts in recent history. As an example of this I may cite a statement which he made on three separate occasions in the House of Commons (on 27th July, 27th November and 14th December of last year), to the effect that if the Russian officers of the Cossack Brigade had "lifted a finger" in July, 1909, or "used their influence in Teheran, the Shah (i.e., Mohammed Ali) would never have been expelled." The active part taken by those officers on behalf of the ex-Shah is a matter of common knowledge, while the details of their action must be remembered by all who read at the time the graphic accounts furnished by your then Correspondent at Teheran. Such forgetfulness concerning facts which cannot be regarded as unimportant must inevitably tend to bias the Foreign Secretary's view of Persian affairs.

(2) Apparent inconsistencies of statements made at short intervals from one another. Thus on November 27 last Sir E. Grey, after speaking of the secret clauses in the Anglo-French agreement concerning Morocco, said—"There are no other secret engagements.....From ourselves we have not made a single secret article of any kind since we came into office," and this categorical statement was, as it were, underlined and emphasized by the Prime Minister and by the Leader of the Opposition. Yet on December 14, less than three weeks later, in reply to a question by Mr. McNeill as to whether there were "other secret treaties besides the treaty recently disclosed between this country and France," Sir E. Grey said, "There are other engagements which have not been published." I think that many persons besides myself would like to know in what way these statements are to be reconciled, since it can hardly be supposed that within this short period of 17 days a secret treaty or agreement was begun, matured, and concluded especially in view of the apparent distaste for such secret agreements expressed by Sir E. Grey on the earlier of the two dates.

(3) Apparent inconsistencies of speech and action. Thus on November 27 of last year Sir E. Grey said—"The wise policy for this country is to expand as little as possible, and certainly no further the African possessions." On December 19 the British Press published the belated news of the "cession" by Turkey to Egypt (which, of course, save in diplomatic fiction, means to England) of Sollum and a large triangular area of territory in Cyrenaica.

(4) Ignoring of important assurances given by British representatives. The most conspicuous instance of this is afforded by the now celebrated Memorandum on the meaning (or "spirit") to quote Sir E. Grey's favourite expression) of the Anglo-Russian Agreement communicated to the Persian Foreign Office by Sir Cecil Spring Rice on September 4, 1907, and subsequently published in the Persian Press. This Memorandum, containing the most satisfactory assurances as to non-interference in Persian affairs by England or Russia, can scarcely be reconciled with the recent and present actions of those two Governments in Persia, and was nevertheless the first if not the only official explanation of the meaning and scope of the Agreement given to the Persian Government. Yet not only does Sir E. Grey never refer to it in his interpretations of the "spirit" of the Convention, but both he (on December 14 last) and Mr. Acland (on December 5 last) appeared at any rate to throw doubts on its genuineness, though this has been established, I venture to say, by evidence which cannot be controverted, and is now, I believe, admitted even by the Foreign Office.

Lastly (for, though your leading article suggests many other comments, I must not seek to abuse your hospitality), you speak of "the insolent attacks made by Sir E. Grey's critics." You have not hesitated to attack in language as strong as any used concerning Sir E. Grey most of his colleagues. Is he alone to be immune from criticism? Or is there any "insolence" in pointing out seeming inconsistencies of speech or action in a Minister who, whatever his virtues may be, can hardly expect in this country to escape the common fate of all Ministers of the Crown?

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

EDWARD G. BROWNE.

February 20

Persia and our Foreign Engagements.

THERE is small reason to-day to complain of the reticence which used to mark Sir Edward Grey's conduct of affairs. So far at least as Persia is concerned, his speech in the House on Wednesday, following on his slighter defence at Manchester, has at length told us the worst. The defence was more disastrous and damaging than the criticism, and at least in one vital particular it has shown us that the case against his policy is stronger than any of us had supposed. We shall not omit to review his reason for British acquiescence in Russian policy, but let us first consider the bare facts of the present position as he has revealed them. As a result of a Russian invasion based upon two successive ultimatums, the nominal Government of Persia is in the hands of a Ministry and a Regent who have no shadow of claim to represent the Persian people. They dissolved the Mejlis by a coup d'état, and it is because they stand half supported and wholly dominated by the Russian Army of Occupation that they are able to deal at all with the two associated Powers. From this little group of Persian politicians, condemned and disowned by the last act of the dead Parliament, Russia, with our assent, has already extorted in general terms the right of veto on the nomination of all foreign experts whom the Persian Government may in future employ. It has used that veto in the first instance to procure the appointment as the controller of Persian finance of a Belgian official, M. Mornard, distrusted by the Persians themselves, obnoxious to the British community in Teheran, and by general admission a partisan and agent of Russian policy.

A further series of demands and suggestions for the reconstruction of the Persian Government has since been presented in a joint Note by both Powers. As to any restoration of the Parliament which the Russian occupation enabled the present Ministry to suppress, it is apparently silent, and even if a Mejliss should ever meet again, it will be to find itself confronted by a situation which it could not modify. The Note imposes on Persia the obligation to pay a pension by way of black mail, to the ex-Shah, and this despite the fact that both Powers publicly announced that he had by his invasion forfeited his right to the pension previously allowed him. He entered Persia by, at the least, the negligence, and probably with the collusion, of Russian agents, and his complete expulsion has been frustrated only because he has been able to shelter himself in regions of Persia dominated by the Russian forces. Further, a preliminary loan of £200,000, to be followed by a larger loan, is "offered" to this Persian Ministry, of which the spending will be controlled by the two Powers—a loan which the Mejliss, careful of its independence, had rejected. The one force which could be trusted to uphold the shattered Constitution—the force which defended Tabriz, defeated the Cossacks, and drove the ex-Shah from the throne—is to be disbanded. In its place Persia is required to establish a small professional army, and "it might be that Russian officers would be employed in the Persian army." Finally, Persia is required to give her assent to a Convention which, in effect, dismembers her territory and establishes two monopolies of commercial and (as events have shown) political influence in two thirds of her dominions. The eventual withdrawal of the Russian Army of Occupation is left in doubt. Sir Edward Grey has now accepted as adequate a reason for its continued presence on Persian soil, which would make it useless for the Persians to demand its departure even if they should be wholly successful in placating Russia and in creating a strong and orderly police. He holds it to be legitimate that it should occupy the greater part of Northern Persia, because the Turks have for some years held a fragment of Persian territory on the disputed boundary, near Lake Urmia, which they claim as their own.

Such is the position as we read it to day. It needs no commentary. It is sufficient to face the facts. Let us consider, on the most favorable forecast, what they involve. We will assume that the ex-Shah goes off with his booty, and troubles Persia no more. We need not deny the possibility that some sort of Mejliss may again come into being. It is possible that the Russian Army of Occupation may be reduced to a skeleton force which, on one pretext or another, will occupy only a few strategical points, by way of maintaining the right of Russia to march into Persia through the "open door," that is closed only to our enterprise. We should still say, even on these optimistic assumptions, that nothing effectual was left of Persian independence. The ability of Russia to dictate to the Persian Government at any moment and on any subject will be so clear that abject acquiescence will be the only course open to it. It will know that at any moment it may, "rain ultimatums" and that Sir Edward Grey, so far from "putting up an umbrella," in Lord Curzon's phrase, will find good reasons for assenting to whatever his partner may do. It will know that the only armed force on which it can rely is a force commanded by Russian officers. Its finances will be under the minute control of an unsympathetic foreigner, who is a Russian Agent. It will have bound itself to acquiesce in a Russian monopoly over banks, railways, and roads over the large and more populous portion of its territory. Its position, in short, will differ in no essentials from that of Egypt after the fall of Arabi and the destruction of his nationalist movement.

Sir Edward Grey's defence for the posture which he has allowed Persian events to assume was, as we understand him, (1) that Russia did, even before the Convention, dominate Northern Persia, and (2) that he never had intended to assume any responsibility for maintaining Persian independence. His history, as we read events, rests, on a half-truth, and involves an ignoring of vital facts. It is true that Russian influence was in the ascendant in Teheran particularly during the Boer War, and up to the outbreak of the Manchurian War. Russian methods in this period were those of gentle and friendly corruption. She permeated the Court; lent money to the Shah, intrigued with his courtiers, and gave him officers to drill his bodyguard. Legal rights of control she had none, and her power depended solely on the weakness of a despot who had sold himself to her. The Japanese war broke her prestige, and with the revolution her influence came abruptly to an end. Russia was at the moment a broken Power defeated abroad, chaotic at home, and dependent for her very existence on the French and English money-markets. It was to a rival so reduced and so powerless that Sir Edward Grey made the ruinous concessions of the Convention, and it is from the Convention alone that there dates the era of bullying brutality and invasion. Sir Edward Grey excuses himself on the ground that he meant to assume no responsibility for Persian independence. One can but take note of this declaration, which is a good deal more cynical than was assumed in any of our attacks on Sir Edward Grey's policy. We had always assumed that he did mean to defend Persian independence, but lacked the adroitness and the firmness to do so with success. But is this an accurate version of the responsibilities which Sir Edward Grey has, in written instruments, incurred? We are glad that he at last admits the authenticity of the despatch, published since 1907, in which our Minister in Teheran, expounding the Convention, said that it bound each Power "not to allow one another to intervene on the pretext of safeguarding their interests." He now repudiates his own Minister, but did Sir Cecil Spring Rice go beyond the text of the Convention? In the treaty itself the two Powers "mutually engaged to respect the integrity and independence of Persia." Was there no responsibility there? The word "mutual" seems to imply that they gave a pledge not merely in the air, but to each other. When a Power has such an engagement from another, it has a right and a duty to hold her to it. But this discussion is beside the point. Sir Edward Grey, in the later stages of this crisis, has actively joined in the Russian campaign against Persian independence. He shares with her the full responsibility for imposing this Egyptian control, even though instrument of coercion is a Russian Army and not a joint force.

We could wish that it were possible to hope that the more promising phase in our relations with Germany would mean the end of our association with Russia and of secret engagements, though not of friendship, with France. But among the many kindly and wise things which Sir Edward Grey said at Manchester about Germany, one salient point emerged. He proposes to retain all our old entanglements in the continental system. We are to hope for no more manly tone towards Russia, whatever brutalities she may perpetrate with our connivance in Persia. We must not expect to be freed from the obligation to render armed assistance to France in future European disputes, despite the closing of the Moroccan episode. The scope of these negotiations is apparently confined to ending our actual occasions for dispute with Germany. It will leave the European Powers still regimented in opposite camps, nor will it slacken the ties which bind us to one of the rival coalitions. We welcome a slackening of the tension and a diminution of the risks; but the policy is none the less a policy fundamentally ruinous and unsuited to our position in Europe—the policy of the balance of power—The Nation.

Our Pledges to Persia.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "NATION"

SIR,—It has been assumed in the Nation and in many other papers, that in the recent debate on Persia Sir Edward Grey, while admitting the authenticity of the document presented by the British Minister at Teheran on September 4th, 1907—commonly known as the Spring-Rice despatch—refused to accept it as binding on the British Government. "He repudiates," you say, "his own Minister." That is not my reading of Sir Edward Grey's speech, nor do I think it would be possible for any British Government, which has any concern for the national honor, to take such a course. For four years Sir Cecil Spring-Rice's declaration has stood undisputed and unquestioned. If it was unknown to the Foreign Office here, it was perfectly familiar at Teheran, where it was published in full in the Persian press. For four years the Persian Government have relied—as they had every right to do—on the explicit assurances which it contained. It would be a gross breach of national faith to go back on such a statement now. But Sir Edward Grey's language is uncertain. To many people who heard him he gave the impression of "repudiating," as you say, the authority of his Minister; and it is therefore worth while to ask exactly how we stand in the matter.

Let me recall, first of all, the circumstances under which the declaration was made.

At the end of August, 1907, when the negotiations between England and Russia were being concluded, Persia was already in a state of great unrest. Disorder was on the increase. The revolutionary movement was growing. The Government of the Shah was weak and unpopular; and the rumours which were spreading through the country of a secret agreement between Russia and Great Britain for the delimitation of Persian territory were not calculated to improve the Government's position. There is no doubt that to many observers on the spot the situation seemed full of danger; not merely to the stability of the Government, but to the lives of the European colony and to the whole social fabric. All the despatches sent home by Sir Cecil Spring-Rice about this time indicate clearly the anxiety which he felt.

It was in these circumstances that, on September 4th—four days after the signing of the Agreement—Sir Cecil Spring-Rice called on the Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs and presented his Memorandum. In doing so, he acted, we are now told, without special instructions, considering no doubt that the situation justified immediate action. It was necessary to explain the nature and object of the new Anglo-Russian Agreement, to allay the unfounded rumours that were rife; to reassure public opinion. That is what Sir Cecil Spring-Rice in his statement expressly purports to do: and for the time, at least, he was successful.

The document, apparently, was unofficial in form. On the face of it, says Sir Edward Grey, you could see that it was unofficial. But there is nothing whatever in its contents to indicate that it failed to carry the full authority of the British Government. To suppose that it was a mere private expression of opinion by the British Minister is to mistake its whole tone and character: and no one who takes the trouble to read it through could for a moment make such an assertion. The style of it, indeed, is remarkably forcible. The man who wrote it had no doubt of the meaning he wished to convey, or of his full right to speak. It is the statement of a Minister speaking on behalf of the Government which he represents, and using—as, apparently, he is entitled to do—the name and authority of Sir Edward Grey. "Sir Edward has informed me of the substance of his conversations with the Mushir-el-Mulk and also of the substance of M. Isvolsky's declarations, officially communicated to the British Government." "Both Ministers are fully in accord as to the policy of non intervention in Persia, and have left no possible ground for doubt in the matter." "The Agreement is 'based on a guarantee of Persian independence and integrity.'" "The object of the two Powers in making this Agreement is not in any way to attack, but rather to assure for ever the independence of Persia." "They are 'not' to allow one another to intervene on the pretext of safeguarding their own interests."

In all the history of diplomatic communication, there never was a clearer or more emphatic statement.

How a document of this importance should have remained for four years entirely unknown to the British Foreign Office, is perhaps one of the most mysterious circumstances in the whole Persian business, and apart altogether from the immediate situation in Persia, seems to demand some more explanation than the Government have yet given. "He" (Sir Cecil Spring-Rice) "regarded it as so unofficial that he did not send it home at the time, and that is why I never saw it." That is, so far as I know, the only statement yet made by Sir Edward Grey on this subject and it can hardly be regarded as a full and adequate explanation. Even although Sir Cecil Spring-Rice did not send home the copy of a document which he had presented without special instructions, under circumstances of unusual importance, did he afterwards make no reference whatever to it? He remained at Teheran more than a month longer and sent home other communications on subjects of all kinds. Was this alone omitted? On September 7th—only three days after he had presented his memorandum—he received telegraphic instructions from Sir Edward Grey to make a joint communication with the Russian Minister to the Persian Government on the subject of Agreement, to repeat, in fact—though in shorter and less emphatic language—the same assurances on the subject of Persian independence as he had made on his own responsibility three days earlier. In acknowledging these instructions, did he not say anything of his own memorandum?

Such questions as these naturally occur, and, in asking them, I make no charge against Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, whose eminent and distinguished services to his country are known to us all. I also accept, of course, most fully Sir Edward Grey's statement that he had never seen this document. I am inclined, indeed, to think that if he had seen it, the course of Persian affairs might have been different. But it may fairly be asked how it came about that in a matter of such importance the Foreign Office should have made no inquiries, and at the end of four years could say, as they said last December, "we know nothing at all about it."—Yours, &c.,

PHILIP MORRELL.

Germany, Austria and Italy

REUTER wires from Vienna on the 23rd — The Kaiser arrived to day and drove to the Schoenbrunn Palace, where the Emperor Francis Joseph welcomed him. The visit is being kept extremely private to save the Austrian Emperor from unnecessary fatigue. The German Emperor and the Austrian Emperor to-day had an hour's audience. Count Berchtold, Minister for Foreign Affairs, dined with Emperor Francis Joseph in the evening.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 24th — The King has left for Venice to meet the Kaiser.

Indians in the Transvaal

The White Book promised by Lord Emmott on 19th February dealing with Asiatics in South Africa and the working of the Townships Amendment Act has been published. It concludes with a minute passed by the Union Ministers on 2nd December repeating the assurances that it is not proposed to interfere with certain vested rights of Indians. But it is added it is impossible to allow the attempts to acquire new rights. The Asiatic leaders appear to be making an organised attempt to invade towns where Asiatics had no rights before. The European community consequently is so exercised that the Ministers will probably be compelled to take action under the Townships Act, and enforce the conditions contained in the title deeds.

A public meeting of the citizens of Madras was held on the 27th under the auspices of the Indian South African League for the purpose of considering the condition of Indians in South Africa. The Hon Dewan Bahadur M. Audinarayansh presided and resolutions were passed expressing the concern of the meeting at the continued ill-treatment of Indian residents of South Africa and strongly urging Government to take definite steps to remove this imperial scandal, urging Government to watch carefully the progress of the Immigrants Restriction Bill now before the South African Union Parliament so that the resident Indian population are not deprived of their existing rights, and recording the sense of the meeting that the system of indentured recruitment is opposed to the best interest of the Indian people and requesting Government to terminate the system.

There were several speakers and the following letter from the Bishop of Madras was read — "I gather from what I have read on the subject that there is still need of continued effort and watchfulness to secure justice and fair treatment for our Indian brethren settled in South Africa. I hope too that something will be said on the subject of indentured labour in other parts of the Empire. I have had some experience of the system in Assam. It was worked there under the most favourable conditions possible and under every possible safeguard, but even there vices inherent in the system itself gave rise to intolerable abuses. In distant colonies conditions are far less favourable for indentured labour from India and safeguards cannot be as effective. I cannot understand how men who condemned indentured Chinese labour in the Transvaal as slavery can possibly uphold Indian indentured labour in British Guiana and the West.

China.

REUTER wires from Shanghai on the 23rd — A party of Amazons dissatisfied at the Nankin Assembly's lukewarm approval of the principle of votes for women, invaded the Assembly House, broke the windows, mauled the guards and terrorised members into re-opening the discussion of female suffrage, although members meanwhile summoned soldiers for their protection.

Reuter's Agency is informed that the Eastern Bank is acting for a syndicate of Russian, French, Belgian, and British groups, the last mentioned consisting of Messrs Schroeders, E. D. Sassoon and Co., Brown and Shipley, W. Greenwell and Co., Sir Marcus Samuel, and others. Negotiations are still proceeding. Reuter wires from Paris on the 23rd — With reference to a rumour current in Peking of the refusal of admission of the Anglo-Belgian loan to the Paris Bourse, it is declared in Paris that the matter has still not been considered.

Speaking in the Reichstag, the foreign secretary referring to China said Yuan-Shi-Kai deserved confidence and the Government would be master of the situation if it got money quickly. The German Government was pursuing in the fullest agreement with the other Powers the principle of non-interference. Germany would intervene against all attempts at the partition of China which must be preserved in its entirety. The economic open door must be guaranteed.

TETE À TETE

THE Word of God as embodied in the Quran is in no need of the praise of man. But it is something if even those who do not believe in that revelation are compelled to acknowledge its great merits, and if such appreciators include one of the genius of Goethe, the Believers have reason to feel glad. That great poet wrote of the Quran that "detailed injunctions of things allowed and forbidden, legendary stories of Jewish and Christian religion, amplifications of all kinds, boundless tautologies and repetitions, form the body of this sacred volume, which, to us, as often as we approach it, is repellent anew, next attracts us ever anew and fills us with admiration, and finally forces us into veneration." This is no place to explain the need or character of the detailed injunctions of things allowed and forbidden, or of the legendary stories which contain moral guidance in the form most suited to human nature, nor need we discuss the amplifications, tautologies and repetitions by means of which the unity of God was preached with a unique insistence. But those who know how different the genius of Arabic is to most Aryan languages, and especially to those of modern Europe, will readily understand that the translation of the Quran which forms the standard of literary composition in Arabic—into the tongues of Europe is not likely to make a revelation of that nature very attractive to European readers. Considering the distaste of Europe for things Asiatic, and specially of things spiritual, it is not every day that we can expect even a student like Goethe to conquer the first "repulsion" and find attraction in the Quran and fresh admiration for what it inculcates. No wonder then that few Europeans reach the final veneration which Goethe attained. But if the Message of Unity is to reach Europe, and if the rationalism of the Quran is to force its way into that region, good translations into European languages are a great necessity. Probably some of our readers are aware that this has been undertaken by Nawab Imad-ul-Mulk Syed Hosain Bilgrami, C.S.I., whose familiarity with the best literature of England is as great as his scholarship in Arabic. Nawab Imad-ul-Mulk is perhaps the best writer of English to-day in India, and many must have read his exquisite and rich verses without knowing to whom they were indebted for such elegant literature. As regards his knowledge of Arabic and of Moslem theology, few of our greatest Maulavis or Shams-ul-Ulema could lay claim to his erudite scholarship. He is a voracious reader of books, in many languages and on all subjects, and the book that he has not yet read can hardly be worth reading. The fact that all this is known to comparatively few people is partly due to his repugnance to publicity in any form, and partly to the fact that his scholarship has been, if we may presume to say so, exceedingly selfish. He reads for his own pleasure and has forgotten only too often the claims of others even to a part of the pleasure that is his, pleasure which could enrich them greatly without in any way leaving him the poorer for it. But he is now busy in preparing for the public a translation of the Quran into English, and considering that he has selected for it the language and idiom of the English translation of the Bible, we can realize the difficulties as well as the magnitude of the task he has undertaken. We learn with great satisfaction that he has already completed six suras and is, in fact, revising the last of them. This means that at least a quarter of the work is done. We trust God will grant him long life and health and the unimpaired vigour of his intellect to complete this great work. He writes in a private letter:—"All my time is taken up by my translation work, and weary work it is, though extremely interesting. I have to turn up so many books of reference—lexicons, commentaries, etc.—that the physical labour is immense, let alone the brain-work." But this is labour of which the reward in the Hereafter is the true paradise of the Blessed, the ridwan-Allah or satisfaction of Allah which transcends the beauty of the *houri*s and the delights of the "pure drink." In this world, too, he has, besides his own satisfaction, which to one of his temperament must be worth many a fulsome flattery from others, the satisfaction that hundreds of millions of mankind would bless him for what he is doing. All this must no doubt sustain him, but it is our duty to share the burden with him so far as we can. As far as references are concerned two or three competent assistants must be provided, and we trust His Highness the Nizam, Her Highness the Begum Sahiba of Bhopal, and His Highness the Nawab Sahib of Rampur would soon come to his assistance. We cannot conceive that these rulers can place this duty lower than any which they owe to themselves, their Moslem subjects, their religion, and their Maker.

WE CONGRATULATE Mr Salahuddin Khuda Buksh, M.A. (Oxon.), B.C.L., Bar-at-Law, on the publication of his "Essays: Indian and Islamic" in Probstian's Oriental Series which includes Dr. A. K. Koomaraswamy's "Indian Craftsman" and other interesting works on the East. The first essay in the volume deals with the "Spirit of Islam" and contains a mass of information about the early days of Islam as also about Pre-Islamic Arabia, and numerous comments on its essential features by German scholars. We are, however, sorry that a close study of the writings of these savants has led Mr Salahuddin into an adoption of their manner also of referring to the Prophet of Islam. For instance, he writes in one place that "in fashioning his religion the Prophet adopted an eclectic method, retaining or rejecting from the older systems whatever seemed to him necessary and proper," and in another place he says that "Mohamed has not merely accepted dogmas and doctrines of Judaism, minute Talmudical ordinances, but has even adopted in their entirety some of the Jewish practices." Again he writes "His knowledge of Jewish and Christian books, at times faulty and imperfect to a degree, was derived almost exclusively from oral communications," and refers finally to "the sources from which the Prophet of Arabia received his religious inspiration." We fear these remarks do not tally with the universal Moslem belief that the solitary source from which Mohamed received his inspiration was the God whose messenger he was, and that, eclectic or otherwise, the doctrines of Islam so far as they are contained in the Quran are those fashioned by Allah Himself rather than by His Apostles. In the words of that great rationalist, Sir Syed Ahmed Khan,

مے گفتار معشوق است قرائے کہ من دارم

Moreover we cannot help thinking that expressions such as "the Prophet's extensive vocabulary of vituperation" are ill-judged and misleading, and it would have been better to avoid epithets such as "sanctimonious" when dealing with a person who is venerated so universally in Islam as Hasan, the eldest son of Ali. It is, however, true that the writer is, as he claims, remarkably "clear and free from narrow sectarianism," for not only does he pass a true historical judgment on "the weak but well meaning Othman, but pleads with Islamic fervour for the removal of sectarianism. In the essay on the "Islamic Conception of Sovereignty" Mr Salahuddin has ably dealt with the principle of election to the Caliphate and has explained how it was modified from time to time. But we doubt if he is strictly accurate in the remark that "the religious character of the Caliphate ends with the first four Caliphs," and that during this period the Caliphate was "a purely religious office." We are disposed to think that the distinction between things religious and mundane did not exist at all during that period, and that it was only when the Omayyads had turned the leadership of the Faithful unto the Cacerism of the unbelievers, the Kasrawaniet for which the sturdy and democratic Omar had rebuked Muawiyah in his governorship of Syria during his own Caliphate, that the distinction arose for the first time. We are therefore not inclined to think that in the theocracy of the first four Caliphs they "only incidentally, as trustees and custodians of the faithful, administered the empire." Again, we think the writer has misunderstood the significance of Islam in writing that "the union of religion and politics, beneficial as it is at the earliest stage of national existence, tends, as the national outlook is widened and the national horizon enlarged, to stunt progress and stereotype society." In fact a few pages later the author himself supports our contention forcibly. He writes: "In Islam, theoretically at all events, the two functions of the sovereign and the priest were inextricably interwoven with each other. Never was an attempt made to sever the two. Nor can any attempt be ever successfully made, as religion and politics are indissolubly bound up with each other." To our mind Islam solved the problem of Church and State in the only possible way, not by subordinating one to the other, nor leaving both as co-ordinate powers, but by merging the two into each other. This was the real strength of Islam. As for weakness, it lay in the men who subverted it and introduced into sovereignty the element of proprietorship. But if the Omayyads, most of whom were beathens, are to be blamed, so must those pious people be blamed who retired into "the corner of safety" to save their own little souls. That is a lesson which the good and the true have yet to learn, that the safety of the world lies not in the flight of its best men, but in bold opposition to vice and wickedness and in the spirit of self-sacrifice. The most interesting chapter in the book before us, however, is the one on "The Shu'ubiyah Movement in Islam." The history of this movement has important lessons to teach not only to Mussalmans to-day but also to other rulers who retain racial prejudices. Mr. Salahuddin writes that "its importance in the history of Islam can scarcely be exaggerated as it was one of the few potent factors which smote the Arab supremacy through and through and which sowed the seeds of disloyalty and disaffection, bearing their fruit in the rise of Abu Muslim and the overthrow of the Omayyad rule." He says: "Ostensibly the Shu'ubiyites were those foreign converts to Islam who, while advocating the excellence of their own respective nationalities, refused to acknowledge the superiority of the Arabs." We believe the writer is justified in differing from Dr. Goldziher and asserting that the movement "was not merely a literary warfare waged between the Arabs on the one hand and the foreign converts on the other, but a political movement having its origin and its basis in the political conditions of the times." In his parting sermon Mohamed had said, "O men, God has taken away from you the arrogance and pride of ancestry of heathen days. An Arab has no other excellence or superiority over a barbarian than what is secured to him by his God-fearing character and righteousness. Ye are all the progeny of Adam, and Adam himself is of the earth." "Truly the most worthy honour in the sight of God," says the Quran, "is he who feareth Him most, for the Faithful are brethren, wherefore make peace between your brethren." It was against this essential feature of Islam that the Omayyads warred, and it was indeed a pity that those who were the descendants of the Prophet or the descendants of his ascendants, instead of exerting themselves against a feeling of the racial superiority of the Arabs which the Omayyads encouraged, chose to fight for their own rights as the Prophet's successors. In these dynastic and personal conflicts the spirit of Islam was neglected, and though the Abbasides favoured the Ajam converts in their own obvious political interest, they too became partisans and helped the disintegration of Islam. The Caliphate that could have reflected that spirit in their rule was at last extinguished ruthlessly by the Mongols, and thereafter various nationalities among Mussalmans fought each for their own hand, and even the revival of the Caliphate by the Turks has not succeeded in recreating the fraternity of faith which was brought into being by the Prophet of Islam. Individuals have always felt a brotherly feeling, but an organised Brotherhood is still absent. Who knows if the present misfortunes of Islamic countries may create the organisation as well? When it comes, we may be sure Islam would be a living faith working for "good in the World and good in the Hereafter." As for the movement, with which the author deals exhaustively, he is right in saying that "it illustrates one supreme and eternal truth which all governments might well take to heart." It is this: "Physical force might prolong the existence of the body politic but it cannot insure its permanence. The only sure foundation of a government is in the loyalty of its subjects, but loyalty cannot be secured by despising them and excluding them from their legitimate share in the government and its administration. History repeats itself and those very problems which confronted the Omayyad statesmen nearly a thousand years ago are now before us, different perhaps in their setting, but in their essence unchanged." The Indian subjects dealt with in these Essays include an appreciation of Chahib which, however, is too general, though its literary merits are great. The essay on "Hindustani Literature" has the same merits and perhaps the same defects. In dealing with the life of his father, Mr. Salahuddin has supplied a mass of most interesting information about the great Library at Bankipore which would always keep alive the name and public spirit of Khan Bahadur Khuda Bux Khan, C.I.E., who made a gift of his great treasures to the public. The writer deals in the last essay with the present situation and some of his observations are shrewd, while frankness in the statement of his views is one of the important merits of the chapter. Although we have followed the writer's example in dealing critically with his book, we trust none of our readers would be misled into thinking that we are not its admirers. It is one of the most interesting publications of recent times from the pens of India writers, and Moslem writers are so rare that the community must be thankful to Mr. Salahuddin for the close study and brilliant writing that have gone to the making of this bright volume. A perusal would more than repay the cost of the book and the time spent, and we specially commend it to young Mussalmans who are anxious to know more about the Faith and the history of Islam.

Some time ago we published the fact that we had sent £400 (the equivalent of Rs. 6,000) out of the Turkish Relief Fund. Relief Fund collected by us to H. E. the Grand Vizier of Turkey, through the Bank of Bengal, Calcutta, and the Imperial Ottoman Bank, Constantinople, for the relief of war sufferers. Early this month we received a formal receipt from the Inspector-General of the Ottoman Red Crescent Society of Constantinople, along with a letter from him and another from the Imperial Ottoman Bank. Unfortunately, in the burglary that took place in our office, the box containing these papers was carried away and we were unable to publish the letter of the Inspector-General of the Society. But three days after the burglary, we were informed by the Station Master of Sealdah that only an hour or so after the theft, and even before we ourselves knew of it, our box was found at the Station in a broken condition. The prompt, industrious and remarkably efficient police of Sealdah is, we believe, still contemplating to supply us this information. However, our box and papers had still to undergo a quarantine with the Calcutta Police, and have only now been returned to us—of course, with the usual sympathies and regrets. Apologising for the delay on behalf of the burglar, the Police and the Station Master, we now publish the Inspector-General's letter for the information of our expectant readers.

CONSTANTINOPLE, THIS 14TH 2 1912.

Dear Sir,

The Imperial Ottoman Bank, here, has paid us the sum of 400 £ kindly sent from you, through the Bank of Benegale, for the fund of the Ottoman Red-Crescent.

Herewith please find receipt for the above amount.

We cannot find terms to express you our deepest thanks for your encouraging work, and hope, you would, as Proprietor Editor of a paper, largely contribute to the development of our Society, which is meeting sympathy home and abroad and specially with the Islamic world.

Before closing, we thank you again for your successful efforts,

We remain, Dear Sir,

Yours very respectfully,

To the Proprietor-Editor of the "Comrade",

Calcutta.

It was our intention to send the second instalment of our collections also to Turkey, when we read of the efforts of the Right Hon'ble Mr Ameer Ali in sending a Red Crescent Mission to Tripoli. That inclines us to send the second instalment to him to London, specially as we are informed that the money sent from India to Constantinople appears mostly to have fallen into the hands of the Italians. As our readers know, money is contraband of war and the Turks have therefore had great difficulty in transmitting help of any kind to the seat of war. Thanks, however, to the efforts of Mr Ameer Ali, backed by the non-official support of our Foreign Office and the assistance of the French Foreign Office, the Mission organised by the British Red Crescent Society, which is formed under the auspices of the London Branch of the Moslem League, reached the Tripolitan frontier.

safely. All these circumstances lead us to request Mr. Ameer Ali to organise, if possible, another Mission, composed of one doctor, one dispenser and one nurse, on our behalf, and send it to Tripoli as part of the British Red Crescent Society organisation. We have already been in communication with the Right Hon'ble gentleman, and intend to write to him by the next mail to accept our offer. As this offer is, however, in reality, not ours but that of our readers and others who have so kindly sent their donations and collections to us to transmit them to the proper destination, we look forward to them to redouble their efforts and make it possible for us to maintain in Tripoli a "COMRADE PARTY" throughout the war. We not only trust, but know that we do not appeal in vain.

IN THE midst of an exceptionally festive week came the sadness of farewell, the departure of the Hon'ble Sir James Meston.

James Meston to England, tempered as it was with the gladness of his official elevation. We have already warmly congratulated Sir James on securing the charge of the United Provinces and have congratulated the United Provinces still more warmly on securing Sir James, and refer to his appointment again to-day because we believe the appreciation which Sir James has received from every quarter is unique alike in its warmth, its sincerity and its universality. First, it was the dinner given in his honour by the non-official members of the Council at which the Hon. Mr. Gokhale gave expression to a eulogy every word of which was amply deserved. He said "There is in Sir James a combination of qualities which must strongly appeal to everyone, whatever his race or creed or the political complexion of his views. He is a man of great ability—one of the most brilliant members of the Indian Civil Service. His devotion to duty, too, is remarkable, for many years he has been one of the hardest worked officials in the country. Then there are his scrupulous conscientiousness, and his high character. And, finally, everyone recognises in him the finest type of the English gentleman. No wonder, therefore, that Sir James enjoys in an unstinted measure the esteem and confidence of all classes. But the Indian communities see in him in addition an official of wide sympathies, of exceptionally broad and liberal views, one who not only understands but is friendly to their legitimate aspirations. Now we, the non-official members of the Viceroy's Legislative Council, share these feelings for him with the rest of our countrymen.

He has been ever ready to help non-official members with suggestions, with advice, even with guidance, and there has never been anything forbidding about him. Often when he was immersed up to the very eyes in work, often when he was simply driven—many of us have had to go to him to consult him about our figures or ask him for information which we could not obtain from sources available to us, feeling almost guilty in our own minds that we were adding to his burdens at such a time. But his great courtesy and his smile of welcome never failed, never was there the least suggestion of impatience, of annoyance or complaint, and we were invariably enabled to come away with the impression that the only thought in his mind was not that of the trouble we were giving him but of our trust in his friendly feeling which made us turn to him in our difficulties." Mr. Gokhale rightly repeated this warm appreciation in the Council itself before His Excellency, and it was in the fitness of things that his own chief, whose relations with him were throughout his secretaryship ideal, should add his own no less warm appreciation to that of the leader of non-official members. The Hon. Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson said "My Lord, I would ask your permission to dwell for a moment on the retirement from his present office of one who has been for over three anxious years my invaluable colleague and my dearly loved friend. Sir James Meston's distinguished services are so well known that it seems a work of supererogation to allude to them. It is not, I think, too much to say that for the last three years Sir James has been the guide, philosopher and friend of the Government of India. He has been more. He has been a helpful sympathetic and loyal friend to every Member of this Council. His unswerving devotion to duty, his entire subordination of all self-interest to the good of India, his ready sacrifice of ease, leave and even health in the interests of the public service, and his extraordinary capacity for carrying through the most difficult tasks without friction and with complete success are so well known to every one of us that it is hardly necessary for me to dwell on them. Sir James Meston's services during the last three years of stress and anxiety have been conspicuous and successful and it is impossible for me to exaggerate the deep obligation under which I lie towards him. I hope I may be permitted to say that we have placed the finances of India in a sounder and stronger position than they have perhaps before occupied, but if any credit does attach to the conduct of public business by the Finance Department during the last three and a half years, it should be attributed to Sir James Meston rather than to myself. I believe I shall be voicing the feelings of every one present if I say that we wish him health, prosperity and success in the high position which, on the recommendation of Lord Hardinge, he has been called upon by his Sovereign to fill." This was an appreciation as creditable to the chief as to his trusty lieutenant, and if Sir Guy was fortunate in securing such a Secretary,

Sir James was equally fortunate in securing such a superior officer. Last, but not least, came the praise of H. E. the Viceroy. Lord Hardinge said: "As regards Sir J. Meston, although it has been a great pleasure to me to appoint him to so high and important a post, Hon. Members can well understand, I am sure, what a loss he will be to me and the Government of India as Secretary in the Finance Department. I need not go into the question of his great but unassuming ability, but I am confident that his work and services will be to the great advantage of India in whatever position he is employed." To all these, the replies of Sir James Meston were short and the pattern of modesty, a quality which is as marked as his sharafat which none who sees him can fail to note. We wish him Godspeed and a safe return to India. The United Provinces can indeed be envied on their good luck, but who can say they do not deserve it?

ONCE more we hear authoritatively that the Anglo-Russian Convention is based on the integrity and independence of Persia. But one effect of that Convention is that when there is alleged to be some commotion in Meshed it is the Russians that proclaim martial law. Another is that when a paltry sum of 15 lakhs is lent to Persia by the British Government, not a pai of which she can touch, we are not above making an honest penny thereby, charging no less than 7 per cent. interest in spite of the excellent security of the Customs which Belgian officers control. In return for this we secure safe passage for our merchandise in the South, and, what is either worth nothing or worth everything, a recognition from Persia of an Agreement to which she was no party and which was signed behind her back. Is it so soon forgotten that between 1899 and 1903 Russia lent the then Shah no less than 44 crores at 6 per cent. interest, half of which was spent on the personal extravagances of that monarch, and that Great Britain tried hard in 1898 to lend this amount herself, but failing to impose the now paltry condition of appointing some European officers to control the Customs that were to be hypothecated, came down to an offer to lend the money even without this condition, though like the foolish virgin of the parable, much too late? Contrast the independence of Persia even under that amiable imbecile, Muzaferuddin Shah, with what the Anglo-Russian Agreement has made it. Compare the Russian Army of Occupation in Northern Persia with the similar British force in Egypt with a larger area and greater population. Place the hitherto free appointment and dismissal of foreigners as its officials by the Persian Government side by side with the embargo now placed even on their transfer within the same zone. Compare and contrast all this and then compare and contrast the tyrant's rule of Mohammed Ali with the progressive reforms even of a harassed Mejlis, and say if the Anglo-Russian Convention has proved a safeguard of the independence and integrity of Persia, and if it is the Mejlis that has made the situation in Persia "as unsatisfactory as possible" or the Convention and the Russian influence which it revived after its almost complete disappearance on Japan's victory and the Persian revolution. Unless that is done it is no use holding up the Convention for the admiring gaze of multitudes. We know enough to say that Lord Hardinge's presence at the British Foreign Office, even though it could not prevent the signing of the Convention, was an assurance of sympathetic dealings with Persia. His successor there has dispelled that hope, but the presence of Lord Hardinge here and his first-hand knowledge of the hearings of the Persian question on India ought to be an assurance that even if there is to be no sentimental attachment towards the land of Firdusi and Hafiz, Sa'di and Omar, there would be some sense in our schemes for safeguarding our Perso-Baluch frontier, and guaranteeing the integrity of our own Empire.

THE thanks of the Press of Calcutta are due to the Hon. Mr. S. Sinha, the editor of the Hindustan Review, who once more made this unsociable community

A Press Dinner. his guest at an excellent dinner at the Calcutta Club a week ago and brought its members face to face with each other. We wonder how long Bengal and the late lamentable capital of India would permit Behar to give them a lead in such sociability and how long they would refuse to follow that lead. Instead of doing anything to remove the blot upon their escutcheon, the statesmen of Calcutta journalism still harp on the old theme of "honour where honours are not due." But like one of our journalistic chiefs and rajahs, we detest controversies and shall say no more about it, unless we find the belated composers ready to set up three solid columns on the reasons that led Government to lop off the "K" from the title conferred on a sheriff who had the additional distinction of being a journalist. But as the composers did not share the dinner and its usual accompaniments, they are not disposed to appreciate our long-windedness. We therefore stop, only repeating once more our sincere hope that it will not be necessary for the mandarins of Calcutta journalism to be inoculated with a Delhi boil or the virus of a Delhi debauch to become really human and sociable. To Mr. Sinha, our thanks once more.

The Compulsory Education Debate.

II.

EVEN if it be granted that India can gain nothing by following the example of England or Japan, of the Philippines or Ceylon—for Sir Harcourt Butler said that “transmarine analogies” are unsafe—there still was the overland analogy of Baroda. There was no “fur coat” here, but as light and airy garments as the heat of the Indian plains required. Baroda was a test case and it was something more. The very zest with which the Hon. Member for Education defended the Government against the charge of lagging behind Baroda betrayed, what Mr. Gokhale had expressed as his belief, that the Government could never be satisfied with that position. It is therefore necessary to examine the figures of Baroda in some detail. After a lengthy reference studded with gleaming figures, Sir Harcourt Butler concluded that he hoped “we shall hear no more of lagging behind Baroda.” We are sorry to prove that hope somewhat illusive, for the case of Baroda is not so easily settled. Now, Baroda spends more than 12 lakhs a year on education out of total disbursements amounting to 137 lakhs, or about 9 per cent, whereas the British Government spends—and that after the rapid increase of the last few years—a little over 3 million sterling out of a little less than 80 millions, or less than 4 per cent. Sir Harcourt had tried to explain this last year by referring to the smaller needs of military defence in Baroda. But Baroda’s Army and Contingent commitment money cost it about 22 lakhs a year, or 16 per cent of its total disbursements, while the Military Services cost us 20½ millions, or 25 per cent. But Baroda contributes to the British Indian exchequer its share of the Customs, Railways, Post, Telegraph, Mint and Opium revenues, and is to that extent contributing to Imperial defence in addition to its own Army charges. In any case, few Indians approve of our bloated Military Budget, and we shall not grudge Sir Harcourt a transfer of about 25 per cent of the Military charges to the Educational Budget—if Sir Edward Grey and Russia would only permit us.

Coming to elementary education itself, Baroda spends 6½d per head of its population while British India spends a solitary penny. Of the population of Baroda 86 attend a school to 119 per cent. of British India, and while 79.6 per cent. of the boys and 47.6 per cent. of the girls of school-going age go to school in Baroda, only 21.5 per cent. boys and 4 per cent. girls do so in British India. But Sir Harcourt Butler is not disposed to accept this as a true basis of comparison. We should not compare the whole of British India with a small State like Baroda, but must compare the figures of adjoining territories. All this looks plausible enough if we forget that Baroda is not a compact area, but has four separate districts cut off from each other by intervening British and other territory, and that it has almost as great variations of land and population as British India itself. However, rejecting this basis of comparison we come to that selected by Sir Harcourt Butler himself, and we ask him if in all fairness he does not think it is wholly misleading. He takes the average of all the four districts of Baroda, and refusing to compare it with the average of all the districts of British India, compares it with the figures of the two best districts of Gujarat, Surat and Broach, because only a part of Baroda territory adjoins them. We shall say nothing about the adjacent Native States, such as Baroda, Dharampur, Sachin, Rajpipla, Chota Udaipur, Cambay, Lunawar, Palanpur, Radhanpur and the Kathiawar States. But may we not ask why no figures were quoted about the adjacent British districts of Khandesh, Kaira, Panch Mahals, and Ahmedabad, not to mention the British cantonment at Dresa? If it is unfair to compare the figures of Baroda with the whole of British India, it is still more unfair to compare those of all the districts of Baroda with those of selected districts of British India. It is, of course, very pleasing to find that after 5 years of compulsion the literacy among males is 17.5 and among females 2 per cent in Baroda, but 27.4 and 2.6 per cent respectively in Broach and 24.7 and 3.5 per cent respectively in Surat, and it may not be very disconcerting to find the school enrolment in Baroda 85 per cent. as against 69 per cent. in Broach when the attendance is only two-thirds in Baroda and generally three-fourths in British India. Mr. Gokhale, however, corrected the last set of figures, pointing out an enrolment of 9.5 in Baroda against 6.5 in Broach, and showed that the percentage of attendance to the total population was 13.6 in Navsari as against only 6 in Broach. What is still more important is that if comparisons are made district by district, Baroda would in many cases be ahead of the neighbouring British districts, for its figures are spoilt by the northern district of Kadi which adjoins Ahmedabad, and by the forest area of Narsari.

In the latest summary of the report of the 1911 Census received only a few weeks ago, the Census Superintendent states that the “Navsari district . . . though having Animists as one-fourth of its population, has on an average one literate male in every six . . . Kadi, having a large Thakarda, Koli, and Anjuna Kanbi population, stands last in the diffusion of the rudiments of learning, having only one literate male in every eight . . . In the city of Baroda there is one educated female in every 11. Then comes Amreli with 1 in 28. Then follow Navsari and Baroda districts with 1 in 40 and 54 respectively. Kadi stands last with only 1 educated female in every 90.” The general literacy (both sexes combined) is roughly 7, 9, 11 and 12 per cent. in the districts of Amreli, Baroda, Navsari and Kadi respectively. With such large variations, how can it be fair to take an average of all these four districts for comparison with the two best districts of Gujarat? A really fair comparison would, in fact, be a comparison of taluka with adjoining taluka, for, as the Census Superintendent remarks, “the talukas comprised in each district show very uneven results.” This is evident from the fact that in the one district of Navsari while the Navsari taluka has 1 literate in every 5 persons—which we do not think any taluka of Broach or Surat can beat—there is 1 in as many as 44 in the forest taluka of Songadh, 1 in 45 in the similar taluka of Vekal, and 1 in no less than 90 in the jungle-covered Umapada which is as much the abode of wild beasts as of men. If Sir Harcourt Butler is satisfied with not lagging behind Umapada, he is welcome to that satisfaction, but if likes are compared with likes he will often have to hear about lagging behind Baroda till he leaves it behind on the road, whether it be the high road of voluntary effort or the lower road of compulsion.

Before we close the account of Baroda we must deal with two other points mentioned by the Hon. the Member for Education. He quotes the extremely cautious praise of Mr. Seddon, which is highly characteristic of that excellent official, and then he refers to the fact that the fines for non-attendance amount to over Rs. 60,000 a year and give an incidence per head of population of double the fee incidence per head of population in elementary schools in British India. As regards the comparative incidence of fines and fees, it amounts to this, that Baroda fines its subjects twice as much for ignorance as the British Government fines its subjects for attempts to obtain knowledge. But Sir Harcourt is not justified in concluding that the amount of fines indicates “a considerable measure of popular hostility.” The number of defaulters, as Sir Gangadhar Chitambar mentioned, was 7,408 in the year 1909-10, and considering that 164,737 children were then at school, the percentage of defaulters is not great. The fact is that Mr. Seddon was from the first disposed towards severity in punishing defaulters, and, as he says in his report for 1909-10, in order to prevent half the girls who ought to go to school under the law but do not do so, and a good many boys that manage to escape, from absenting themselves from school, the maximum fine was raised from Rs. 2 per month to Rs. 5, and a continuous absence for ten days which rendered the parents liable to fine was reduced to six days. It is this which accounts for heavy fines, and it was to the escaping of half the girls and a good many boys that Mr. Seddon referred when he said that compulsion as then exercised was “by no means an assured success.” We trust it has not escaped the notice of the Member for Education that in 1910 there was issued a report of the Education Commission of Baroda presided over by Mr. Seddon himself. In that report Mr. Seddon and the Commissioners wrote “that the system of free compulsory primary Education initiated by the Baroda Government is a boon to His Highness’ subjects and should be persevered with and extended.” Since then, it has been applied even to the most backward areas, territories to which Mr. Gokhale would not dream of applying his Bill for some decades after its passage into law. If anything is certain it is this, that compulsory education would be continued in Baroda, and there is danger that those who still regard it as an experiment that may have to be discontinued in the near future may without sufficient reason be mistaken for those who make the wish the father to the thought. Compulsion in Baroda has been a success, for it has already doubled the percentage of children of school-going age going to school, and it is hoped to be a still greater success in the future. But if a well known soap “won’t wash clothes,” compulsory education in Baroda cannot have the retrospective effect of making unlettered dotards literate.

Mr. Gokhale had, however, given the instance of Baroda not so much to show its superiority to British India as to justify the resort to compulsion and to show the baseness of the fear of political danger and popular hostility against the administration, and he can justly claim that even if Baroda is lagging behind British India, there is all the more reason for the British Government to be of good courage and introduce compulsion. “That with a smaller general spread of education,” said Mr. Gokhale, “the Gaekwar could introduce compulsion was an argument against those who wanted education to be much more largely spread before introducing compulsion in British territory.”

To Baroda must now be added the overland analogy of another State, namely Sangli. Here the percentage of the total population at school was only 2, the same as the general average of British India and also of the adjoining British territory. Sangli is, therefore, an even better test case for compulsion and the dangers of compulsion. Captain Burke, a British officer who acted as Administrator during the minority of the Chief, tried an experiment in compulsion under the very eyes of the Bombay Government, though it is doubtful if any one in the Bombay Secretariat noticed it at all. He felt that the school population should at least be 4 per cent of the total population of Sangli, and proceeding on different lines altogether, ordered that where the school population was not 4 per cent compulsion should apply, and that when it reached that proportion compulsion should cease. Every village with a population of 400 was supplied with a school, and the responsibility for the attendance of at least 4 per cent was thrown on the village officers. The result was that what Captain Burke desired was achieved in 3 years, and the number of school children was doubled, increasing from about 5,000 to nearly 10,000. So much can compulsion do, and that without causing any appreciable commotion.

As a matter of fact once education comes in the wake of compulsion, the feeling that compulsion is being used grows weaker and weaker and after some time almost ceases to exist. Most people when they talk of the evils of compulsion forget that in a thousand and one things they do every day they are acting on compulsion, whether that compulsion be applied by law, or religion, or public opinion. But as actions are repeated oftener and oftener the sense of obligation is by degrees weakened, habits are slowly formed and gradually character is developed. Commencing with compulsion, civilized mankind is as much shocked in the end with the discovery of the origin of character as Moliere's barber was when he learnt that he habitually spoke prose.

While on the subject of the hostility of the people towards an administration that would compel the ignorant to secure knowledge for their children, it must not be forgotten that whereas both in Baroda and in Sangli it was the State itself that took the initiative, Mr. Gokhale leaves this to the leaders and representatives of the people themselves. In the first place, there must be a certain amount of diffusion of rudimentary education before the Bill can become applicable to a particular area, and the exact amount of that diffusion has been left entirely with the Government. With 33 1/3 per cent, or, if that is too low, 40 per cent of the boys of school going age going to school voluntarily, there will be about the same number that will be made to go there by the use of a mild but effective compulsion. That makes the chance of any great commotion against compulsion fairly small. In the second place, compulsion would rest not on the Government, which has already shown to the world how reluctant it is to resort to it, but on the people's representatives themselves. The Government would practically be a neutral body, and if the people and their representatives fall out, the danger would be the latter's and not one involving Government. In fact, those officials who dislike the growth of the representative element in the administration of the country will find in any such untoward result of compulsion the one opportunity after their heart of discrediting representative institutions in India. The Hon. Mr. Dadabhai thinks that officials may force the representatives of the people to go too fast, and is jubilant that a high official of his own Province quotes him with approval. We do not know whether Sir Reginald Craddock would find much room for consolation in this, considering that some of his ideal citizens whom he regarded as the best possible counsellors of a District Officer only the other day are thus made out to be mere pawns on the official chessboard. Nor should we think those ideal citizens would be much gratified at this exposure. As a matter of fact, the Hon. Mr. Dadabhai is himself a representative of those representatives, and such suggestions are likely to make people curious to know whether he owes his own election to the Council to the good offices of a District Officer. For our part, we foresee no commotion, but even if there is some in stray localities, it will not only give the malicious an opportunity of creating estrangement between the constituents and the men of their choice, but it would also bring the Government and the representatives of the people closer than ever. That in itself would be such a blessing that all those who desire to see both the Government and the non-official leaders become more responsible in administration and in criticism, would bless Mr. Gokhale for having introduced such a unifying measure in the country.

However, wherever there is fear of considerable hostility being aroused against compulsion, the remedy is entirely in the hands of Government itself. It need not in such cases accord the necessary sanction to the application of compulsion. It is said in reply to this that Local Governments will then find it very difficult to go against the popular demand for compulsion. We do not know what those who talk like this of Local Governments take them for. They have had the courage to oppose the Bill in every case in spite of the almost unanimous demand of all the Provinces, and yet it is seriously asked how a Local Government could possibly find enough courage to refuse the demand in some remote district or stray municipality. Verily this is a case of the elephant managing to escape bodily through an opening, but getting its tail stuck in that narrow aperture.

If with all these safeguards in the Bill, Government has not courage enough to march ahead, we are rather sorry for it. But it reminds us of one of Mr. Kipling's short Simla stories in which a hill captain making love to a grass widow in the undisturbed retreat of the Simla cemetery was caught there by a sudden downpour of rain and saw a grave that was newly dug filled with six inches of water. He pitied the fellow that would have to lie in that dismal and damp cavity, but himself died the same evening in a landslip, and had to be buried in a grave with a foot of rain water where he had objected to a bare six inches some hours before. It is not by a lack of courage that dangers are avoided, and the history of the British in India supplies ample evidence on that subject. Dangers have to be faced, not fled from, and as Mr. Gokhale says, "danger really lay not in a diffusion of education but in the withholding of it." After all, "perpetual ignorance for the mass of the people was too heavy, too terrible a price to ask for all the advantages which the most enthusiastic supporter of British rule could claim for it", and we know that our King and his representative in India do not mean to exact that price, but, on the contrary, wish to make the education of the masses the greatest advantage and the surest prop of that rule.

Another objection was urged that even if compulsion is not dangerous it is superfluous, and education can for long grow indefinitely on a voluntary basis if only educational facilities can be provided. It is not compulsion, say the objectors, that is wanted, but more schools. It is said that more money is wanted to open schools where there is already a demand for them on a voluntary basis, and in the United Provinces some schools have had to be closed for want of funds. Are we then to stop the expansion of the voluntary system in the backward areas in order to make experiments in compulsion in the more advanced localities? Mr. Gokhale's reply to this was given in his first speech by anticipation, and we wish Sir Harcourt Butler had answered that contention instead of repeating one that had already been met with. "There were," he said, "two distinct factors operating to produce a low school attendance in the country, first, a grievous inadequacy of schools and, secondly, the apathy of parents in many places where schools existed. And the remedy for that state of things was also twofold: (1) an obligation thrown on local bodies to provide adequate educational facilities, and (2) an obligation thrown on parents compelling them to send their children to school. It was necessary to provide for both obligations and ensure their simultaneous enforcement." It was incumbent on the Government members to show that where educational facilities had already been provided there was adequate attendance. With educational statistics by their side, they yet failed to prove that no school had to be closed on account of the parents' apathy and that none was in a moribund condition for the same reason. On the other hand, some of the papers received by the Government of India on the Bill unmistakably showed that these conditions existed largely, and the fact had already been admitted by Mr. Orange. As for schools being closed in the United Provinces for want of funds, we wonder whether Sir John Hewett could not divert some of his generosity from exhibitions to schools, and whether the Government of India could not place that backward area in the same financial position as other Provinces by readjusting the Provincial Settlement on the basis of a four-eighths Provincial share of its Land Revenue instead of the wholly exceptional three-eighths share allotted at present. Mr. Gokhale leaves it to the pressure of public opinion to compel local areas to provide educational facilities, instead of incorporating the principle of the English Act of 1870, compulsory provision of such facilities, in his own Bill. The reason for this difference is not far to seek. As another resolution of his, supported this time by the Hon. Mr. Dadabhai, also indicated clearly, it is impossible to press local bodies to spend more largely on education when we know that their resources are wholly inadequate even for their present liabilities. The utmost that could now be done, and is done in the Bill, is to insist on the provision of educational facilities on all local bodies desiring to introduce compulsion, and to demand from them a substantial fraction of the cost. In Baroda, however, H. H. the Gaekwar has made it incumbent on all local bodies to devote a third of their resources to education, and where this entailed too great a hardship to begin with, he supplemented the allotment from the local cess with a grant from the State. But it is impossible to say whether a statutory obligation of this nature can be thrown on local bodies in British India also, unless a searching enquiry into the adequacy of local resources for local burdens takes place.

Yet another objection against compulsion was that in view of the corruption prevailing in the lower strata of Government servants, compulsion would lead to petty exactions and harassment of the people. We wish all this was remembered when the question of the powers of the Police in India was discussed. It is indeed strange that the man who would be a lamb in the Police would forthwith become a lion when entrusted with petty duties in connection with compulsory education. Did this fear ever worry an administrator who gave inquisitorial powers to the Police? Did it prevent compulsory vaccination and has it led to all these conjectural evils in that Department? We can ourselves rely on some slight personal experience of corrupt village officials, and we may add that those in Baroda do not lag behind their confrères in British India in the matter of illegal use of authority. But while compulsion is not directly to be exercised by these under Mr. Gokhale's Bill, it is so exercised in Baroda. There it is the village Patel that is the sole judge in the case of early offences. He has powers to condone the first three offences of a defaulter. Thereafter he has authority to punish him for the next two offences. When all these powers have been exhausted, the cases go to the Taluka or Tahsil Officer. There is no popular Committee such as Mr. Gokhale proposes to deal with these cases. Yet what are the results in Baroda? It is not the people that complain of their Patel's exactions, but the Patel himself who finds it wearisome to collect the fines, and generally recommends the defaulters to the Taluka Officer for leniency. We wish some of the most voluble critics of the measure spent three months in Baroda watching compulsion in actual working order instead of wasting their own time and the Council's in condemning it for hypothetical dangers and conjectural fears. The Hon. Messrs. Dadabhoi and Shah would profit much by being posted as Taluka Officers in Baroda, preferably in the forest tracts of Navsari. We hope their constituents would insist on this preliminary training for the intelligent discharge of their duties.

The Viceroy on Turkey and Persia.

THE VICEROY wound up the Session of the Imperial Legislative Council with a speech of absorbing interest, with the greater portion of which we hope to deal in detail on another occasion. Two of the subjects that almost monopolize the attention of our readers are the war between Italy and Turkey and the fate of Persia, and in an unusual reference to both these His Excellency showed a consideration for Moslem feeling in India which deserves the gratitude of that community.

It could not indeed be expected that the Viceroy would show any marked leaning towards either of the belligerents in Tripoli, but it is enough, if he is sensitive to Moslem feeling on the subject of that war, and if in his capacity as the head of a Government ruling in His Majesty's name over a fourth of the total Moslem population of the world, he not only communicates his impressions of Moslem desires to His Majesty's Government but also advises that Government to assay at their proper value the sentiments of seventy million subjects of the King. They must, indeed, be grateful to him for taking prompt and effective action with regard to the feared bombardment of Jeddah and Yembooh and the blockade of these pilgrim ports. But we hope it has not escaped Lord Hardinge's notice that the Mussalmans of India, so often credited with fanaticism along with their co-religionists abroad, had with the exercise of a very remarkable self-control, maintained a patient attitude in the face of such provocation, leaving the protection of the Holy Places to Him Whom neither slumber seizeth nor sleep. They feared that if they betrayed much excitement they might be playing into the hands of Italy, who seeks to force intervention on the Powers after having burnt almost her last cartridge at the same time that she burnt her fingers. We are glad that "His Majesty's Government have, in conjunction with other Powers, already taken steps to mediate with a view to securing an honourable peace." But we do not think any peace would be honourable in which an aggressor was allowed to remain in possession even of an inch of the land to which he had no claim or title, on which he descended much as a group of bandits would descend on a peaceful, defenceless and unexpecting hamlet, which he turned into a shambles as few bandits would do, and yet which he is wholly unable to secure, in spite of every advantage that wealth, numbers and appliances can give, simply because he lacked the courage that enables even a bandit to some admiration.

Lord Morley had recognised on a previous occasion the legitimate character of Moslem sympathies in India with Moslems in trouble abroad, and now the Viceroy sets his seal on that legitimacy by referring on so public and important an occasion to "external affairs in which the interests of a very large and influential section of the community are sentimentally, though indirectly, affected." We can assure his lordship that such frank recognition of the extra-territorial patriotism of the Mussalmans of India is an act of wise statesmanship for which the Government of India would never have reason to regret. It is only the shortsightedness of those who seldom see even a few feet beyond their noses that leads to discontent and trouble. When Lord Hardinge, who is not unfamiliar with Islam elsewhere, has done this, we think he would follow it up with a clear intimation to His Majesty's Government that if Great Britain wishes to strengthen still more the undoubted loyalty of Indian Mussalmans she should show in the future a more unmistakable leaning towards Islamic States, and should for the present refrain from pressing peace on Turkey on terms which a self-respecting Power cannot be expected to accept. In fact, even while the war is in progress, England can endear herself to the Moslem subjects of His Majesty by checking the masterfulness of Lord Kitchener in Egypt, where, it appears, neither treaty obligations, nor international law are being respected, and by asserting herself in the cause of peace and justice if any of the Balkan States take advantage of Turkey's difficulties and provoke her beyond endurance. There is in all this nothing unfair or too ambitious; but whether these suggestions are acted upon or not, it is undoubted that a coercion of Turkey to give up any of the rights that she possessed in Tripoli before the war would produce just that feeling in India which His Excellency and all friends of the Mussalmans and of their Government would devoutly wish to avoid. As His Excellency explained, "the almost unprecedented distinction of the simultaneous conferment of these two orders by the Sultan on His Majesty the King Emperor is a striking act of confidence and goodwill," and we trust that such profound confidence and great goodwill would be amply reciprocated.

Tempted by the example of Sir Guy Blotwood Wilson, the Viceroy also indulged in a retrospect and looked back "to the days when our Indian revenues were clouded by two great shadows, the fall in exchange and the fear of invasion from our North West frontier." With reference to the latter, His Excellency said that a heavy toll was being taken on our revenues by this incubus, for the defence of our frontier and the preparation of our army for war formed one of the two outstanding features of the period which His Excellency reviewed. The Viceroy is now satisfied that the two great cycles of expenditure, which filled the rich years between the famine of 1899 and the crisis of 1907 and, overlapping each other, between them swallowed up the fruits of our prosperity, have now disappeared. "The situation," said Lord Hardinge, "has now entirely changed. We leave it to the Hon. Mr. Gokhale and the officer in charge of the inquiry into high prices to discuss and explain how far, if at all, the currency policy of the Government in recent times has removed the first incubus, and whether the change in situation is merely one in which the misery only changes its shape and form but retains its character. But so far as the defence of India is concerned we shall examine somewhat closely the statement that the momentous change that the Russian Agreement brought into our relations with our great Asiatic neighbour removed the menace on our frontier and the rapid growth of our army expenditure has now been checked and curtailed."

It is not only because Lord Hardinge is the head of the Indian administration that great weight attaches to such a pronouncement. He has had a distinguished and a long career in diplomacy, and has therein acquired knowledge both of Persia and Russia, and more important than all, he was intimately associated with the negotiations that resulted in the Anglo-Russian Agreement. His was the arduous task of the green room attendant, and his the prompting in the wings. We may go even further and say that the diplomatic situation, dangerous as it always was, became far worse when he left charge of the Foreign Office and Sir Arthur Nicholson who made his début with the "Ultimatum" to Persia of October 16th, 1910, took up his part behind the scenes.

Now, to take up the defence of India first, we are not sure that His Excellency is wholly justified in claiming that it has been secured. So long as Persia remained an effective barrier between us and the Muscovite, our energies were mainly concentrated on the Indo-Afghan frontier. During the last 35 years nearly we had contributed materially to the strengthening of Afghanistan, the first line of our defence, and had endeavoured to induce the tribes between us and Afghanistan to become as friendly as frontier tribes can become. That was our second line of defence. When Lord Kitchener came out to India, he found himself face to face with an aggressive neighbour who had unmistakable designs on our property and lived only a few doors from us. He also found that instead of providing fully against that danger, our military policy was still based on the hasty, vindictive and suspicious basis of 1858. In spite of the fact that Lord Curzon was creating more than a ripple on the surface of the Indian waters, he saw that our Army was not required in the interior but must needs be concentrated on the North West Frontier. Accepting his verdict, we permitted him to reorganise our defences at a tremendous cost. That was our third line of defence. Behind that there lay nothing but the last and unfailing line of defence, the unflinching firm loyalty of the people, emasculated and cowed down, it is true, but still anxious to maintain British rule in India in the belief that the Union Jack was the flag of liberty and law, and taught by their assiduous British teachers that Russia was the enemy of both. But what is the situation to-day? In October 1886, Sir John Tennick drew a two-page cartoon for Punch over the legend "What of the Night?" Dame Europa was then represented as anxiously scanning the skies, and the only constellation pictured on the firmament was the Great Bear of the North in a posture of stealthy advance. We do not desire to be the prophets of evil, but scanning the political skies as we do nightly, we still see the stealthy advance of the Northern Bear towards India. All that has been altered is the route. The destination is still the same. In military phraseology, the frontal attack which has been proved in recent warfare to be mostly disastrous to the attackers, has been given up. But our Perso-Baluch flank is being turned and we seem to be hypnotised by the stealthy motion of the Bear and lulled to sleep by the soft lullaby of its footfall. When the Anglo-Russian Agreement was made the Times wrote that "hitherto the real danger of Russian expansion lay in the fact that Russia might, by way of Persia and Seistan, reach Baluchistan and our Indian frontier, and then by some strategical road slip past our great defensive position on the North-West Frontier." How has that real danger then been removed? Instead of making the advance of Russia by way of Persia and Seistan on Baluchistan and our Indian frontier impossible, we are ourselves providing the strategical road by which Russia could slip past our great defensive position on the North-West Frontier. The desert and swamps which constitute the greater portion of the British sphere of influence are a poor enough barrier when we know that even the North Western barrier has not kept back a determined invader of India. But a trans-Persian Railway--which is no less likely to destroy all independence in the case of Persia than the Suez Canal has done in the case of Egypt--is being seriously discussed, and Colonel Yates in the Debate in the Commons on the Address "saw no reason why those railways should not be sanctioned without delay." He added, "If a trans-Persian Railway was constructed it was important that there should be a clear run for British goods from India. The gauge should be the same as that on Indian railways, at any rate as far as Lipahan, the capital of Southern Persia." We ask, could anything be more fatuous? If such a railway is constructed, would it provide a clear run only for British goods from India and not an equally clear run for Russian troops to India? It is as if an engineer who wished to drain away the sewage of a ship bored a big hole in its bottom, forgetting that if the sewage could thereby escape out, the rushing tide could also escape in. And what is there to prevent it? The Times found its consolation in the Anglo-Russian Convention, just as a certain old lady found hers in that soothing word Mesopotamia. "The fact that we have secured from Russia a pledge to refrain from intervention in these regions is a sufficient compensation." And yet it is not as if this is the first time that Russia has given a solemn pledge. Did not a broken covenant in March 1885 bring England to the verge of war with Russia? Did not Mr Gladstone, in his famous speech on the 27th April of that year, say in the tones of thunder, "We cannot close this book and say we will look into it no more"? We should like to quote here the words of Prof Browne--that truly chivalrous Englishman and ardent lover of Persia--on the subject of such pledges. Referring to the assurances given by the British Minister at Teheran to the Persian Foreign Minister on the 4th September, 1907, he wrote in his book on the Persian Revolution

Thus England pledged her honour not merely as regards her own course of conduct, but as regards Russia's, a rash pledge, as some may think, for what would England do if Russia should break her promise?—a contingency, if the history of her former proceedings in Central Asia be considered, which cannot be regarded as wholly impossible. She scarcely could, and certainly would not go to war for a breach of an Agreement especially designed to secure peace and her only other course would be to go on pretending that Russia was observing the Agreement as loyally as herself, until the facts of the case could no longer be ignored, and then to declare that she could not consent to be bound by an Agreement which did not bind the other contracting party, and that henceforth the Agreement must be regarded as null and void.

Who shall say that this forecast is too much in the vein of Cassandra? We already see that war cannot—some responsible people even say dare not—be declared. We shall not be so uncharitable as to say that the other course, the course of consciously false pretences is being followed, for luckily there is still a middle course, the comfortable and smooth highway of self-deception. But even if this prophecy is fulfilled to the letter there is more at stake than the disappearance of the Agreement. There is still the real danger of Russian expansion, and if Colonel Yates can have his way, Russia will have a fine railroad whereon to continue her peaceful progress towards the Indian Empire.

His Excellency speaks of the check and curtailment of military expenditure but the economy loudly promised a year ago have resulted in this. After that expenditure had been "subjected to close examination in every branch during the current year, in the first instance by the Heads of Departments at Army Headquarters and afterwards by an informal Committee over which the present Chief of the General Staff presided", the Budget that has just been passed took account of Rs. 28½ lakhs of "permanent economies or temporary avoidance of expenditure." Considering the tremendous advertisement for which the friends and foes of economy were alike responsible, and considering also the fact that our Military Budget amounts to 31 crores, is not this wonderful aggregate of "permanent economies" and "temporary avoidance of expenditure"—how much of each, we are not told—of the same species as the mouse that was born after the labours of the mountain? What is even more significant, His Excellency has not even tried to convince us that these eternal and ephemeral economies are the result of the recognition of a change in the military situation. We, in fact, claim that it is the prospective loss of the Opium revenue and the demands of education and sanitation which are daily growing bolder and more insistent, that have compelled the military authorities to clip and prune. We shall certainly await the result of the Nicholson Committee; but present indications are that far from going back to expenditure of the days that preceded Lord Kitchener's re-organisation, we shall have to undertake another costly reorganisation on our Perso-Baluch border. Should Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson by some misfortune not return after his well-earned rest, and should Sir William Meyer be given the financial portfolio, we predict, more in sorrow than in arrogance, that military expenditure would once more go up. We already hear the rumbling in the skies that presages after Sir Guy the deluge so long delayed.

We have purposely devoted our attention here to the Indian aspect of the crisis, for in this Kaliyuga no sentiment seems to have any effect unless it is a sordid one, and no misfortune plays the magnet to our sympathies unless it is in some ways brought home to us. But for all that, the Persian aspect of the crisis is full of tragic interest. We shall not question the accuracy of His Excellency's statement that "in Persia the situation during the past two years has been as unsatisfactory as possible." We shall not even enter into a discussion of the steps which the Government of India took in trying to improve the situation. As a matter of fact we dealt with that euphemism of "strengthening the consular guards" with four squadrons, and the readiness of the rest of two whole regiments to embark, when that step was first projected. We have also on a previous occasion praised the good sense and moderation of the Government of India in dealing with Persia after the Smart incident, and we are ready to do so again, even though we are doubtful about the propriety, as judged by pre-existing usage, of sending a British Government escort of half a squadron with specie belonging to a Bank. We agree with most of what His Excellency said about the expansive tendencies of all foreign interference in weak countries, and are glad that in spite of the mischievous activity of the Forward Policy School among the advisers of Government, better counsels prevailed. But we venture to ask if we are not being thrown from the frying pan into the fire when instructions are being issued to the Resident at Bushire, doubtless at the insistent suggestion of Sir Percy Cox himself, "to open negotiations with the tribes for the punishment of those who led the attack upon our convoy, and for the proper guarding and security of the British and Indian caravans passing along the main trade routes of the South." This explanation may or may not dispel "the fears of those who have imagined that we had leanings towards the partition of Persia with Russia," but it creates the still greater fear that His Majesty's Government is ignoring the Central Government at Teheran altogether and setting up an imperium in imperio in that unfortunate country. It is an open secret that some tribes had years ago offered to place themselves in direct relations with Great Britain, but the suggestion of this tremendous comp was relegated to a musty pigeon-hole as too dangerous to touch. To-day we see that comp not only being considered but in fact acted upon, and we are asked to believe that this would keep intact the integrity and independence of Persia. We would here draw attention to what the correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung has stated about the new administrative settlement, and it would now seem that because Teheran is in the Russian zone, its Central Government is left to the tender mercies of Russia, while, "in view of the necessity of looking after our own interests," we have set up a different machinery to administer, or leave to us to administer for it, the British zone in the South. And yet, who dare talk of a partition of Persia? Verily words have changed their meanings when we feast and exchange toasts over the rapid recovery of the patient only because, in the words of Mr. Lynch, a Liberal M.P. who has large commercial interests in Persia, the patient "is lying between life and death, paralysed out, almost dismembered, helpless and friendless at our feet." Who talks of partition at this moment? God forbid!

Anecdote.

MICHAEL CASEY, a politician in San Francisco who has been in office and on the city pay-roll for many years, was addressing a meeting of his fellow citizens. It was a labour meeting. "You men must know," spouted Casey, "that you are the great body politic in this city. You are the roots and trunk of our great municipal tree, while we who represent you in office are merely the branches on that magnificent tree."

"Thru for you, Mike!" piped a man in the back of the hall. "But did ye ever notice all the fruit grows on the branches?"

The Council.

BY THE HON MR GUP.

"As large a charter as the wind to blow on whom I please."

—As You Like It

February 27th (Contd.)

COUNCIL met again to-day, with Sir Guy still in chair. Diffident about giving rulings like all Vice-Presidents, and not having the privilege of a Judge to make laws which the legislature never contemplated, Sir Guy was anxious to dissociate himself from altering any Council rule. But in order to save time wasted in reading out questions, shrewdly threw out suggestion to hon. members who dream of Parliamentary Government to adopt "the formula which obtains in the English House of Commons, where a member, instead of reading out at length the question standing in his name merely says, 'I beg to put question No. 74, 397, 426, or whatever the number may be.' Dig'er-Patty thought it far better to do this than postpone his dramatic tea-parties as he had to do on the preceding day, nearly missing a cosy corner dinner into the bargain, and the Free Lance of the Tiwanas thought it would then be possible even for him to put a question or two in the course of three years without having to spell it out before the Council. Bhupen, the wise, was most satisfied, however, for if one formula of Parliamentary Government in England was adopted now, who could stop him from taking the whole procedure as dattak one of these days?

So Mud Holkar was the first to name the number of his questions and pause for a reply. Pointed out huge loss resulting from railways from the commencement of construction to 1894-95 and asked for detailed information hereafter. Railway Squeeper gladly accepted the figure for losses before he laid himself out for the State railways to run over in their smooth career, but when it came to more recent times, rushed into the realms of the occult such as the great development of trade and agriculture which increased State revenue in a mysterious manner.

Dig'er-Patty anxious to know if Council Regulations were on executive anvil for some more tinkering, and if so, whether non-official Vulcans would be allowed to forge lighter chains for Representation. Reggie admitted the obvious, but when it came to non-official hammering, took cover behind the Local Governments, pending receipt of whose proposals it was impossible to say what may happen. After all, matter far too important to talk about without consulting the Gibsons and the Georges, the Johns and the Charleses, the Louises and the Harveys. Surely Dig'er-Patty doesn't think it to be quite so simple as the annulment of the Partition and the transfer of the Capital?

The Mild Hindu learnt from Beethoven that the permanent feature of the South-African grievance was still the thing of beauty and the joy for ever that it had hitherto been, and correspondence was still in progress, the Secretary of State and the Government of India protracting their virtuous sympathies for the Indians while Natal was making a bicatomb of men's responsibilities and women's honour.

Also informed Cross-Bencher that as perhaps the Secretary of State had been kept exceedingly busy in saying "Yes" to Government of India on other questions as fast as ever he could, he had found no time to reply about Indian disabilities in Canada.

After this preliminary canter, the second heat of the Mixed Marriage Stakes commenced, and the East Bengal Shetland was the first to start off. Dig'er-Patty, by the Grace of God, Defender of Monogamy, thought it his duty to accord his full 4 feet 7 inches of support to this lofty measure, specially because "the stalwart champions of orthodoxy" had opposed it. He failed to see how it harmed any one if people "stick to the religion of their forefathers" and to the intermarrying proclivities of their own.

The Moslem Dowager who had been taking copious notes on the previous evening asked permission to explain some points of his submission which may have caused misunderstanding, and having obtained it, politely corrected Mud Holkar about nationalism, and then turned to Hon. Longfellow, the lofty beacon light of Behar. Referring to his forcible speech, said he was not in a position to know what circumstances produce surprise in Hon. Longfellow and lead to emphatic expression. Quoting from the last word on marriage law of Islam from Longfellow's Sole Leader by Special Appointment, convinced Council that Hon. Longfellow had shot the long bow a little, and was then turning towards the Bombay Duck when Bhupen Babu, knowing well the habits of the Bar, rose to a point of order. Was that a personal explanation or a reply? Sir Guy hesitatingly referred to special position of Moslem Dowager on a subject with which Dowagers are generally so intimately familiar, namely as marriage, and the Dowager went on. Confessed that he knew of the Bar trick, but had left it on the doorstep of the High Court when he adopted the Dowager's weeds for the Bar-maid's gown, and saying, "I will never snatch a reply", was snatching one boldly, when Bombay Duck thought two could play at that game and put in a rejoinder. Had the Dowager stood his ground when interrupted as hon. members generally do till they are made to resume their seat all would have been serene. But the Dowager is most punctilious in these attentions to the hon. members and sat down the moment Bombay Duck rose to the surface. Sir Guy whose eyes were rivetted on his lawful companion, did not see the smoke from the direction of the Bombay Duck before the report of his volley was heard. So concluding that the Dowager had explained all he had to explain, severely announced his intention of not allowing discussion to degenerate into the bandying of legal opinions, and saying that the Dowager was entitled to an explanation and had made it, ordered the discussion to proceed.

The Gurgun then backed "my hon. leader, the Mild Hindu" and appealed that Bill be not thrown out at this stage. Thereafter rose Bhupen Babu gay in the irresponsibility of a reply after the Government had rejected the motion.

What was with the Bombay Duck and Hon. Longfellow? An "intellectual minority" became in his hands an "intellectual aristocracy," and Council wondered if before long it would become an "intellectual oligarchy", and thereafter an "intellectual despotism." Hitherto the despotism more evident than the intellect, but nature abhors a vacuum and that too may come in time. Bhupen Babu thanked Reggie for not forgetting his poor relations even in affluence after his translation to a higher sphere and for retaining to some extent his sympathy with Bhupen which he had expressed in the days of his poverty as a mere Chief Commissioner. But having done this, reminded Reggie that if and the bushman could count only up to 3, that did not disprove the existence of Integral and Differential Calculus. But, by the way, who is Integral Calculus and what relationship does he or she bear to Differential Calculus? They may both be living, and for aught that we know in our own street or just round the corner. But has anybody met them, wished them or talked to them? Is anyone on calling terms with them, or knows them well enough to share his steak or chop with them? As for Reggie's second test for social reform legislation, Bhupen politely pointed out that this was not the Orange Free State, but bonds-lave Bengal where no one waits for Government action if there is an overwhelming majority in favour of a measure. Here they force the Government to proceed to action and thereafter thank it for its spontaneous statesmanship. Who said the Partition, eh?

Turning to the Moslem Dowager with his two anna share in the administration, claimed kinship with him. "For though he may be sitting on Government benches, he is one of us in our ideals, one of us in our methods, one of us in our pursuits, and we are proud that he is where he is." The Sergeant of the C.I.D. on duty looked suspiciously in the direction of the Dowager and wondered in what Samid he had figured before, forgetting that he was only loyal and sturdy Behar and that it was only Bhupen's way of tarring his friends with his own brush. As for the rest what mattered it whence the daughter came so long as she was the bride in another family? Did not Ruth say unto Naomi, "Whither thou goest, I will go, and where thou lodgest, I will lodge thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God?" After trying to establish kinship with the Dowager, and pointing out that he had got over many a legal difficulty in securing the release of a law breaker in the past and should now get over those of Bhupen's, he reminded him that the idolatists with whom the Quran dealt and for whom hell-fire had been kindled were only "the worshippers of the stars." Dig'er Patty wondered why Bhupen had left him out when he was distributing free permits to heaven to all and sundry among the idol worshippers. Were not the "stars" worthy idols to be worshipped, specially when connected with the "Empire" on which the sun of his munificence never sets. Could he not claim, too, that in the dear little images he set up he did not worship the images, but "the divine qualities which are supposed to be embodied in the images"? The many friends of aspiring Nawabdom heard with pleasure that Bhupen Babu had been authorised to select judges of the High Court, for he quoted "the authority of another eminent Muhammadan lawyer, Mr Justice Abdul Rahman, who has written a very valuable book on Muhammadan jurisprudence." A man of long memory, Bhupen said he did not know what Sir Roland had meant when he said that the Rajput brides of the Great Moghals had to make "a nominal profession of Muhammadan faith," though he knew perfectly well, and even better than that author of the remark himself, what Mr. Ameer Ali meant by the legality according to Moslem Law of the marriage of a Muslim man "with a Hindu woman whose idolatry is merely nominal."

Turning to other speakers, hoped it would not be impertinent in him to tickle the vanity of the Khan Bahadur, and immediately tried the sweet uses of flattery though with indifferent success. Then came the turn of white-robed Orthodoxy. "His opinion on questions of Hindu practices are entitled to the greatest weight." (The Pandit felt elated.) It would be a good day for us if men of his type were able to rise above the environments of their life. (The Pandit sank once more into the doldrums of conscious virtue.) "My brother the Sweeper?" Excellent, excellent! We are evidently getting on. But—er—did he see his brother the sweeper in the Faridpur Conference when one of them who got up to speak forgot to commence his oration with praise of Brahm, Vishnu, or Shiva, but plunged straight into the serried phalanx of the Brahmins and talked equally straight? Had the Pandit then heard his brother the sweeper, he would have had to issue an expurgated edition of that catholic-spirited expression. "What is the bond of Brotherhood? If the Sweeper brother of his happens to touch him even accidentally, he will incontinently run to the Ganges to have a dip to have himself purified. ('You can never bathe too often,' says Prof. A.B.C. on 'Hygiene, Ancient and Modern' [Extract from 'Hindu Superiority'] or take a big dose of cowdung to purify himself from the impurity of the touch. ('It is marvellous,' writes Dr. Z.Y.X. in his great work, 'Bacteriology of the Aryans in the Arctic Regions,' that the ancient Aryans discovered the germicide properties of cowdung 5,793 years before modern Germans chanced upon the discovery' [Extract from 'Hindu Superiority'].) If the Sweeper brother happens to touch his food, that food must be thrown into the street. ('Little does the unheeding multitude know,' says Prof. O. P. Q., 'how many million times a billion microbes cluster on a trillionth part of a square millimetre.' 'The collectivism of Bernard Shaw and the Fabian Society would pale into insignificance,' writes Dr. J. K. L. in 'All for All,' 'by the side of what the ancient Aryans had achieved five thousand years ago. Even to-day no Indian housewife would selfishly keep to herself the overnight leavings of her poor supper or the morning sweepings of her humble home, but with admirable altruism will deposit them on the crossing, that is if no well-dressed passer-by happens to be near enough on whose head she could drop them.' [Extracts from 'Hindu Superiority']. (Even if he overlooks the food that he takes, that food must be thrown away.) 'Modern Science has re-discovered as a marvellous truth many a scientific truism of ancient days; but even Modern Science has yet to decipher what the ancient Aryans had scribbled on the tablets of inductive reasoning on the deleterious effects of the ray of light which, emanating from a low-caste eye, chanced to alight on high caste food'. [The devil only knows who wrote this or where, but daresay you can find all about it in that Encyclopædia Farnagyrca known as 'Hindu Superiority']. Truly enough his brother the sweeper would object to having his womenfolk married to Brahmins or Kshatriyas. I do admit that and I say that it is the only trait that is good in the sweeper caste, for if every shred and vestige of self-respect has been taken away from him, he is not willing to let his women go to others on terms of concubinage, for there can be no valid marriage between his women and ourselves."

When these compliments were being showered on Orthodoxy by the Arch-Heterodox, the temperature of the room had shot up suddenly and the atmosphere was close and oppressive. The thunder of Bhupen and the lightning flashes on the high-souled brow of the Pandit presaged a tremendous storm. The Railway Sleeper, with a perpetual overpressure on the valve, would no doubt have unbuttoned himself by unbuttoning the waistcoat as usual. But the unbuttoning of the frockcoat displayed a soft shirt front with not even as much vestige of a waistcoat as, according to Bhupen, the Sweeper is permitted to possess of self-respect. The Railway Sleeper was always for making a clean breast of everything and here was a snow white one for the world to see.

Bhupen had not, however, done with the Brahmins yet. "You ask me where the agitation of non-Brahmins? Then hear. The spirit of Machiavelli himself would have stood aghast at this Brahmanical ingenuity in being able to retain their power over a credulous people by imposing upon them the veil of ignorance through all ages and through all times (Routlar Sahab thought the condemnation was perhaps too harsh for what STATESMENSHIP could easily educate the masses). The Khan Bahadur wants evolution and Burly Raja hates a revolution. If you do not provide for means of safety, I may tell you that that revolution will come at no very distant date and I may tell you that it will be a bad day for all those who now sit upon pedestals of privilege and power." (Sir Guy turns pale and moves uneasily in the Presidential Chair.)

Then came the turn of Hooda. Sincerely pleased at his losing caste with non-officials and sauntering uneasily on the fringe of the caste of officials. But he was brought up at that nursery of "Discontented B. A's", the Presidency College of Calcutta that was and not at the conjectural University at Dacca that may never be. Well, Burke had now been tabooed even at the Presidency College, but when Hooda and he used to be fed as les enfants terribles on the pure milk of the Benthamite word, Burke still supplied food for their childish prattle if not for reflection. And what did Burke say to the electors of Bristol on the position of a representative of the people? Don't know what Burke said, but know pretty well what Sir Guy said from the pedestal of privilege and power. "Leave Burke alone and come to the Bill." Nothing daunted, Bhupen bowed his head before the blast, and when the legions of Sir Guy's admonition had thundered past, came back to—Burke. Sir Guy came in not pursuit once more, and said, "Hon. Member is now doing what I repented to him I did not consider that he was entitled to do." Once more the loyal and obedient head of Bhupen was bowed in humble submission to "the settled fact" of Sir Guy's authority. "I have not for a moment disputed your dictum. But, to come back to Burke"—and thereafter he said everything he had to say, for if Sir Guy's authority was a "settled fact", the words of Bhupen also happened to be almost irrevocable. If Hooda would not give out his own views but would rely on those of his constituents, so be it. One of the objections is that a true Believer will not be able to marry a combination and permutation of many wives taken four at a time. (Hooda: "I never said that Allah knows one is enough." He, however, failed to declare if the worshipper of Allah found even that too much.)

Two adversaries had yet to be dealt with and Bhupen now sent his shafts in the direction of big Burly and the agile Gurkha-like figure of the C. P. scout, Cheery Chitnia. "Hullo Burly, is that you, my pretty little Beelzebub of other days?"

To whom th' Arch-Heterodox,
And thence in Ind knows Bhupen, with sharp words
Piercing the Burly bosom thus began.
If thou beest he, but O how fall'n! how chang'd
From him who in the happy Realm of Light
Clothed with the inebriate Brahmin's brightness—
Man's Kilton that outshines the Sun of God—
Now changed from him who greatly did outshine
Myriads of Brahmins, him whom mortal leaguers
United thoughts and controls, equal hope.

And hazard in the glorious enterprise
Of Brahmodom's first fresh iconoclasm,
Joined with great Pandit Shiv Nath Shastari,
Before the evil days of this Imperial League,
Partition thoughts and lordly Council style,
And this strange union with another Pandit
In equal ruin Unto what Pit thou seest
From what height fall 'n, so much the stronger proved Official thunder and the lightning flash
Of Orthodoxy, and till now who knew
The force of these dire arms? Yet not for these,
Nor what the white-robed Pandit with his Reggie
Can else inflict do I repent or change
That fixed mind which did at last unsettle
A settled fact, a mind that will not change
Because, like shifty Krüger of the Boers,
Or flighty Dowager of Celestial China,
Hard-og resolves to change his capital,
And in outpouring rain, with flashing skies,
And reverberating salvos of departure
From heaven's own artillery, takes his flight
With splintered flagstaff and with tattered flag.
My high disdain, from sense of injured merit,
That with the Brahmins raised me to contend,
And to the fierce contention brought along
The intellectual aristocrats,
That durst dislike the reign of Orthodoxy,
That Shariat and the Shastras both condemn,
And heed not Hell-fire nor awaiting Karma,
Their utmost power with adverse power opposed
In dubious battle near the Mosque and Temple
And shook the Mullah's and the Pandit's thrones.
My word, 'twas fun! What though the Bill be lost?
All is not lost The Press is still there,
So is the public platform whence to spout,
Is not the pen far mightier than the sword,
And is not tongue the mightiest of them all?
The everlasting tongue, immortal pen,
And courage never to submit or yield,
To Brahmin, white or yellow, black or brown,
And never to accept a settled fact,
And what is else not to be overcome?
That glory never shall the Pandit's wrath
Extort from Bhupen Bose—so long as toiture,
Is kill'd or even scotch'd, thanks to Mackarness.
To bow and sue for grace with suppliant knee
Before the Brahmins, that were low indeed,
That were an ignominy and shame beneath
This downfall, since by votes of the officials
Even shadowy Orthodoxy cannot fail,
Since through experience of this sad defeat
In tongue more fluent and in pen more facile,
We may with more successful hope resolve
To wage by force or guile eternal war
Irreconcilable to Brahmindom
That now triumphs and in the excess of joy
Sole reigning holds the tyranny of Earth,
Of Air and Water, aye, of Heaven and Hell.

After this Miltonic harangue, fell into prose, again and while accusing Burly Raja of betag like the nobleman who

"Stiff in his opinions, always in the wrong,
"Was everything by starts and nothing long" relieved him greatly by assuring him that he would not go on with that quotation. But as a parting shot, opined that Burly Raja

"naturally felt alarmed at the confusion of Hindu laws which might upset inheritance, succession and adoption," the Burly Raja being a graft of the Punjab on the Bengali stock

As for Cheery Chitnis, thought he was,

Willing to wound and yet afraid to strike,
For fear official gurus may not like;
Afraid to blame, not eager to commend,
A timorous foe, a far too "fearful" friend
But ever strong upon the stronger side,
With bland official ready to divide.
Great Fortune's champion, that doth never fight
Unless he sees ahead the beacon light,
A face with smiles or frowns incarnadined,
A gauge that's cruel only to be kind.

The final Siren song was addressed to the Moslem Dowager
"He is afraid of difficulties. Where is my friend's courage?
A lack of courage and in Bengal? Extremity is the trial of spirits, when the sea is calm all boats alike show master ship in floating." "I invite you to come out with me into the open, it may be to a rough and tempestuous sea. Will you come with me? (Who said, 'Meet me alone by moonlight?')
I invite you not to a pleasure excursion on the placid bosom of the Hooghly. (No reference to the placid bosom of the Hooghly at Kulligh! at a festival morning floating like a life-buoy. Honi soit qui mal y pense.) I invite you to undertake the task of social reform. Are you afraid? If you are (and the Dowager nodded assent) I bid you good-bye. (The Dowager's eyes become moist.) I want trusted men who will stick to me whether I float or whether I sink.
(The 'Man at the Wheel' sitting behind Reggie, his chief, who had been travelling on the placid bosom of sleep woke up suddenly and felt inclined to shout 'Ahoy!' on the top of his voice, but recovered in time.) Must we for ever range ourselves in rival camps? Must we look on helplessly without being able to render each other assistance, while members of our community are being swept down the current of time." Suddenly changing the figure and turning from a venturesome voyager to a builder of bridges, exclaimed, "If I provide a bridge which the venturesome might tread, will you prevent my putting up the first prop?" Hon.

Longfellow acknowledged the obvious compliment and thereafter the Council divided. The "intellectual minority" numbered 11 to the 43 of the bloated majority, the unintellectual proletariat.
Bhupen's Bridge stood there shaky and unreliable, with but eleven spans, and one of them Dig'er-Patty. But wonder of wonders, ninety-nine days' wonder. Melancholy Madge for once voted with the non-officials and was one of the inter-marrying aristocracy of intellect

Petty Larceny.

(BY OUR SPECIAL KLEPTOMANIAC.)

[MOTTO.—"Wit is your birthright therefore steel it where-soever you find it."—Rigmarole Veda.]

A LADY canvasser called on old Farmer Giles and proceeded to cross-examine him on the subject of his political faith. Everything else proving satisfactory, she produced a formidable document.

"I have here," she told him, "a petition in favour of the woman's suffrage movement, and I should like you to sign it."

The old man was unable to read, but he took the petition and regarded it with a suspicious eye. Finally he handed it back.

"No," he said, with an air of finality, "no; I don't hold with movements. A woman that's allus a-movin' is allus gettin' in trouble. If you've got one that will keep her quiet, I'll sign it."

"Well," said the artist. The critic fixed his eyeglass and examined the canvas. He went close up to it, then moved away from it; then viewed it from the south-west corner, then tried it from the north-west wall. "Good!" he said, finally. "Distinctly good! One of the best pictures of a coal-mine I've ever seen!
Perhaps the lighting—"

"Coal-mine, sir!" cried the artist. "Coal-mine!" He glared at the critic angrily and clenched his slender fingers. "It's a bird's-eye view of Blackpool! You are an ass, sir!"

"Oh, am I?" retorted the critic warmly. "Well, that may be. But let me tell you that, if that picture represents a bird's-eye view of anywhere, I'm thankful that I'm not a bird!"

IN CORRECTING the exercises of her class a teacher recently observed a new name inscribed on one of the papers—Will Evans.
She looked round the class, but could see no new boy. Not a little puzzled, she requested Will Evans to stand.

Up jumped Will Jones, and the teacher got more puzzled still.

"Your name's Jones," she said. "not Evans!"

Will looked not a little abashed, and shifted uneasily from one foot to the other.

"Please, ma'am," he said, "it's owing to family trouble. I didn't do it, please, ma'am."

"But," she said, sternly, "I repeat, your name is Jones."

"Please, ma'am," said the boy, "it's changed now. Ma's married the lodge!"

"Has your wife recovered the bracelet she advertised in my paper as having lost?" inquired the editor of his friend Smiles.

"She has," said Smiles. "But—"

"There you are!" chuckled the editor. "That proves what advertising will do."

"I know, but—"

"We have a circulation, my boy, a circulation! Advertise a thing one day and you get it back the next. I tell you—"

"Wait a minute! Your paper didn't help us."

"Didn't help you? You say you got the bracelet back?"

"I know, but you see my wife lost the bracelet on Monday."

"Yes."

"On Tuesday she advertised in your paper?"

"Yes."

"And on Wednesday she found the bracelet in our dressing-table drawer!"

"THAT 'live topic' printed a while ago about the chemist who got tired of letting postage-stamps go on a customer's charge account was not a circumstance to an experience I had this week," another chemist said.

"One of our well-to-do customers—a woman, of course—asked me over the 'phone if I had change for five pounds. When I said
'Yes,' She inquired if I could send the boy up to her home with it.
The boy had errands enough already, but I did not wish to be liging, so I sent him.

"She opened the door for him herself, and, upon receiving the five pounds in change, smiled amiably and said: 'Tell Mr. Squills to charge it, please,' and sweetly bowed the boy away."

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

REUTER wires from Teheran on the 23rd.—In reply to the Anglo-Russian Note Persia assents to the conditions of the advance of £200,000, of which sum a considerable portion will be allotted to the new Gendarmerie. It promises to disband the Irregulars and organise a regular army, proportionate to the needs of the country. Having proved its goodwill, Persia hopes to obtain the help of the two Powers, firstly for a loan necessary to realise the reforms, and, secondly, for the evacuation of Persian territory by the foreign troops as soon as possible.

Lord Lamington reached Bombay on the 22nd and went straight off to Karachi en route for Bushire. The visit, though no doubt partly dictated by Lord Lamington's interest in Persian affairs, is of a private nature and has been undertaken in the "after" course of a recent "cure" at Wiesbaden. It would have been made last year but for political necessity which kept most of the members of the House of Lords near home at the time.

Lord Lamington hopes to return in time for the annual training camp in June in Lanarkshire of the regiment of Yeomanry which he commands, but may re-visit India next year with Lady Lamington, a trip to Cashmere being his main object.

Reuter wires from Teheran on the 25th.—Salar-ed-Dowleh has rejected the suggestion of Britain and Russia that he should quit Persia in exchange for a pension. He claims the Kermanshah district as a principality for himself. A message to the Times from Teheran says that Britain and Russia will probably now order him to leave the country.

In an article on the situation in Persia the Times praises the measures which have killed the arms and contraband traffic in the Persian Gulf. The paper adds:—"It remains for us to see that the traffic is not surreptitiously revived. We are thankful for the friendly co-operation of the Sultan of Muscat but it needs no great knowledge of oriental officials and the ways of some European manufacturers dealing with them to see that the supervision of the trade at Muscat may not be very thorough."

Lord Hardinge speaking at the meeting of the Viceroy's Legislative Council on the 25th made a brief reference to the Persian situation. His Excellency said: "In Persia the situation during the past two years has been as unsatisfactory as possible, in so far as British and Indian interests are concerned. In the south of Persia anarchy reigns supreme, the Persian Government having neither power nor authority, while order in the Gulf ports is maintained solely by the presence of the British East Indian Squadron in the Persian Gulf. British and Indian trade interests have suffered severe losses, many caravans having been robbed and the muleteers killed by tribesmen, so that no caravans can now proceed in safety along the main trade routes. Within only the last few days 150 Indian troops have had to be landed at Longah to protect the Consulate and British and Indian lives and property from the threatened attack of 2,400 tribesmen. Six months ago, owing to an attack made upon the British Consulate at Shiraz, which I may add was very bravely repulsed by a small handful of Indian troops acting as Consular guards, it was decided to strengthen the escorts at Bushire, Shiraz and Isfahan, and four squadrons of the Central India Horse were sent to Persia for distribution between these towns and for the protection of British and Indian life and property. Shortly afterwards when the British Consul at Shiraz was proceeding with a caravan with specie belonging to the Imperial Bank of Persia escorted by half a squadron of the Central India Horse, they were attacked by the very men who were employed by the Persian Government as road guards, and they lost a few men killed and wounded, amongst the latter being the British Consul. The ordinary course under such circumstances would be to demand from the Persian Government the punishment of the offenders and reparation. Such a course under existing circumstances is not likely to produce much result, and the only alternative course would be to take the law into one's own hand and to send a punitive expedition. To act on such lines there would in my opinion be serious objection since it might involve us in a situation in Southern Persia from which it might be difficult to extricate ourselves and which might eventually lead to the partition of Persia. Such a policy is entirely opposed to the views of the Government of India, whose hope and desire are that the integrity and independence of Persia may remain unimpaired. In view, however, of the necessity of looking after our own interests, we propose, with the approval of the Secretary of State, to instruct our Resident at Bushire to open negotiations with the tribes for the punishment of those who led the attack upon our convoy and for the proper guarding and security of the British and Indian caravans passing along the main trade routes of the south. The explanation of our policy will, I trust, dispel the fears of those who have imagined that we had leanings towards the partition of Persia with Russia. We have, I maintain, acted with much patience under circumstances of grave provocation, and our one hope is that we may yet see peace and order restored in Southern Persia in the near future. There are, I know, certain critics who declaim against the Anglo-Russian Agreement in connection with Persia, and ask of what use it can be in view of the presence of Russian troops in Northern Persia. To those critics I would reply that the fundamental basis of the Anglo-Russian Agreement is the independence and integrity of Persia, and so long as we are a signatory to that agreement, we are able to exercise a moral influence on our co-signatory where we could not use material pressure. Russian troops have not entered Teheran and within the last few weeks they have been withdrawn from Kazvin. It is my own conviction that, were this agreement not in force, the partition of Persia would already be an accomplished fact.

King George received in audience Sir Walter Townley, on the 26th, who has been appointed Minister in Teheran.

Replying to Sir John Lonsdale, in the House of Commons, Mr Montagu said that immediately on learning of the robbing of Mr Moir by the Bakhtiari Sir George Barclay, British Minister, made representations to the Persian Government and the Bakhtiari Khans who would doubtless do their best to restrain their men. Sir George Barclay having since received details of the goods stolen was presenting a claim.

Persia had undertaken to pay compensation for the attack on Consul Smart as the first charge on the next loan.

Feeling in India.

A meeting of the representatives of Hindu and Muhammadan communities was held on Thursday afternoon at the Town Hall to consider the present situation in Persia and to make a joint appeal to Great Britain asking her interference in the matter for the preservation of the integrity and independence of Persia. The meeting was well attended.

Dr Rash Behari Ghose, who was unanimously elected to the Chair, during the course of his speech said:—

We have met here Hindus and Muhammadans to-day to appeal to His Imperial Majesty's Government to use their influence in maintaining the constitutional government which has been established in Persia. As loyal British subjects it is at once our privilege and our duty to make this appeal. In the opinion, however, of an anonymous writer in the Fortnightly Review in expecting England to intervene in an affair which does not primarily concern her we are guilty of veiled treason to the British Empire. When I read this effusion I could not help asking myself "stands England where she did?" When did England cease to be the hope of freedom, the curb of the tyrant? When did her glorious flag cease to be a signal of rallying to the combatant and of shelter to the fallen? When did her noble sons cease to do all that lay in their power to extend to others less favoured the benefit of those free institutions which they have enjoyed for generations and which have made them the envy of the whole world? It was certainly not so in other days.

Gentlemen, it is not we who are guilty of treason in asking England to use her influence in securing a constitutional government for Persia. It is the anonymous writer who is guilty of treason not veiled but open, of treason to his own country, of treason to those glorious traditions which have made the name of England so dear to all who are oppressed and downtrodden, to all who cherish high aspirations and are fighting in the cause of order, and of good government. It is impossible, said Mr. Gladstone on a memorable occasion, that the affairs of foreign nations can ever be indifferent to a country like England. If it is impossible, he added, that England should forewear the interest she must naturally feel in the struggles of a people for justice and for freedom.

Gentlemen, I would like to speak with all possible reserve. But there are occasions on which it would be nothing less than a crime against humanity to maintain silence, and this is one of them. Russia, as you are aware, is solemnly pledged to respect the integrity and independence of Persia and we hope she will keep her plighted word. But we cannot forget that it was a Tsar of all the Russias who said to Talleyrand—"You are always talking to me of principles, as if your public law were anything to me, I do not know what it means. What do you suppose that all your parchments and your treaties signify to me?" We cannot also forget that since the days of Alexander I, by a most sinister application of Darwin's doctrine, "might is right" has been with some powers the guiding principle in their international relations. But whether Russia means to keep her promise or not, we are confident that so long as, in the words of His Excellency Lord Hardinge, to whom we cannot be too grateful, England is a signatory to the agreement she will be able to exercise a moral influence on her co-signatory where she could not use material pressure. We are equally confident that so long as his Lordship is at the helm of the administration in India, that moral influence will never cease to be exerted and exerted with success. Diplomacy, we all know, hath her victories no less renowned than war and with such a protagonist in the arena we need not fear defeat.

Gentlemen, I need not remind you that the present situation in Persia is very grave. Indeed it contains all the elements of a tragedy and one of the saddest in history. At the very moment she was "mewing her mighty youth and kindling her undazzled eyes at full midday beam," she finds herself engaged in a deadly struggle for her very existence. Who can withhold his heartfelt sympathy from her in the dark days through which she is now passing? Who will not fervently pray that victory may ultimately crown her efforts? Who will not fervently pray that renovated and regenerated she will again bewitch the world with her arts and her literature, that literature so full of spiritual inspiration, so full of wisdom, so full of sparkling wit and lyrical grace, which has been the solace and delight of generations of cultured men, not only among Muhammadans but also among Hindus and Christians?

Mr. Surendra Nath Banerjee moved the following resolution:—Having regard to the present critical situation in Persia and the uncompromising attitude of Russia towards the Persian Government which has given rise to apprehension in the minds of His Majesty's Indian subjects as to her intentions, this meeting desires to express its opinion that the integrity and independence of Persia should be respected and maintained and that the Constitutional Government established there be given a fair opportunity to develop her resources and promote the welfare of the country.

The motion was supported by Messrs. B. Chakravarti, Mohamed Ali, Mahmudul Huq, E. P. Ghose, Unsuddowlah, Wahid Husain, and Hakim Abdur Rauf.

Mr. J. Chaudhri moved the following resolution:—That this meeting respectfully appeals to His Majesty's Government to use its influence with Russia and persuade her to withdraw all causes of irritation.

The motion was supported by Messrs. Ariff and Roome.

Mr. Sharif proposed and Dr. S. K. Mullik seconded that copies of resolutions 1 and 2 be forwarded to the Government of India and the British Government.

The Meeting dispersed after a vote of thanks to the chair.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT)

Teheran, March 3.

The British and Russian Governments have each advanced 35,000 tomans (about £5,833) to Persia to pay off the ex-Shah's followers, and as soon as they are paid he will probably leave the country. He has already removed to the Island of Ashurada, from which he originally entered Persia. An unchastened Oliver Twist, he continues to bargain over his pension, but the Powers refuse to transmit to Persia further requests for more than 75,000 tomans annually, which Persia now agrees to give. The sum advanced to pay the followers will be deducted from the instalments of the pension. Similar Anglo-Russian representations have now been made to Salar-ed-Dowleh.

The preliminary advance is a portion of the £200,000, which will be paid when Persia accepts the terms of the Note. The delay was due to the difficulty of finding a formula for acceptance of the Anglo-Russian Convention consonant with Persian amour propre.

It is hoped that a solution will be found for the Turco-Persian incident in the shape of the special salute for the Ambassador when he enters Teheran.

St. Petersburg, March 2.

The ex-Shah has left Ashurada Island for Baku on board a Russian ship.—(Reuters.)

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT)

Teheran, March 4.

The incident concerning the Turkish Ambassador appears to be closed. The military officer responsible for the contretemps has been recalled to Russia, and a salute will be given to the Ambassador at a later stage of his journey from Resht.

On the 5th March Mr. Morrell (Burnley, Min.) asked the Secretary of State what was approximately the total number of Russian troops now in Persia, how many of these had entered the country since 10th November the date of the presentation of the first Russian ultimatum and, whether since that date any Russian troops had been withdrawn from Persian territory.

SIR E. GREY. As regards the total number of Russian troops in Persia, I have no later information than that contained in my reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Leicester on the 20th ultimo. I understand, however, that orders have been issued for the withdrawal to Russia of the Russian troops at Enzeli and Resht, and also for a withdrawal from Kazvin a part of the force withdrawn from Kazvin will remain at Enzeli and Resht, the remainder returning to Russia. A considerable reduction in the force at Tabriz has also been ordered.

Mr. Morrell asked whether the Persian Government had consented to the terms of the joint Note with reference to the proposed loan.

SIR E. GREY. His Majesty's Minister at Teheran has not reported that a reply has yet been received from the Persian Government.

Mr. Morrell asked what were the terms of the present appointment of Monsieur Mornard, whether it was proposed to make it permanent, and whether the Persian Government protested against the appointment.

SIR E. GREY. I will send to the hon. member a copy of the Decree of 6th January appointing Monsieur Mornard provisionally Treasurer-General. It is of considerable length. As regards the second point, I have nothing to add to the statement that I made on the 21st ultimo, to which I would refer the hon. member. With regard to the third point, the Persian Minister in London intimated verbally some time ago objections on the part of his Government, but I have received no official protest from them.

A Russian Lament for the Ex-Shah.

THE Novoye Vremya in its distress at the fate of the ex-Shah, breaks out into a long lament over the supineness and ineptitude of Russian diplomacy, which, it alleges, allows itself to be led by the British Foreign Office into paths not at all compatible with Russian interests. Russia, it says, "has in Persia incomparably greater material interests than England, and one might have thought that the leading part in Persian affairs would have been assumed not by English but by Russian diplomacy. In reality, however, it so happens that Russian diplomacy is always painfully trying to evade the obligations imposed on it by the circumstances and confines itself to merely supporting the decisions arrived at in London."

As an instance it quotes the attitude of the Russian Government towards the ex-Shah. Time was, it declares, when Russia and England pursued a system of non-intervention in Persian domestic affairs. That was during the revolution, which was followed by the deposition of Mohammed Ali. Then the latter reappeared "without an army, without money, without European instructors, without arms. From a European point of view his enterprise seemed perfectly hopeless. Nevertheless he proved himself able to hold his position and to extend his influence. At the present moment he has at his disposal an army which, though irregular and unreliable, is nevertheless able to cope more or less successfully with the Government troops. In accordance with the once adopted system of non interference, Anglo-Russian diplomacy ought to have looked on this movement with the same impartiality and disinterestedness as it did the revolution. Yet this system is now discarded. British diplomacy has declared that it will in no case recognise Mohammed Ali should he recapture the throne. The Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs has declared that he does not share this view, and does not see the reason why Mohammed Ali should be refused recognition in case the population should recall him to the throne. Yet at the same time Russian diplomatic agents are instructed to advise the ex-Shah to leave Persia, which to the extent of one-half has already been reconquered by him!"

The Novoye Vremya adds: "Here, as before, the decisive factor for Russian diplomacy has been not the consideration of Russia's own material interests, but the anxiety lest the Persia Committee in London should be offended."—Manchester Guardian.

The Russian Troops in Persia.

(FROM A "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN" CORRESPONDENT).

ACCORDING to trustworthy information received from Persia on 3rd March the numbers of Russian troops at present occupying various places in that country are, as nearly as can be ascertained, as follows:—Tabriz, 5,500; Khot, Urumia and Salmas, 1,700; Enzeli, 5,000; Gilan and Kazvin, 6,000; Mazandaran, 500; Astrabad, 500; Khurasan, 2,300; Hamadan, 200; total, 21,800. Some of the Tabriz troops, with 20 guns, were withdrawn some days ago, and it is said that some will be withdrawn from Kazvin in a few days.

The following telegram was sent by Shua-us-Saltana, brother of the ex-Shah, on 19th February to Yusuf Khan of Herat, one of the leading reactionaries at Meshed, from Astrabad by means of the Russian Consul:—"Your representations have reached the August Presence, and were a cause of gratification. The Royal retinue will set out to visit the Holy Shrine of the Imam Riza (r.c., Meshed). Convey my sincere salutations to my loyal and zealous brethren of Khurasan. (Signed) "MAJIK MANSUR SHUA-US SALTANA."

Russia's "Sacrifices" in Persia.

THE Novoe Vremya continues to agitate for the occupation of Northern Persia by Russia. In the course of a long article—one of the series—its special correspondent now travelling in Persia describes the wealth of the province of Azerbaijan and the unruly frontier population and says:—

"Azerbaijan will for ever remain a menace to us if we do not restore order there. Our trade with Persia, the future railway to Tabriz, the interests of Russian subjects in Azerbaijan, all demand energetic intervention free from all halt measures. Looking at our troops at Tabriz, I involuntarily ask myself 'What did these people die for? What was the object of their coming to Persia and fertilising with their blood the fields of Azerbaijan?'

"The unselfish Russian soldier gets no profit from military conflicts—he does not rob, he does not oppress the inhabitants, and only fights from sheer duty. Our officers in Tabriz are the very incarnation of modesty so far as conduct is concerned. I well remember the British officers at Alexandria and Port Said—their provocative behaviour, their impudent attitudes, their legs thrown on the chair in the foyer of the theatre. There everything spoke of the British occupation of Egypt, whereas our troops in temporary occupation of Tabriz express the sovereign power of Russia by their arms alone.

"What a number of victims, of martyrs tortured to death by the Persians, what an amount of anxiety and troubles! Has it all been in vain—has it all been only for the sake of our prestige in the East? Shall we stay and then withdraw in peace, having granted an amnesty to Tabriz? According to the Koran the land belongs to those who have poured out on it—its water or their blood?"—Manchester Guardian.

Russia and England in Teheran.

THE Teheran correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung describes the situation in Persia in the following words:—

"The Persians are trying to obtain an abatement of the Anglo-Russian terms, but the representatives of the two Powers return all their notes on the subject unopened. The terms will therefore be accepted one of these days, and Persia will cease to be an independent State. The terms specially insist upon the recognition of the Anglo-Russian agreements. Accordingly the two Powers will jointly control all measures in the neutral zone, and each will control the measures taken in its own sphere. No economic influence will be accorded to third parties except with the consent of the two Powers. By way of reward Persia will receive a small loan, from which, however, considerable deductions will have been made. The Persian paper speak to-day about the abolition of all Ministries and the establishment of a simple administrative Council, which would probably be placed under Russian guidance."

The correspondent further states that whereas no foreigner could hitherto acquire landed property in Persia, a Russian bank has now been for weeks acquiring villages and estates to which it had formerly advanced money.—Manchester Guardian.

We would draw attention to the very alarming account of the new scheme in Persia which we publish from the Frankfurter

Zeitung. The Teheran correspondent of this newspaper says that the scheme is being imposed on the country, and that the Persian protests are all returned unopened. Even more serious is the account of the terms. They insist, he says, on the recognition of the Anglo-Russian Agreement. That we knew already, but what follows is worse than anything that has appeared even in the Russian papers. "The two Powers," we are told, "will jointly control all measures in the neutral zone, and each will control the measures in its own zone." This is partition pure and simple. Nothing that Sir Edward Grey has ever said would have led us to suppose that anything more was in question than appointments of foreigners to offices. Now "all measures" are said to be included under the control. And, further, the control is not even a joint control except in the neutral zone, which matters very little. Teheran is itself in the Russian zone, and the description of the correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung as it stands would mean that measures taken by the Central Government are to be under the sole control of Russia. It is almost incredibly bad, but the delay in the production of the terms of the Note and the vagueness of the official accounts of it fill us with uneasiness. The substantial accuracy of the account ought, we think, to be tested by a question in Parliament, if it is wrong, as we still hope, Sir Edward Grey should surely welcome the opportunity of contradicting a report so alarming.—Manchester Guardian.

There is one definite piece of good news from Persia. The ex-Shah has left the country at last. He was reported, first, as having landed on one of the islands in the Caspian, and then as having sailed for Baku. His "soldiers" have been paid with money advanced to Persia by the two Powers, and his pension, subject to a rather small deduction, will be continued. It is not creditable to their diplomacy that after proclaiming the forfeiture of this pension, the two Powers should again have imposed it on Persia. While the Shah has this money, he will always be in a position to repeat his intrigues. The Persian Government is now debating with the two Legations the exact terms on which it is to recognise the Anglo-Russian Convention. It will be a grave derogation from its sovereignty if it is merely required to recognise a monopoly in the matter of concessions within the respective zones. But if the Frankfurter Zeitung is correctly informed, it is much more than this which is demanded—something amounting to a general management or control. We have never doubted that this would be the result, even of an economic partition. But to impose it in set terms would be an act of cynicism rare even in these days of predatory Imperialism.—Nation.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on the 24th:—Assim Bey, Minister for Foreign Affairs, has expressed optimism as to the general situation of the relations with the Balkan States, which he said, did not inspire uneasiness. He declared that Turkey would enter into negotiations for peace with Italy, provided she were not called upon to recognise the annexation of Tripoli. With reference to the Turco-Persian Frontier Commission now sitting at Constantinople, he said, that if an agreement were not reached the matter would be submitted to the Hague Court of Arbitration. Assim Bey said that Russian assurances with regard to the movement of troops were satisfactory, and that M. Chankoff's recall from his position of Ambassador in Constantinople did not imply any change of attitude on the part of Russia.

Lord Hardinge speaking at the Imperial Legislative Council on the 25th said—

I should now like to turn your thoughts for a few minutes to external affairs in which the interests of a very large and influential section of the community are sentimentally, though indirectly, affected. I do not wish to touch on the question of the war between Turkey and Italy beyond to express our profound regret that hostilities should be in progress between two countries so friendly disposed towards Great Britain, and to add that I happen to know that His Majesty's Government have in conjunction with other Powers already taken steps to mediate with a view to securing an honourable peace. When, however, it appeared that there was a likelihood of hostilities being extended by the Italian naval forces to Jeddah and Yambo, I immediately drew the attention of His Majesty's Government to the very serious anxiety that would be created by an attack upon the ports leading to the holy cities of Islam, and by an interference with the pilgrim traffic to those ports. Representations were at once made to the Italian Government by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and satisfactory assurances were obtained.

Having already mentioned the friendly disposition of Turkey towards Great Britain, I should like to inform the Members of my Council of a significant incident which occurred only a few days ago, and of which I only learnt yesterday. The King received on 21st March, a Special Mission from the Sultan of Turkey, consisting of the Turkish Ambassador, the Councillor and two Secretaries of the Turkish Embassy, and Reshid Bey (Councillor legiste of the Sublime Porte) who presented to His Majesty an autograph letter from the Sultan, and also the Order of the Khandani-ali Osman and the order of the Imtiaz conferred on the King as a fresh proof of the Sultan's desire to strengthen the friendly relations and cordial ties now existing between the two Empires and as a special mark of His Majesty's sincere friendship towards the King. The point is that the almost unprecedented distinction of the simultaneous conferment of these two Orders by the Sultan on His Majesty the King-Emperor is a striking act of confidence and good will which I am sure will be appreciated by the Mahomedans of India.

At a meeting of the Muhammadans of Bombay held on the 26th resolutions were passed thanking the Government of India for the action taken to prevent the bombardment of the Red Sea ports for the holy places. One resolution was "that this meeting of Bombay Muhammadans humbly requests the Sublime Porte to furnish authentic news of this war to Indian Muhammadans through the Turkish Consul-General in Bombay, so that misunderstandings and misrepresentations may not occur.

Rome, March 3.

The official Army list of killed published yesterday gives the following list of dead or missing from the beginning of the war till March 2, inclusive:—Officers, 37; rank and file, 822.

Rome, March 4.

At 7 o'clock yesterday morning the Italian position south of Derna, Fort Lombardia, was attacked fiercely by Turks and irregulars, probably commanded by Enver Bey, with the object of ousting the Italians and forcing them back to the coast. The engagement lasted till nightfall. As a result the Italians were left in possession of all the positions contested during the day.

The official report declares that the Turkish losses were very great. One hundred and fifty men were killed and wounded on the Italian side.

An Arab night attack was also repulsed at Gargaresh after 25 minutes' sharp fighting.

The success of the Italians at Derna, as also at Margheb, was entirely due to the use of the bayonet, the Italian troops thus proving to the Turks that they are perfectly able to sustain a hand-to-hand combat when occasion demands.

The battle is considered one of the most important during the war. The Turkish plan consisted of a preliminary Cavalry attack with simulated flight to draw the Italians from their fortified position, the major part of the army being held in reserve in order to make a combined attack on the Italian pursuing force. General Trombi, however, promptly countered by sending large reinforcements, consisting mainly of Alpine regiments, thus turning the tables on the enemy.

An Italian cruiser is at present bombarding Dubab, 20 miles north of Perim. (Reuter.)

Constantinople, March 4.

The Sultan has decided to confer on the Sheikh El Senusi a decoration set in brilliants and a sword of honour studded with precious stones in recognition of the sacrifices made by him for the Islamic world in aiding the Turkish defence in Tripoli. (Reuter.)

Rome, March 5.

A semi-official despatch from Tripoli of to-day's date says that yesterday morning the Eritrean Battalion, with 600 Rifles, and detachments of Cavalry and camelry, during a reconnaissance in the direction of Birre Cerit was attacked by 300 Arabs. The fight lasted from 11 A.M. to 5 P.M., when the enemy were compelled to retreat. The battalion returned to Ari Zara at nightfall, with 9 dead and 25 wounded. The enemy's casualties exceeded 100 killed.

A revised return of the casualties suffered by the Italian forces during the fighting at Derna on Sunday states that eight officers and 52 men were killed and 13 officers and 164 men wounded. (Reuter.) (FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Rome, March 5.

Admiral Faravelli was nominated to-day to succeed Admiral Aubry in command of the Mediterranean Squadron.

Constantinople, March 5.

The Porte has notified the Embassies that from to-morrow the Dardanelles will be closed at night to all navigation. (Reuter.)

Rome, March 6.

Two Italian dirigibles made a first flight yesterday over Lanzur, where two bombs were dropped with precision into the enemy's trenches. The Turks instantly evacuated the trenches. The murderous effect of the bombs was plainly seen from the dirigibles. After completing an effective reconnaissance, the dirigibles returned to their hangars.

The Pope has sent to the Bishop of Pienza, Mgr. Bellucci, a case containing a complete service of sacred vessels for the Mass, to be forwarded to Don Francia, the military chaplain at Derna.

Constantinople, March 7.

The Public Debt Administration is informed that Salif, 40 miles south of Hodeidah, has been bombarded by Italian warships.

Little damage was done, but when it is remembered that Salif is occupied only by officials and workmen employed in the Debt Administration's salt works, and by a garrison of 100 soldiers stationed there to protect them from Arabs, it may be asked whether the Italian action is in conformity with the assurances of the Consulta that the interests of the foreign bondholders would as far as possible be respected in the course of the present campaign.

Perim, March 7.

The Italian cruiser Calabria began to bombard Sheikh Said last night, but, on the Turks replying promptly, the warship retreated northward. (Reuter.)

Rome, March 7.

A despatch from General Reisoli states that at 10 o'clock on Tuesday evening the enemy attacked the east front of the Italian positions on the Margheb heights. Fighting lasted until 6 o'clock in the morning, when the Arabs were driven off with heavy loss. The Italians had one killed and three injured. (Reuter.)

On the 7th March Mr. JOYNSON-HICKS (Middlesex, Brentford, Opp.) asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he would state what right or title Turkey has to the barren islands in the Red Sea other than occupancy; whether, as her sole occupancy consisted of lighting them, now she has ceased to light, she has no right to retain control of the islands; and whether, in the interests of British shipping, his Majesty's Government would consider the advisability of taking, at all events temporary, possession of the islands and relight them in the event of Turkey declining to carry out her international obligations in this respect.

SIR E. GREY (Northumberland, Berwick.)—The right or title of Turkey to the islands in proximity to the Arabian coast of the Red Sea has, so far as I am aware, never been questioned. As the hon. member was informed in answer to his question of February 29 the Ottoman Government have, of course, the right to extinguish the lights in their territorial waters, if they consider such action necessary to guard their national interests and ensure their safety. In answer to the last part of the question there can be no question of any such action on the part of His Majesty's Government as that suggested by the hon. member without a departure from neutrality.

In reply to Mr. JOYNSON-HICKS

SIR E. GREY said he was quite aware of the inconvenience to shipping, but he was afraid it was impossible for war to occur in any part of the world without causing some such inconvenience. At an earlier stage of the war the Government made a suggestion hoping to come to an arrangement for the neutrality of the Red Sea. That was found to be impossible then, but if an opportunity did arise offering a prospect of the lights being replaced, he would avail himself of it.

Rome, March 6

In the course of to-day's debate in the Chamber on the amended Budget for the financial year 1911-1912 Signor Tedesco, the Treasurer, said:—

"It is gratifying to note that during the five months of the war there has been a steady and remarkable increase in receipts, so that the current Budget will be able to cover half the war expenses without showing a deficit. The outlook for the coming financial year is thus very satisfactory, the more so as the heavy expenditure caused by the earthquake in Sicily and Calabria will cease. The war has not interrupted the path of reform, nor has there been any cessation of the expenditure voted by Parliament for primary education. The money already voted will continue to be laid out for public works. In spite of the great effort being made by the country, the state of the Treasury is and will continue to be entirely reassuring. Italy's finances are in so strong a position that she can face, without a loan or additional taxation, the great enterprise in which the unanimity of the Government, Parliament, and people has asserted itself so admirably" (Reuter)

The Berliner Tageblatt is informed by its Constantinople correspondent that the Val of Beirut has proved in the presence of the foreign consuls that the Italians fired on the town intentionally. The material proof is furnished by five shells which were found nearly two miles away from the harbour and at a height of over 300 feet above the level of the sea.—(Manchester Guardian)

The following official communiqué was issued in Rome (states a Reuter's telegram):—"Contrary to statements published recently by some newspapers, no step has been taken by any Power whatsoever to advise the Italian Government to limit the area of the military operations. The Italian Government reserves its full liberty of action, with the exception already known with regard to the Ottoman coasts of the Adriatic and Ionian Seas."

Writing on the effect of the recent exploits of the Italian navy in the Red Sea, the Djibuti correspondent of the Suez states that no appreciable damage has been done by the repeated bombardments, but that their moral effect has been great. "The Italians," he declares, "are creating among the Moslem population a feeling of hatred against themselves which will never disappear. At Djibuti, at Aden, and elsewhere the native, and even the wildest tribes of the interior, are reading the Egyptian papers and know everything that passes in Tripoli and the Red Sea. In fact, by attacking the Arabs of the Red Sea, who had never done them any harm, and who but a few months ago were themselves at war with the Turks, the Italians have committed an incredible mistake which will cost them dear in the future. The Turco-Arabs are watching the movements of the ships and are waiting with confidence for a landing at some point of the Red Sea littoral."

"The Abyssinians themselves, the enemies of Islam" (adds the Suez's correspondent) "are holding themselves in readiness to profit by the circumstances. The Italian Commission which was sent to Penadir has not been able to execute the scheme of Captain Citermi, its leader, for taking possession of the territories extending beyond Lugh. The proposals made to the Abyssinian Government for the delimitation of these territories have been rejected at Addis Abeba, and the affair is in a state of suspension. In the Tigre and Wollo districts the Abyssinian warriors of Ras Mikhael are on the look out and already the house constructed by the Italian Consul at Bati has been burnt down. Once more the exploits performed by the army of Menelik in 1895-6 are being sung, and the population dreams of inflicting upon the Italians another such humiliation as followed after Adowa."—(Manchester Guardian.)

Intervention.

THE Temps, with evident authority, denies the corrections of the reports which represent an intervention of the Powers in the Turco-Italian conflict as "impending and already concerted." What seems to have occurred is that Russia has once more made a proposal for mediation, which she has submitted to Vienna, where a favourable examination owing to the recent improvement in Russo-Austrian relations is assured. The Russian proposal, however, amounts to nothing more than a suggestion for "a collective inquiry by all the Great Powers, both those of the Triple Alliance and those of the Triple Entente, at Constantinople and at Rome, with a view to discovering whether mediation is possible and to finding a basis of peace between the two belligerents."

How the new enterprise is regarded in Vienna and Berlin is shown by the following inspired utterances of the Neue Freie Presse and the Frankfurter Zeitung. The former is authorised to declare that "an exchange of views has taken place, in the course of which various proposals have been made. The latest of these proposals is that of M. Sazonoff. The majority of the Powers are of opinion that it would scarcely be possible to intervene without the consent of the two belligerents. A one-sided pressure on one of the Powers would be a violation of neutrality. The recent declaration in the Italian Parliament and the refusal of the Porte to negotiate on the basis of the annexation of Tripoli and Cyrenaica show that the moment has not yet arrived for mediation. Notwithstanding the efforts of the Powers, no mediation will be possible until the attitude of the belligerents has changed."

The Frankfurter Zeitung in a note marked by the semi-official asterisk, writes still more energetically.—"To read the Corriere della Sera one would think that all Europe was only thinking how to draw the chestnuts out of the fire for Italy. It would perhaps be useful if Berlin and Vienna were to give a denial to the rumours which have been put into circulation to the effect that the two allies of Italy are taking part in a contemplated coup against the Porte. If an intervention by the Powers were to become necessary it would be at Rome that action would in the first instance have to be taken. It is Rome which has provoked the war, and it is Rome can bring it to an end to-day by offering reasonable terms."

On his part the Rome correspondent of the Temps, reviewing the diplomatic situation, adds the usual threat—"In Italian political quarters there is not much faith in the result of an action by the Powers, but it is openly stated that if the attempt at mediation should break down the Italian Government ought to make up its mind to deliver a decisive blow at Turkey."

This constant threatening gives the Journal des Debats an occasion to read the Italian Government a homily on the need of being modest. In a long article devoted to the rumours of mediation the journal asserts that the present moment is highly inopportune for any such action, that the Italian policy which seems to have inspired the reports is much too ingenious and runs the danger of overreaching itself, that its methods of intimidating Turkey are bound to have no effect, and that "it is altogether time to renounce the system of intimidation practised against the Sultan and Europe alike." For, it adds, "it is manifestly with a view to intimidating Europe that every day the announcement is made of a war in the Balkans in the spring and of the impending disturbance of Europe's interests in the Ottoman Empire. Should the Italian Government dare speculate on a massacre of Christians by exasperated Moslems with a view to inducing the Powers to coerce Turkey in favour of peace, it will simply place itself outside humanity. Public opinion will know on whom to fix that responsibility. Schemes and methods which were in fashion at the Renaissance are now forbidden to a civilised State. The Italian Government will have to think of other methods. The Powers are certainly disposed to mediate, but only in favour of a bargain not of a capitulation. It behoves the Rome Cabinet to indicate the terms of the bargain."

St. Petersburg, March 1,

The comments of the foreign Press on the Russian initiative to discuss means of terminating the war between Turkey and Italy betray misapprehension as to the scope of Russia's action. No new proposals have been formulated in St. Petersburg since M. Sazonoff approached the Powers in regard to an exchange of views on the subject. The initiative encountered resistance in Vienna and Berlin. Russia's neighbours recently displayed a better spirit and the question is now under discussion, but what will be the outcome is still a matter of doubt.

Berlin, March 1.

Commenting on the recent Russian proposals the Frankfurter Zeitung, in a leading article this morning, questions the wisdom of the Powers taking action of any sort at this particular moment of the Turco-Italian War. The writer believes that a voluntary settlement is at present out of the question, while the other alternative—pressure on one or other of the two belligerents—is undesirable. Germany, it is true, is placed by the war in a peculiarly painful position, whereby "the work of many long years seems endangered," but she would be the first to suffer from the Turkish suspicions if she took part in any "policy of force" in order to conclude it.

Vienna, March 1.

A joint step by the neutral Powers for the purpose of ascertaining Italian peace conditions is stated to be imminent. Whether a further step will be undertaken at Constantinople is likely to depend upon the tenor of the Italian reply. The organs of the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Office make no secret of their belief that the initiative of the Powers will not be attended by any immediate success.

Paris, March 1.

According to the Temps it is believed that Great Britain, France, Russia, Germany, and Austria are prepared to contemplate the possibility of collective action with a view to mediating between Italy and Turkey, but that the form of their intervention has not yet been decided.

Rome, March 3.

The official Tribuna this evening states that reasons exist for believing that Italy is disposed to offer honourable conditions of peace to Turkey so long as full entire Italian sovereignty is recognized in Cyrenaica and Tripoli. The journal adds that the intentions of the Italian Government towards the Arabs are most benevolent. It considers that Turkey assumes a grave responsibility towards the latter race by retarding or rendering impossible a speedy settlement.

Paris, March 3.

The neutral Powers are still considering the form in which mediation on their part between Italy and Turkey would be likely to present the best chances of success. In presence of the Italian annexation decree and in view of Turkey's almost unassailable position in Europe, the necessity is realized of ascertaining before hand the sentiments and desires of the belligerents. The question arises whether the Powers should make the necessary overtures jointly and simultaneously in Rome and Constantinople or whether one of their number—Russia, for example—should be authorized to take preliminary soundings. In various quarters it is suggested that hostilities might be suspended should it be found possible to institute negotiations.

Only the vaguest and most shadowy inferences can be drawn with regard to the attitude of the belligerents themselves. Since Italy can scarcely retreat from her position in Tripoli and since, to all appearances, she finds it difficult to make headway, it is feared that the temptation to create a diversion in the Balkans may become very strong. As regards Turkey, it is pointed out that the Turkish Government may desire to await the result of the forthcoming elections before committing itself.

Constantinople, March 3.

While the Powers are at present engaged in the discussion of, or rather in the search for, a possible basis for mediation between Italy and Turkey, the Porte does not seem to have received any information from its Ambassadors with regard to the nature of these overtures, which cannot be far advanced. The view generally held here is that, as long as Italy refuses to withdraw, or Turkey to recognize, the official annexation of Tripoli the discovery of a formula which is likely to satisfy both parties is extremely difficult, if not impossible.

Vienna, March 5.

The Politische Correspondenz questions the accuracy of the announcement that the Italian Government has informed the Powers of its intention to operate without delay against several points of the Turkish Empire in case the proposed mediation should fail, but accredits the statement that the Italian Government has reserved its freedom of action in this respect.

Vienna, March 6.

Several Austrian journals report to-day that an English proposal to the Powers designed to dissuade Italy from warlike operations against the ports of European and Asiatic Turkey has been rejected by the Austro-Hungarian Government. There is reason to believe that in this form the reports are inaccurate. The British Government appears to have sounded the Governments of other Powers as to the expediency of ascertaining, by joint inquiry, of Rome the intentions of Italy, but before receiving the replies of the Powers to have abandoned the idea upon finding that such inquiry would not be welcome to the Italian Government.

Crete.

Athens, March 1.

Much satisfaction is expressed here at the restoration of order in Crete, which undoubtedly is due in large measure to the plain-spoken language of the Note addressed by the Protecting Powers to the Cretan Government. It is anticipated in Canea that another Note will be delivered, but no further warning seems necessary, as the Cretans are now fully aware of the consequences which must ensue from any contravention of the conditions laid down by the Powers. In view of the improvement in the situation His Majesty's cruiser Lancaster has withdrawn from Canea and the Minerva from Retimo to Suda Bay. The British, French and Russian naval forces in Cretan waters will be increased, but it seems improbable that any further step will be taken so long as order prevails and the desires of the Powers are respected.

Some 30 Christians have been arrested in connexion with the murders at Kurtomado and the perpetrators of the crime are believed to be among them.

Candia, March 2.

Another Mahomedan has been murdered at Canea by Christians and has been buried by the Gendarmes. Great uneasiness prevails and all the Mahomedan shops have been closed at Canea, an outbreak being feared.

It is reported that in consequence of the repeated attacks upon Mahomedans the Powers will hand another Note to the Cretan Government couched in stronger terms than the last. More warships are expected at Suda Bay.

Athens, March 3.

The hopes entertained here that order had been restored in Crete have been rudely dissipated by the murder of another Moslem on Friday night. A feeling of dejection now prevails and it is realized that a continuation of outrages committed on the Moslem population will afford the Powers ample justification for the adoption of severe disciplinary measures. So far as is known the Powers will limit their activity for the present to the despatch of additional warships to Cretan waters. M. Koundouros, the Cretan leader, is now stated to advise the cessation of all revolutionary activity.

Malta, March 3.

His Majesty's cruiser Barham has left suddenly under sealed orders. It is understood that she is proceeding to Crete. (Reuter.)

Reuter's correspondent in Malta telegraphs that it is persistently rumoured there that the protecting Powers have decided upon the military re-occupation of Crete and that the West Yorkshire Regiment, which is stationed at Malta, has been warned to hold itself in readiness to go to the island. It is stated in official quarters, however, that nothing is known of any such decision.

H.M. cruiser Diana will leave Malta for Crete on 15th March, presumably to relieve H.M. Cruiser Lancaster.

News from Turkish Sources.

(FROM THE "TANIN.")

(Specially Translated for the "Comrade.")

Paris, 24th February.

ACCORDING to the messages of the correspondent of the Temps from Azizia the Italians came out of Tripoli with two detachments of Cavalry and 4 regiments of Infantry, and 3 batteries of Artillery with the intention of capturing Zanzur and passed Qir-Qarash. The Arabs hearing the sounds of Artillery at once made for the place from which it was proceeding, and delivered an attack on the left of the Italians and defeated them. The Italian losses are unascertained. The Arabs are in high spirits. The above has been confirmed by official telegrams to the Ministry of War.

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURC.")

(Specially translated for the "Comrade.")

We understand that the Italian Government has instructed the Government of Erythra to buy 5,000 camels which are intended for services in Tripolitaine. Nearly 2,000 camels have already been embarked by an Italian transport.

We are informed that Abdulla Bey, the son of the Sharif of Mecca, has just given to Sheikh Ali Yousuff the sum of 25,000 English pounds for being sent with the Red Crescent Mission to Benghazi.

On the other side the Committee has also changed more than 30,000 English pounds into Turkish money for being sent with the same Mission.

His Excellency Hasan Madkour Pasha, Treasurer of the fund for the war, advises the local press that the sums received until to-day total 86,027 English pounds.

From the special correspondent of the Paris Temps with the Turkish Forces:—

"I have already telegraphed to you an account of the fruitless reconnaissance made by a squadron of the 90th Italian Lancers which have just arrived at Ain-zara. I am of opinion that the lance will be of no utility in this country—because the Arab generally attacks his enemy on foot. The Italian horses, moreover, find it impossible to operate in the desert, the sand is so soft that horses' hoofs sink into it. For the cavalry the mounts of this country are absolutely necessary.

"The Arab who fights with his rifle and his sabre on foot and is an excellent shot has the advantage over the horseman who attacks him. On horseback also the Arab has the advantage over his adversary, for his small and extremely fast pony helps him to traverse long distances much more quickly than an European cavalryman could hope to do.

"The Italian aeroplanes continue to work hard in the service of reconnaissance and assisting the lines of communication. They rain proclamations from the sky and the morning of 17th January has brought us two—one signed by Mr. Giolitti, the Prime Minister, announcing that three Italian men of war, whose names are given, have sunk seven Turkish transports full of soldiers, and also a yacht called Jawit which was full of arms, the other proclamation signed by General Canova declares that Italy has captured 'the mother of Arabs' (he is probably referring to Tripoli) and exhorts them to submit, promising them 25 francs and a sack of barley per rifle. In using the word 'Mother' the General has been very badly inspired. The Arabs have not understood the allusion and their indignation is fierce against the Italians for their having dared to pretend that they had captured the mother of Arabs. This bad effect is still more accentuated by other expressions of the proclamation.

"The front of the Turkish troops extends over a length of nearly 40 kilometres. Their organisation is excellent. No Italian can possibly advance a mile or a mile and a half out of the fortifications. Not even an Arab can come out of the Italian lines, and I assure you that a very large number of these have been taken prisoner because they had been sent out by the Italians to persuade their compatriots to submit by promising them rewards and many other things.

"The Italians have reckoned without the Arab, without the sand of the desert, without the deficiency of water, without the cold which even is surprising and last, but not least, without the most terrible enemy of all, which will soon assail them, viz., the horrible heat of this country. My god! it makes me afraid for myself. I have tasted only three warm days lately and I am told that I only experienced the cool temperature of the nights of the coming spring which will soon be followed by scorching days of the hot weather. I pity most cordially, the poor Italian soldiers. This country is made for Arabs only, but the European will take long to acclimatise himself even in a few points of the littoral and the oasis. I cannot give you the strength of the Turkish forces, for this information cannot be divulged—but I can tell you that the Turks have a considerable effective force and their number is being continually augmented by arrival of young men from the tribes of the interior."

The Jenue Tur publishes the following account of an interview with Maître Salem, the Attorney:—

It was telegraphed from Rome to Paris, that La Tribuna on the authority of its correspondent at Philippopolis announced that a financier, a trustworthy man of the Committee of Union and Progress was on his way to Rome carrying proposals of peace from Turkey. Other Italian newspaper, republished this information and even gave the name of the messenger of peace, the Advocate Salem. Mr. Salem really arrived last night in Rome. Since leaving the train he has been the prey of the Italian journalists whom he assured that his journey to Rome was in no way diplomatic. He was not entrusted with any political mission, but with a financial mission of an absolutely private character.

In my turn I wished to see Mr. Salem, and I spent an hour with him. We conversed cheerfully on all the rumours about him.

"I had no idea of the importance that was attributed to me," said my amiable speaker in very good French. "I was dumb-founded when I was told that I was bringing proposals of peace. But at Constantinople, nobody, do you understand, speaks of peace. Besides, why should they speak of it? One notices the war so little. The Italians residing in Turkey have suffered little themselves. It is understood that I do not speak of the working class. I have come to Rome only to try and save the big Italian banking houses of Salonika which have been considerably harmed by the war, and may fail if help is not given. Their balance-sheet examined by the Bank of Athens and by the Oriental Bank shows assets of a millions against 12 millions of debts. I found the best disposition in the French Banks, which are creditors of my clients. But if they agree to allow all the time needed to pay off their debts, they consider, and I think alike, that it is the Italian Banks who ought to make the necessary effort to save their fellow countrymen from an unmerited disaster who have suffered by a war declared by Italy itself. You see, I am far from an ambassador of peace, and if I have been to the Consulate it was simply for my clients. As an Advocate I do not busy myself with politics."

Anarchism in Macedonia.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, February 15.

At this juncture Hadji Adil Bey was appointed Minister of the Interior. Originally a lawyer by profession, he became prominent under the old regime as lecturer on the Civil Code (Medjelleh) to the Salonika faculty. He was at the same time head of the Imports Department of the Salonika Custom House, and won the esteem of the foreign mercantile community by his ability and probity. Shortly after the revolution he was appointed head of the Customs at Salonika, and afterwards Vali of Adrianople, where he achieved decided success. In 1910 he succeeded Dr. Nazim as Secretary-General of the Committee of Union and Progress. In this position he showed considerable ability as an organizer, and did his utmost to reconcile the warring factions within the party. A good Moslem, well educated, and of a good presence, he seems well fitted for office. He accepted the Ministry of Interior somewhat unwillingly but, having once taken office, lost no time in laying before his colleagues the state of affairs in European Turkey and his proposed remedies. It was soon decided that he should proceed to Macedonia and Albania with a picked Turkish staff of officials, whose duties at headquarters brought them into close contact with the affairs of the European provinces, and with two of the European officials in Ottoman service, Mr. R. W. Graves, C.M.G., whose services to the British and Ottoman Governments are well known, and Lieutenant Colonel Foulon, a very able French officer who is "gendarme par métier." Hadji Adil Bey's powers are almost dictatorial. His colleagues in the Cabinet, including the Minister of War, have delegated their powers to him, so that he may be able to put into immediate operation all remedial measures on which he may decide. He has further been invested with the right to dismiss or suspend the higher provincial officials, whose dismissal, like their appointment, has hitherto only been effected by Imperial iradeh. His programme, the general lines of which are known, includes the reorganization of the Gendarmérie, for which he disposes of ample credits, the improvement of communications and the construction of schools, the granting of certain special concessions to the Albanian hill-tribes, and last, but not least, land settlement.

It is easy enough to minimize the importance of Hadji Adil's task by describing his mission as a mere electioneering move, designed to catch Macedonian votes. The Turkish Government would be human if it paid no attention to its chances in the coming elections, but there is ample reason to believe that a measure, which, be it remembered, is likely to be severely criticized by the Young Turk extremists, has not been adopted merely to win the good will of Albanian or Macedonian electors. The Moderates have, in fact, realized that the situation requires prompt remedial action if the State is to be saved from the danger of insurrection and foreign intervention. Whether the Commission will succeed in its task is another question. By the admission of many Turks, Young and Old, it has started late, and tardy repentance may not prevent the errors of the Committee's policy in European Turkey from bearing evil fruit. It will meet with much opposition both from Turks and non-Turks, and there are some who believe that its success is less likely to be compromised by Bulgar and Albanian irreconcilables than by the civilian devotion of "Turkification" and those soldiers who believe Turkey can only be ruled by sword and stick. Personal ambitions and jealousies which have played so large a part in Turkish internal politics must also be taken into account as possible obstacles. Yet all those who wish well either to the Turks or to the races which they rule must hope that the Commission by its success will stave off, if it cannot altogether avert, that danger of a general outbreak which no serious student of Near Eastern politics can pretend to disregard. Its failure may spell ruin to the hopes not only of the new régime and of the Turks, but of other peoples of South-Eastern Europe.

Salonika, February 20.

The continuation of the series of assassinations of Moslems by Bulgarian bands is giving rise to a growing feeling of resentment and anger among the entire Mussalman population of Macedonia, and it is to be feared that, if the Government does not succeed in putting an end to these outrages, it will be very difficult to avoid massacres. Alike at Ishtip and, more recently, after the outrage at Krucovo, it was with the greatest difficulty that the troops kept the mob in hand. The ideas of the Mahomedans are expressed in a manifesto which has been forwarded by the population at Kuprili to the Grand Vizier and the Minister of the Interior. It is signed by the civil and religious chiefs of the community and contains express threats of violence against the Bulgarian population if the authors of the outrages go longer unpunished.

On the other hand, the continued calling out of the reservists in the Drama district has given rise to great local discontent. The Mussalman population has made a demonstration and addressed a vigorous protest to the Grand Vizier against the practice of calling the able-bodied men under arms without serious reasons. The protest demands that, if it is necessary to guard the railway, regular troops be employed for the purpose, since otherwise the local population will be ruined.

Salonica, February, 22.

Although it was generally anticipated that Hadji Adil Bey, the Minister of the Interior, would avail himself of the opportunity of personally distributing the money necessary for the reforms decided upon, it now appears that he wishes to inspect, in some cases, the progress of the work authorized. I learn that the Vilayets of Uskub, Scodra, Monastir, and Janina have already been advised that a credit of £120,000 has been placed at their disposal, which sum is to be spent in repairing the Government konaks and prisons. The Vais have received instructions to begin work immediately.

According to the plans drawn up by Hadji Adil Bey, the tour of the Commission will last three months. Physically the journey is sure to be very trying, and it is at least doubtful whether the majority of the members will be able to complete it. Some of them are even now more or less seriously indisposed.

The Kumakam of Gjevpoh reports that a new Bulgarian band, 16 strong, has appeared in that district.

February 24

The Commission left here for Kuprih this morning. After resting for one day it will proceed to Uskub, where it will stay for five days, and afterwards will proceed direct to Prishtina, where, in accordance with the orders of the Sultan, a great meeting will be held at the tomb of Sultan Murad on the anniversary of the birthday of the Prophet. After a solemn religious ceremony the faithful will receive gifts from the Sultan in the shape of sweetmeats.

British Red Crescent Mission.

BENGALURU,

25th February, 1912

DEAR MR. AMER ALI

We left Sfax by the Steamer Jell on 21st February at 10 P.M. and arrived here at 11 P.M. in the evening of the 22nd, stayed the night in a lively little hotel. We disembarked from the steamer in sailing boats—the coast is very shallow and the steamer had to anchor about three miles from El-Biban. El-Biban is a little sandy Aden about 100 yards square at the mouth of a large lagoon. The Agent of the Campagne Mixte lives there and manages a large fishery business. After waiting at the entrance to the lagoon for about two hours until there was sufficient water we sailed another four miles and landed about four or five miles from here and came on with our personal luggage in carts which the French Commandant here sent for us.

The British Consul General at Marseilles, Mr. Gurney, was the greatest assistance to us in inducing the Trans-Atlantique to take us and our baggage. Consul Burke at Bizerta offered us every assistance and at Tunis the Vice Consul gave me every assistance and helped us in getting the boxes cleared at Sfax without being opened. Mr. Leonardi, the Consul at Sfax, simply asked the whole time helping us. I should be very much obliged if you would thank the Foreign Office for the unofficial assistance we obtained, at the same time mentioning the Consuls at Marseilles, Bizerta and Tunis, and specially the name of Mr. Leonardi at Sfax. In Sfax I got a good Arab cook at 120 francs per month, also another Arab who speaks a little English as interpreter and general help at 110 francs per month. Late in the afternoon of our departure a young Arab arrived from Bizerta with a note from the Consul there most strongly recommending him. I asked the Consul if he knew of anyone when we passed through Bizerta, he had met this young man, who is of very good family, has lived a great deal in France with the family of a Naval Officer, he has also studied in hospitals. When the Consul spoke to him he rushed off and caught the train and came straight through to Sfax in the hope of catching us up. I consulted with Dr. Haigh and we decided to take him. He has a cousin who went as hospital assistant to the first Turkish Red Crescent which went in November. I agreed to give him 110 francs per month. I find him of the very greatest use and he has already helped to save us a good deal of expense in keeping prices and charges down. I am very glad we took him. I hope you approve.

All prices have gone up enormously owing to the war. In Tunis a man who had just come from the Turkish camp said we should have to pay 12 francs each for camels. But I got letters from influential Arabs in Sfax and I hope we shall not have to pay more than about four francs. I have been as careful as possible but the expenses are going to be considerably more than we estimated for. The charges at Sfax for clearing, handling and sealing the baggage, etc., which were quite unavoidable, amounted to 248 francs, this for example we did not allow for. The steamer charges from Sfax were also very heavy, 414 francs for baggage—for tickets 270 francs, in addition landing charges from steamer 47 francs. Then too there are such unavoidable expenses as tips, luggage to and from stations and steamers, etc., etc.

Mons. Desevaux has been most kind and polite and has given us a nice piece of ground where we are encamped, it is a cheaper and more comfortable arrangement. We have been delayed here waiting for camels arriving from Tripoli, Tunisian camels are no longer allowed to cross the border. We save considerably by waiting for the Tripoli camels, as we shall get them cheaper and shall not have to change camels on the way. We expect to start to-morrow afternoon and shall take about 6 to 7 days or perhaps 7 to 8 days. The halt here in camp has been of advantage, as we have been able to get into working order.

The French authorities everywhere have been very good and I heard from an Officer on the Zell that the French Government had wired to say we were on board and that the Italians were not to interfere with the vessel. Every other voyage she was overhauled by an Italian warship.

There seems to be dreadful famine in Tripoli amongst the poor refugees. After consultation with people who should know I have decided not to attempt to take over food for them, because if they have money there is the stuff for them to buy. The few camel loads we would take would not go far, would attract the poor people, and when the supply stopped the conditions would be worse than before.

I propose to send you an urgent telegram from Azizia or elsewhere appealing for help and funds.

I am glad to report to you that we are all a very happy party and that everyone works well together. There is no such thing as grumbling.

Yours sincerely,

(Sd) C. F. DIXON JOHNSON

The Turko-Italian War.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "NEAR EAST.")

SIR,

May I through the medium of your esteemed journal, approach the friends of humanity on the important question which is placed before the European public by the Chancelleries of Europe apparently to put a stop to the war?

The people of Europe, especially the British Press and the public, desired to stop it at the very beginning. This desire became intensified after reports of the unwarrantable cruelties perpetrated by the Italians on defenceless Moslems—men, women, and children—reached Europe, in spite of the strict censorship imposed by Italy.

The war could easily have been stopped had the Foreign Ministers of various countries either been true to the pledges given to Turkey during the last fifty years for the preservation of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire or acted according to the desire of the people whom they were representing or sympathised with Turkey in her endeavours to put her house in order. The only thing they did was to ask Italy to confine the scene of operations to Tripoli. Italy broke this pledge as readily as she had previously broken the various treaty obligations.

If the Powers really wish to stop the war on an equitable basis, and not in the interests of unrighteous Italy, or their own, it can even now be accomplished without much trouble. There are two ways: (1) Turkey to be allowed passage of troops through Egypt (2) through Austria-Hungary.

With regard to the passage of troops through Egypt, a question might arise as to the position of England there. She is there with the consent of Turkey as well as of the Khedive for certain definite purposes, and has repeatedly stated that the suzerain rights of Turkey will always be respected.

Therefore, England could have no objection to the passage of troops if the Egyptians themselves agree to it. In the face of the display of feeling throughout the whole of the Moslem world, who could doubt that the Egyptians would agree to an act which in no way would interfere with the status quo?

But let us assume that Egypt is an independent country just like Austria-Hungary and neutral. We have then to see whether the passage of troops through Egypt or Austria-Hungary would be a cause of complaint on the part of Italy, and whether these countries could legally allow the passage of troops through them.

According to International Law, neutral countries can allow the passage of troops through their territories to one of the belligerents without this being a cause of complaint on the part of the other belligerent, even though the same concession may not be granted on sufficient grounds to the other belligerent.

Based upon the views of such great jurists as Vattel ("Droit des Gens," liv. III., ch. 7, sec. 119-13), Grotius ("De Jur. Bel. ac Pac.," liv. II., cap. 2, §13), and Sir W. Scott (3 "C. Rob.," 353), Wheaton, a great jurist himself, writes as follows:—"This exemption extends to the passage of an army or fleet through the limits of the territorial jurisdiction, which can hardly be considered an innocent passage, such as a nation has a right to demand from another, and even if it were such an innocent passage, is one of those imperfect rights the exercise of which depends upon the consent of the proprietor, and which cannot be compelled against his will. It may be granted or withheld at the discretion of the neutral State, but its being granted is no ground of conflict on the part of the other belligerent Power, providing the same privilege is granted to him, unless there be sufficient reason for withholding it"—(Wheaton's "International Law," sec. 427, p. 579)

Grotius mentions that neutral nations ought to afford a free passage to an enemy seeking to recover its rights in a just war. In the present case no one doubts that Italy is unjust and that Turkey, who is the injured party, only desires the passage of troops in order to protect her own rights. Both Egypt and Austria-Hungary therefore should allow the Turks to pass through their territories, and Italy can have no right to object to it.

Men-of-war belonging to belligerents have been allowed to pass through the Suez Canal, and indeed frequently through neutral waters. It can hardly be contended that the passage of troops meant for the same purpose stands on a different footing. Not to go back very far in the past, we have a precedent in the passage of our troops through the Orange Free State, which was neutral, in order to carry on operations against the Basutos in the late Basuto war.

If England were to act according to law, and raise no objection to the passage of troops through Egypt, she would regain the esteem in which she was held by the Moslems. The same will apply to Austria-Hungary, and the breach caused by the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina will be healed and the war will be over.

Thanking you on behalf of the Moslem world for the interest you have displayed in the cause of the oppressed Moslems and humanity,—I remain, Sir, yours truly.

The Italian Parliament and the War.

(FROM A "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN" CORRESPONDENT IN ITALY.)

THE opening day of the Italian Parliament has come and gone. Feeling ran high, and the enthusiasm shown was almost unparalleled. There had been endless conjecture regarding the attitude likely to be taken up by the Opposition. The three groups or parties—Radicals, Republicans, and Socialists—held their meetings in the morning to decide upon their respective lines of action. The Radical party expressed themselves unanimously in favour of the Decree of Sovereignty in Tripolitania, but insisted that the difficult problems of development of the colonies, economic and other, must be carefully watched. The Republicans, headed by Barzani, passed a resolution blaming the errors and policy of the Government, but apart from their adverse opinion as to the political necessity of the war itself they recognised the completed fact of annexation. They resolved, however, to put no trust in the Government, but to reserve judgment upon the grave responsibilities so lightly undertaken.

The real interest centred in the Socialist party, itself inclined to divide into two camps. Their meeting lasted several hours, and opinions were various concerning the best course to take under the circumstances. Frapolini said he was averse from the war and refused any participation in it, he considered conquest a crime and the lives of the Arabs sacred, just because he was a Socialist he was averse from piracy. Turati felt with him, but suggested that they should attend the opening session of Parliament, remaining seated in process. Nofri remarked that the Nationalists wanted Italy to be the greatest nation in the world, but the Socialists wanted it to be the most humanitarian. He hoped a means would be found, but meanwhile he argued that the soldiers being of the proletariat, the Proletariat party could not refuse them homage.

Finally, two resolutions were proposed, the one suggesting the party should attend the session but not rise to their feet; the other, adopted by a bare majority, was to this effect—The party consider that they must share in stamping on the first meeting of the House the character of a homage, justly due, to the soldiers and their valour; by thus joining they prevent the Assembly being dominated by the deputati borghesi, and thus assuming only a Nationalist character. They therefore agreed to attend the session, rising to salute those who had nobly done their duty. Further, they determined to express their views about the war during the next day's debate on the Decree of Annexation.

And so it came about that with indescribable fervour the 472 deputies offered a unanimous vote of homage to the army in Tripoli. In the following day's debate the Socialists bravely attempted to express their views. Bissolati was listened to with impatience and interruption, but Turati, who courageously faced the fury of some 400 deputies, was prevented from a clear statement such as could do his cause justice. Cicotti made a notable speech till he, too, was howled down. Leone Caetani's clear and weighty reasons for voting against the Annexation Decree were given to the press. As a result it is announced that he was immediately deposed from his position as honorary president of the Circolo Monarchico Universitario di Roma. Before night an urgency meeting of the Circolo was called and they unanimously resolved that Leone Caetani was "unworthy" to be their president.

"But," says Caetani, "serenely defying universal unpopularity, including probably my own electors, I felt it my duty publicly and solemnly to protest by withholding my vote and thus to separate myself from the responsibility of those who have willed this sudden and, to my mind, unjustifiable conquest of the two African provinces."

Contraband in War.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Tripoli, February 20.

THE effervescence produced in the French and Italian Press by the Carthage and Manouba incidents seems, fortunately, to have died down. But a certain unpleasant taste remains, and here in Tripoli, at any rate, almost in touch with the Tunis border, the question of contraband from the western frontier is discussed with some bitterness. It was my lot to come into immediate contact with Italian feeling, in Italy and Tripoli, during the weeks which followed the events of October 23-26. At that time Italians were justly appreciative of the attitude taken up by almost the whole of the French Press, which published fair and unbiased accounts of the action of the Italian troops, in sharp contrast with the grossly distorted version which appeared in sections of the Press of other countries. Italy was rightly grateful for this moral support, but in certain quarters it was considered excessively pro-Italian, and the resentment against French sympathy with Italy culminated in the attempted assassination of M. Carrère, the correspondent of the Temps, at the hands, it was alleged, of a Young Turkish crosser.

Recently it has seemed as though this attitude of France and her Press were forgotten. There is distinctly noticeable in certain circles a tendency to criticize unduly French action in Tunis, and to endeavour, by implication, to show that such action is in some way responsible for the slow progress of Italian arms. This frame of mind may result in harm to both parties involved, and it may be apropos to attempt an impartial analysis of the situation.

In the first place, it would be well to bear in mind that Tunisia is not under the absolute sovereignty of France. The Bardo Treaty, concluded in 1881 between France and the Bey of Tunis, has never been formally recognized by Turkey, and at the recent delimitation of the frontier between Tunis and Tripolitania the Turkish Commissioners dealt with Commissioners appointed in the name of the Bey. The Ottoman claim to Tunis has not been entirely rejected or disposed of, and at a moment when Italy is quite rightly, for fear of future complications, refusing to recognize even a shadow of Turkish suzerainty over her new provinces, she might be fairly expected to show some sympathy with the kind of difficulty she is determined to avoid. Again, the Protectorate of Tunisia, with an area of some 50,000 square miles, has an almost entirely Moslem population of nearly two millions, while the provinces of Tripolitania and Cyrenaica have something over a million persons to populate an area six times as large. When Italy proceeded to occupy these two provinces, her action sent an immediate wave of unrest through the two million Moslems of Tunisia, which culminated in a grave anti-Italian or anti-European outbreak in the city of Tunis itself. The French were forced to take exceptional measures to preserve order, while the prolongation of the Tripoli campaign has kept these fires smouldering and added greatly to the anxieties of the authorities in Tunis.

If France has allowed provisions and supplies to be forwarded from Tunis to the Turco-Arab headquarters in the Tripoli Hinterland, she has equally permitted the passage of provisions and transport camels to the Italian forces in Tripoli, and in this way she may be said to have held the scales even between Ottoman and Italian, and this in spite of much difficulty and inconvenience. It is not exactly clear to what extent she could have prevented the passage of provisions across the border into Tripoli, and in any case another fact should not be forgotten.

Though the population of Tunisia as a whole is much denser than that of Tripolitania, the border regions are practically desert, and very sparsely inhabited. It follows that as long as the Italians fail to occupy Zaua, and police their side of the border, it is practically impossible for the French authorities to close completely such a frontier, given the secret sympathy of the Moslem population on the western side with the Moslem forces fighting across the border. Further, if France had gone to enormous expense and stationed large forces along the frontier, the result would have been practically the same, so long as the Turks were allowed by the Italians to control Zaua and its Hinterland.

There has been considerable discussion as to the merits or demerits of the Italian plan of campaign. It is held with some justice that the defeat of the Turks at Ain-Zaua might have been turned into a final rout, that quicker and bolder movement might have smashed the Turco-Arab combination, captured all the stores and munitions at Azizah, and practically solved the military problem as far as Tripolitania was concerned. On the other hand, it is maintained (and the contention may not lightly be dismissed) that the nature of the terrain between Tripoli and the Gebel made it wiser, if not absolutely necessary, to adopt the slow and cautious methods which have found favour with the authorities. In any case, most critics are agreed that the omission of the Italians to occupy Zaua was a very grave mistake. Zaua has been used as a base for Turkish supplies and communications. It has been the main landing place for such contraband as has been run by sea—no small quantity, for the Italian blockading squadron is deficient both in numbers and, for winter work, in sea-keeping qualities, and it has also been the point of concentration for all the contraband brought over the border, the only point of concentration possible, unless the caravans are to follow the much longer and more difficult route further south. The mistake of the Italians has done much to prolong the resistance of the Turco-Arab forces, and it has vastly increased the difficulties of the French position in Tunisia.

We are given to understand that the return of General Caneva from Rome is the prelude of a more vigorous offensive, and it is almost an open secret that the occupation of Zaua is to be included in the operations destined for the immediate future. When this has been accomplished it is certain that the contraband question will be readily solved by the co-operation of the French and Italian authorities. In this way we may hope for a restoration of the friendly atmosphere which existed between these two new neighbours in North Africa at the time of the Carrère incident. The clouds of suspicion, which seem in great part to have been the result of mischief-making in the Press, unwitting and deliberate, should pass away and leave the sky clear and untroubled.

The Future of Islam.*

BY THE RIGHT HONOURABLE SYED AMEER ALI

As I HAVE the privilege of enjoying the friendship of the lecturer for whose talents and learning I have very great admiration, he will, I am sure, pardon me if in the few criticisms I venture to offer he finds anything in disagreement with his standpoint, or with his estimate of the religion I profess. I must say that in the discursive paper he read to us I did not exactly follow the thesis he was trying to work out. I do not know whether, speaking to an audience mostly consisting of Englishmen, he sought to show that Mohammedans ought to consider themselves fortunate in being under foreign and Christian rule, or whether he wanted to point out that the theory of Pan-Islamism, invented in Europe to justify attacks on Mussulman communities, is really baseless. If the former was his thesis, he has, no doubt, developed it to the satisfaction of this assembly. But I would remind him that there is such a thing as sentiment in this world, and that the late Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman once told the House of Commons that nations felt that even bad rule by people belonging to their own race is better than the rule of aliens. I hope that neither the lecturer nor this assembly will deny all credit to those Mohammedans who are so ignorant as to prefer their own rule to that of foreigners. Surely some weight ought to be attached even in these days to sentiment of that character. I believe that in European countries men who fight for their independence and refuse to be subjugated by aliens are usually called heroes; but it seems that Mussulmans in similar conditions are not entitled to be called anything but fanatics. I have come across some Moors who were ignorant enough to dislike being subjugated by France. If anybody wishes to know how they are exploited by Frenchmen he has only to refer to a recent book by Mr Leeder entitled "The Gateway of the Desert." It will give him some idea of the "fanaticism" of the Moors. It will show that they object to be exploited by foreigners who want to extract as much from them as possible. They object to their young men being turned into absinthe-drinking fanneurs and their young women into beings not usually mentioned in polite society. They say that women are entitled under the system prevalent amongst them to certain respect, they do not wish to see them on the stage of the café chantant or adopting the lax manners often seen in Western cities. I met some time ago an extremely able German diplomatist and he mentioned to me that these "fanatical" Moors would have preferred an English to a French protectorate. He was modest enough to put the name of his own country second in this connection and I think this was very candid on his part. He said the Moors hated French domination largely because it meant the imposition upon them of French civilization in its least agreeable aspect. For my part I abominate that word civilization, having regard to the abuses it covers. Even religion is not responsible for so much crime toward weak nations as civilization. I hope this assembly will give some credit to these Mussulmans for cherishing sentiments which would here be called patriotic. (Cheers.) It is a matter of regret that the lecturer has not said one word in reprobation of the extraordinary enterprise in which Italy is engaged in Tripoli. She is waging there a war against a power with which she was on friendly terms up to the very moment she broke the peace. The Italians went to Tripoli on the allegation of releasing the Arabs from the Turkish yoke under which they groaned, that they were to be the liberators of the Tripolitans. But these very Arabs are now laying down their lives not to be subjugated to foreign rule. The sentiment which has led them to join hands with the Turks can be well understood seeing that the peace and prosperity which existed in the Tripolitan oasis have disappeared. Their plantations are ruined, the date palms have been cut down, and starvation stares the people in the face. That may be civilization, but as I am only a Moslem it is not a civilization which appeals to me. In saying all this with regard to recent attacks upon Moslem countries I wish it to be understood that I fully recognise the prosperity the Mussulmans enjoy in India under the rule of Great Britain and I am persuaded that no Mussulman subject of King George has any feeling other than that of absolute loyalty to the British Crown. But they expect on their side also that some value should be attached to their feelings and sentiments, especially with regard to their cherished traditions.

The subject of the present lecture was brought before the Central Asian Society a few years ago by Mr (now Sir) Valentine Chirol. On that occasion I ventured to say that this idea of Pan-Islamism, viz., a combination of Mohammedans in an aggressive sense against European Powers, was a European invention with the object of raising a prejudice against Islam, and thus rendering the efforts to subjugate independent Moslem States more easy.

Pan-Islamism is a figment of the brain, an invention designed to help in destroying the liberty of Mussulman nations. If the insubstantiality of Pan-Islamism was the thesis of the lecturer then I am in hearty accord with him.

I hope you will forgive a personal reference when I say that for the last 37 years I have laboured to bring East and West together and to keep the Moslem peoples of India steadfast in their devotion to the British Crown. That steadfastness is maintained, but it is perfectly intelligible and absolutely natural that their sympathies should go out to their co-religionists in other parts of the world suffering from troubles which from their nature ought to appeal to every man and every woman of whatever race or religion and stir the instincts of humanity and generosity in him or her. (Cheers.) From all parts of India, from South Africa, from Malaya, in fact from every country inhabited by Mohammedans high and low, educated and uneducated, there has come evidence that they feel intensely in respect to, and sympathise deeply with their people in Persia, in Tripoli and in Morocco in the troubles and trials they are undergoing. Everywhere there is the greatest indignation and sorrow at the wanton injustice and suffering to which they are subjected. You will all admit that these feelings are at least excusable and intelligible, and you will not be surprised then that Moslems should look to Great Britain to do what she can to relieve the situation. We recall what was done by Cromwell when the Vaudois were being massacred. One word from him sufficed to stop those massacres, and he left to England a noble memory. Surely the Moslems of India are entitled to express their sympathy and desire to relieve the sufferings of their co-religionists, and no man, certainly no Englishman, has a right to question their right to do so or its naturalness or prosperity. I believe that in a time not far back the outrage on humanity and international justice which is so largely observed now with a certain amount of callousness would have sent a shock through the length and breadth of England, but things are changed!

If the thesis of the lecturer was that Islam being divided into sects there is no possibility of its uniting against any aggressive action of Europe or any other religion, I am willing to admit that the sects and peoples of Islam have no idea, and have never had any idea of combining to hurl themselves against the verried ranks of Europe, or that they are ever likely to rise against Great Britain or any other liberal Government. Still Europe might well take to heart the lesson presented by Italian aggression in Tripoli. There was no cohesion between the Arabs and Turks there until the invasion took place, but that has had the effect of uniting the Moslems throughout Northern Africa. If European nations indulge in these crusades you must expect the various tribes and peoples and sects to sink their differences and to unite in defence against the common invader. But as to organised Pan-Islamism, I have never come across any missionary of it in the whole of my experience. To the Mohammedans of India the name of Jemal-ud-Din is scarcely known and the cult that has been described to us is without following there. In respect to the Senussi, to whom Sir D. G. Rees referred, they have kept aloof from political movements, for they make a point to avoid political complications with foreign governments. The Senussi movement is one of a distant religious kind, but what the effect of the invasion on Tripoli will be upon its adherents in altering their standpoint I cannot say.

The learned lecturer has a great deal to say about the divisions of Islam. He seems to have forgotten the divisions in Christendom from the earliest times onwards, and that they continue to this day. I saw a book recently which described no less than 170 or 180 Christian sects. One of these sects, the Christadelphian, holds that the Messianic reign will begin with the massacre of all infidels.

There is one other point the lecturer holds the view that constitutional government is foreign to Islam. Well I venture to say that if constitutional Government is intimately associated with any creed it is that of Islam. No one knows better than our Chairman what a democratic religion it is. It is more socialistic and democratic than any other system I know of, and under it constitutional government flourished in old times. If the lecturer will look into the history of Islamic monarchies he will find that questions of state were settled by councils, that in some respects they were as representative as the systems which have been evolved by 600 years of democracy in this country. Councils sat and decided important issues at every period when Islam enjoyed any degree of prosperity. Saladdin himself had a council to which he submitted questions affecting the progress of his people. In Persia there were councils at the capitals and each town had its headman presiding over the local corporation. The question will be asked, how it is that a system which so flourished was overtaken by decadence? In my judgment this was due to the conflict with Christianity. The Crusaders are responsible for the destruction of the civilization and culture of Western Asia. In Spain it was the Inquisition which destroyed the life and culture the Moors had created there.

After mentioning various works throwing light upon this historical argument the Right Hon'ble gentleman proceeded. I am sorry that one so gifted and learned as our lecturer should say that Islam is unsuited to constitutional government, and should overlook the fact that it is the calamities which have come from outside which have caused the decay of self-governing institutions in the Moslem world. The Islamic position has been entirely different from that of England, which has not been overrun by foreign foes since the distant days of William the Conqueror and thus been saved the trials and troubles to which the countries of Islam have been exposed. The Tartars reduced the most prosperous cities of Asia to ashes. Multitudes lost their lives in the sack of Bagdad, Herat, Nishapur and other places. I am sure the lecturer will excuse me for having pointed out that in my judgment his statements on many points need qualification.

The Week.

The Budget.

In the House of Commons on the 2nd Mr Lloyd George introduced the Budget. He said that the surplus for 1911-12 amounting to £6,545,000 was the largest on record. The prosperity of trade during that financial year had exceeded the most sanguine expectations. The principal taxes had done well despite the strike except sugar, owing to drought. Tea had yielded £141,000 below the estimate, though it had exceeded the estimate of the preceding year. This was due, firstly, to many tea estates having been converted into rubber, and secondly to the strike. The loss of revenue up to March 31st, which was directly attributable to the strike was £400,000.

Mr. Lloyd George said that all classes had shared in the prosperity. He reviewed the working of the 1909 Budget. None of the taxes in that Budget could be justly described as revolutionary. They did not tax any necessities of life. Trade had improved and unemployment diminished. Before the strike began, unemployment had reached the lowest point ever touched. Regarding the surplus, Mr. Lloyd George said that we were underspending and the nature of that must be considered. Underspending by the Admiralty amounting to £1,500,000 was only a postponement, not a saving. Two other contingencies must also be considered, viz., the effect of the strike and the possibility mentioned by Mr. Churchill on March 18th. Nobody deplored more than himself the enormous waste on armaments, but so much depended upon the absolute inviolability of our shores that if we erred, we were right to err on the safe side.

"So long," Mr Lloyd George said, "as I am satisfied that Mr. Churchill's demands will only secure the minimum necessary for safety, my duty will be to find the necessary finance. It is premature to say what or how much the very serious contingency to which Mr Churchill referred may mean, all that we can do is to provide the necessary reserve for it."

Mr Lloyd George proposed at present to devote the whole surplus to strengthening the Exchequer Balance. If at the end of the year it had been unnecessary to draw upon it, Parliament would judge the situation and devote the reserve wholly or partly to reduction of debt.

Mr. Lloyd George estimated the expenditure for 1912-13 at £186,885,000, an increase of £5,600,000. The increased expenditure was due to the Insurance Act, and the purchase of telephones. He estimated that the strike would cause a total loss of revenue from spirits, tea and sugar, amounting to £800,000 this year, making with the past year £1,200,000.

In conclusion Mr Lloyd George said that the trade conditions of the world were exceptionally healthy. The future at home depended upon the readiness of capital to share its luck with labour, and to the moderation of labour in pressing its demands. On the whole there was nothing on the horizon to mar the prospects of a bountiful year. He feared that the prospects of reduction in naval expenditure were not very bright, and we should have reason to rejoice if we escaped a substantial increase this year and a still larger increase next year.

Mr Austen Chamberlain said he failed to see any justification for reserving the surplus to meet naval contingencies. Six millions was altogether beyond anything that would be required this year on the basis laid down by Mr Churchill, thus diverting money from the Sinking Fund. Government seemed utterly regardless of the credit of the country and the effects would be deplorable. He begged Mr. Lloyd George to reconsider the proposal, which he would certainly resist.

The Times states that Government set aside the surplus with the express intention of using it for an increase of ship-building, if the German naval programme were increased. This was not clearly realised after Mr Lloyd George's statement, but Mr. Masterman, winding up the debate, gave an assurance that the money would not be used except for the Navy without the express sanction of the House of Commons.

Morocco

REUTER WIRE from Paris on the 31st March :—A message to the Matin from Fez states that a treaty establishing a French Protectorate over Morocco was signed by the Sultan yesterday.

China.

REUTER WIRE from Peking on March 30 :—A Cabinet has been formed. It includes the following :—Premier and acting Minister of Communications, Tangshaoyi. Minister for Foreign Affairs, Luchenghsiang, hitherto Minister in St. Petersburg. Minister of the Interior, Chaopengchun. Minister of Finance, Hsiunghailing. Minister of War, General Tuanchijui.

The Cabinet is considered decidedly progressive but not particularly strong. It will be more popular in the South than in the North, but it is probably the best available owing to the refusal of the ablest men in the Empire to participate. The Chinese papers criticise the Cabinet severely on the ground that several Ministers are inexperienced politically and unable to inspire confidence in the people.

REUTER wires from Peking on the 31st March - A message from Hankow states that the Russo-Asiatic Bank has handed to the Wuchang Government one million and half taels on behalf of the Belgian Syndicate whose Peking representative states that China has been credited with five and half millions. The opposition to Tang-shanyi, the Premier, is growing in North China owing to the belief that the Belgian loan is principally a Russian enterprise, and that Russia's non-entry into the International Group discloses a desire on the part of that country to be unhampered by the discussions with the other Powers.

Reuter wires from Tokio on the 3rd - The comments of the newspapers here on the Chinese Republican Ministry are most unfavourable. They say the members of the Ministry are for the most part inefficient bureaucrats and that the régime is not likely to be a permanent one.

Soudan.

REUTER wires on the 2nd April that a small punitive expedition under Major Leveson yesterday engaged a large force of Anuak raiders in thick bush near Odongo. The Anuaks fled after suffering heavy losses and abandoned their villages. Their positions were destroyed. Captain Lichtenberg and Captain Kinahan, three Egyptian officers and 42 Sudanese soldiers, were killed and one Egyptian officer and 12 men were wounded.

The following letter, recently received by The Standard, explains the object of the expedition and gives details of the force and helps one to understand the rather severe casualties -

S S Zafir, White Nile,

February 14th, 1912

We are on our way up to Taufik and the Sobat for an expedition against the savages known as the Anuaks, who live 150 miles north-west of Lake Rudolph. They are a most aggressive tribe, living in villages protected by a triple stockade.

They are nearly all armed with modern (French) Rifles, smuggled through Abyssinia. We are expecting a very lively time in consequence. Our force consists of Major C. H. Leveson of the 18th Hussars, 12 British Officers and 100 men - two companies of mounted infantry, four companies of infantry and two 75 millimetre guns.

The savages have been raiding our country towards the White Nile. We go along the south bank of the Sobat up to its junction with the Pibor, then south up the west bank of the Pibor to its junction with the R. Akobo. Here we cross, keeping along the Akobo and hunt for a village called Odongo.

There are no maps, and no white man has ever seen this particular part of the country, although dear "Monty" Wellby skirted it on his way to the Sobat from Lake Rudolph. The rains may make the country difficult, if not impassable. If the enemy are sufficiently cowed, I hear we may push on to the Boma plateau, 150 miles further.

We may be away about two and a half months, but if we push on to the plateau it will be nearer four. We are all in fine form and meet our latest "friends" - the Anuaks.

Hindu University.

THE Hon. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya returned to Calcutta on Monday morning from Darbhanga and is busy pushing forward the collection of subscriptions promised for the Hindu University. In addition to two lakhs remitted by the Maharaja Bahadur of Darbhanga Rs. 29,000 have been received out of other subscriptions promised at Darbhanga. H.H. the Aga Khan and Mr. Justice Hassan Imam have also remitted their subscriptions, Rs. 5,000 each, to the Hindu University Fund.

Hindu Educational Conference.

MR. HARKISHEN LAI, on behalf of the proposed Hindu Educational Conference, interviewed the Hon. Mr. Goddley, Director of Public Instruction, to enquire if he had any objection to members and officers of the Education Department joining the Conference. Mr. Goddley said he had no objection and promised himself to attend.

TETE À TETE

WE THINK we may be allowed to presume that we have read the history of the growth of British Empire, its constitution, the mutual obligations of the parts that compose it and the principles on which its foreign policy has been from time to time based.

The average newspaper reader in India can discuss the true inwardness of British Foreign policy to-day with a degree of knowledge and ability that would surprise the Anglo-Indian journalist who formed his notions about the educated Indians in his editorial sanctum a decade ago. It has hitherto been an article of his creed to absolutely ignore Indian opinion while discussing the probable developments of the foreign relations of the Empire. The Indian opinion did not weigh with him an atom perhaps because it was weak, less self-confident and less insistent. Perhaps because he purposely brushed it aside as of no account at all. Times have, however, changed and India is rapidly growing conscious of her place and importance in the governance of the Empire. But the practice of ignoring Indian opinion in shaping the Foreign policy of the Empire still continues, at any rate amongst a section of the Anglo-Indian and the British Press. Nothing can be more short-sighted than this, in fact it betrays a strange ignorance of the conditions that should govern the affairs of a vast and complex Empire if the abiding attachment and devotion of all its parts is to be evoked. Yet it is exactly this that is forgotten when an imperially minded journalist, in a fit of self-complacency, holds forth on the responsibilities of His Majesty's Indian subjects without allowing them even the right of respectfully submitting their views on Imperial questions. We know what has been the attitude of papers like the Times and the Pioneer towards His Majesty's 70 million Moslem subjects in India, whose feelings have been deeply stirred by the sufferings and calamities of their brethren abroad. We have, however, seen with a considerable shock of surprise that even papers usually so sound and balanced as the Times of India can be betrayed into such an attitude. Reviewing His Excellency the Viceroy's recent utterance on the Foreign situation, it says in its issue of the 27th March. - "There are, we believe, certain Moslems who think that Great Britain should have intervened by force of arms to prevent the Italian invasion of Tripoli. But when their political judgment matures, they will see that the foreign policy of a worldwide empire cannot be dictated by regard to the sentiments of a section of its people." We do not profess to know our contemporary's standard of "political judgment," but we are certain the Mussalmans never made a demand so absurd as our contemporary appears to believe. They simply asked the responsible advisers of their Sovereign to exert their influence in enforcing respect for international treaties and obligations which the British Empire itself is pledged to maintain. The sentiments of a section of its people may not be the sole guide in determining the foreign policy of an empire, but they ought to be one of the factors that decide its final direction. The Times' Bombay correspondent who is, we believe, on the staff of the Times of India, in the course of his telegraphic message of the 5th March said that "it is not exaggerating to say that Indian Moslem feeling as a result of these three events (the modification of the partition, the war in Tripoli and the affairs in Persia) is growing somewhat unreasonable." Perhaps the only way of attaining sweet reasonableness for the Indian Moslems is to commission the foreign correspondents of the Times to do their thinking for them. Is this the principle on which the great Empire is to be run? Even a section of the Indian opinion, which not very long ago was regarded as dangerous to the verge of sedition has received deference, out of all proportion to its deserts. Our quarrel, however, is with the attitude that wants to treat Indian opinion as a negligible quantity and claims British public opinion to be the exclusive guide of Imperial policy. There is no wonder if such an attitude is resented in India. The views of the self-governing colonies receive much more deference because they can exact it. Their sentiments are very carefully respected and carry great weight in the counsels of the Empire. The Indians or, for the matter of that, Indian Moslems expect nothing more than that their views and sentiments may be similarly considered. India wants not a differential but an equitable treatment, commensurate with the contribution that it makes towards the wealth, power and prestige of the Empire.

It appears that the District Magistrate of Lahore still insists on the deposit of a security from the Editor of the Zamindar, and we do not know if any attempt has yet been made to prove that the section under which the security is demanded applies to the case of the Zamindar, and that the District Magistrate has jurisdiction. Nor does he seem to have pointed out to the editor what articles, or portions of articles he considered to be objectionable and immoderate in tone. But he has the whiphand in the matter, for there is no appeal unless the security is confiscated. We understand that the Hon. Mr. Basu wished to have the law amended in this particular last year, but did not do so in deference to the disinclination for such an amendment in higher quarters. We do not know if now, that the Partition is annulled, he would feel more inclined to resist official persuasion, but we trust his patriotism is not so limited in its scope. An amendment of this nature is most necessary, for without entering into the exercise of the Magistrate's discretion in demanding security, there is much still in his application of the law which may be entirely at variance with the intention of the Legislature. In the present case, Mr. Zafar Ali Khan has asked his publisher to deposit the security demanded. We do not think he has any reason to fear, for we have no doubt that should the Magistrate go further and confiscate the security, an opportunity would be given to our contemporary to prove that he is a free-born British subject and not a Russian serf or the bondsman of King Victor Emmanuel. It is true that the Punjab Chief Court has not established that reputation for independence, so far as the executive is concerned, to which H. E. Lord Carmichael referred in his first speech in Bengal, but even there an opportunity exists of giving a deuced uncomfortable hour or two to stiff-necked and law-despising magistrates and exposing before the whole country what precious knowledge of vernaculars they have acquired in their intercourse with sycophants and ayahs. And, in our estimation, two thousand rupees are nothing compared to the exhilaration born of such a cross-examination. We dare say "The Hon. Mr. Gup" would find the "copy" thus acquired worth a treasure. As a profitable investment on his behalf we have sent our mite to our contemporary the Zamindar, believing, in the first place, that our hundred-rupee note is safe so long as the District Magistrate of Lahore is a sensible man, and, in the next place, that it is a very poor price for the satisfaction of having him pilloried in the witness-box, if he leaves a P. P. C. on his senses and confiscates the Zamindar's security.

It is hopeful to learn that the subject of muralis or minor girls dedicated to temples, who generally, if not universally, lead immoral lives, is engaging the attention of Government. Here is a case that satisfies one of the two tests of the Hon. Sir Reginald Cradock, namely, contravention of the fundamental principles of humanity. No doubt some persons would be forthcoming who would raise the cry of "Religion in danger." But when a universal practice like muralis could be put down nearly a century ago without the concurrence of a large number of the people themselves, surely the almost equally inhuman system of muralis can be put down to-day with the active support of the educated classes.

This scheme for establishing a well-equipped school at Delhi for the education of Indian women, which Her Highness the Begum of Bhopal has formulated, in order to commemorate the Queen-Empress's visit to India, has been conceived in a generous spirit and breathes the characteristic love and solicitude of Her Highness for the up-lifting of Indian womanhood. The Aligarh movement for Moslem female education, which is as yet in a nebulous stage, owes what little it has achieved in practical results mainly to the patronage of this talented Princess. The rapid growth of schools in Bhopal for the training of girls is solely due to her initiative in a matter on which more than on anything else depends the thorough awakening and regeneration of the people. None can, therefore, question Her Highness's fitness to take the lead and stand sponsor to a project of wide scope and far-reaching consequences. Her Highness's idea is to collect twelve lakhs of rupees to establish a well-equipped school which in the course of time will become a model institution of its kind." Out of the proposed funds four lakhs will be spent in building and the remaining eight lakhs will be set apart as permanent endowment. As a proof of her own earnestness and zeal Her Highness has promised to contribute "a lakh of rupees from the State and Rs. 20,000 from my private purse. My daughters-in-law have also expressed practical sympathy with my scheme, the eldest and the second contributing Rs. 7,000 each and the third Rs. 5,000." We have nothing but admiration for this unstinted liberality towards a cause which has secured but a few whole-hearted and enthusiastic converts even amongst men of loudly progressive ideas. It would be too late in the day to set about in earnest to preach the necessity for organised efforts for the promotion of female education. The ultimate efficiency of a society depends upon the sort of intelligence its women bring to bear on the conduct of its manifold and complex affairs. We, however, hope we will not be misunderstood if we cannot wholly approve of the method which Her Highness recommends for the attainment of the objects she has in view. We have discussed more than once the best possible way in which the education of the Indian and more particularly the Moslem girls can be organised without doing violence to deep-seated social instincts and traditions or irretrievably exposing the whole movement to odium and disaster. After a very careful consideration of the circumstances with which we have to deal in this country, we cannot help thinking that the public school system of education is the least suited to the conditions of the Indian social environment. What is really wanted are efficient normal schools for the training of ustanis who would undertake teaching work locally and under the direct supervision of parents and guardians. If Her Highness were to try to found a well-equipped school for training efficient women teachers, she would be doing much more useful work on lines free from all risks and most readily conducive to the fruition of her laudable aims and aspirations.

Provincial public life, we need hardly say, is not yet efficiently organised in any part of the country. Signs of public activities in various directions are to be found in abundance, but these activities are spasmodic, haphazard, and short-lived and lack the sustained inspiration of some great, over-mastering purpose. The reasons for this sad state of affairs are not far to seek. Provincial communities have not yet been welded into common civic life under the stress of common ideals. There are hopeless social divisions and differences of motive, of standpoint, of social outlook, along which a bewildering variety of beliefs and practices have dug deep lines of cleavage. Education and present-day environment have evoked unifying tendencies which may eventually lead to the development of organised efforts for common political existence. As things are, the lack of organised will and purpose in provincial public life is daily made manifest in all important public concerns, and nowhere more so than in the go-ahead and sturdy Punjab. Only a short time ago, the Chief Court of the Province had issued a fiat fixing the number of the new pleaders to be yearly enrolled for practice within the jurisdiction of the Court. It was an arbitrary interference with the law of supply and demand. But even if the law had grown out-fashioned and the Highest Tribunal of Justice in the Punjab had felt itself called upon to correct the errors of natural processes, it ought to have hesitated before venturing to restrict the liberty of choice of profession which is supposed to be the birthright of every citizen of the British Empire. We do not know if artificial shifts like this can cure the evils for which they are ostensibly designed. What they would most certainly achieve is to discourage the study of the most useful, inspiring, and practical body of knowledge that human ingenuity has devised for the diverse purposes of human society. The practical results of the ukase in the Punjab would be to shut out some of the most gifted men from the legal profession simply because they could not happen to get so many marks after they had undergone the ordeals of a most clumsy system of examination. It will also interfere with the communal equilibrium which in view of the racial conditions is so necessary to maintain in the profession. Yet in spite of these glaring hardships that the whim of the Chief Court has imposed on one of the most important outlets for young careers, the public men of the Punjab have not raised a single voice of protest worth mentioning. The provincial papers deplored the action of the Court in funeral tones in which the tragedy of defeat was only too apparent. Not a single public meeting has been held in the Province to consider the bearings of this extraordinary order. It seems as if the Punjab has lost its public spirit and civic sense for taking common action in regard to the measures affecting the welfare of the community. It is perhaps the mutual hostility of creed and race, the unedifying scramble for loaves and fishes that have reduced the public life of the Province to such a nerveless and shattered condition. Will not some of the conventional heroes of the day rise above the petty grind of daily life and touch the will and purpose of the people with the spirit of tolerance, sympathy, and common endeavour?

The Comrade.

The New Order.

THE old order changeth, giving place to new, and although men may not perceive it to-day, when after many years they look back upon the 1st of April 1912, they would recognise it to be the dividing line between two separate and distinct eras. In spite of the wailing and the gnashing of teeth in Calcutta, there is not the least doubt that the rest of India has accepted the change of capital as a measure fraught with great and beneficial possibilities for the country. Whatever their exact their geometrical situation may be to-day, when the confines of India have been politically enlarged and neglected areas have been developed, throughout her long history. Hindustan has been the heart of India and Delhi the heart of Hindustan. We say this in no provincial spirit, for had we done so, outlying provinces such as Western India would not have been so cordial as they have been in their welcome of this great change. A valued correspondent of ours, Nawab Nizam Jung of Hyderabad, wrote an ode on the Imperial Coronation, which, alas, reached us too late to reproduce on that auspicious occasion. We would, however, take this opportunity of quoting the opening stanzas inasmuch as they struck, in the light of subsequent events, a truly prophetic note which illustrates in a remarkable manner that the idea of Delhi as the Seat of Empire had not been removed from men's minds, in spite of the ruin, the vandalism and subsequent neglect of Delhi.

Once more those golden gates unbar!
Once more undo the mould ring chains that bind!
Hark! O'er the Western waves afar,
A joyous strain comes floating on the wind
Queen of the East! no longer mourn
Thy broken sword, thy laurels torn,
Thy sceptre vanished, or the gem
That once adorned thy diadem
Lo! The dark clouds of ages roll away,
And brightly shines the rising day.
And vanished scenes, for which thy heart did yearn,
Start from the faded past, and to thine eyes return
Mark, midst yon City's crumbling piles,
Where the proud sons of Timur once bore sway
The spot hring'ring Glory smiles,
And spectral Grandeur clothed in ruin gray.
There, there upon thine ancient throne
He sits whose heart is all thine own.
Let him a nobler throne obtain—
Ah, let him in thy bosom reign!
For he is one who neither pomp nor power
Much values, nor the glittering shower
Of gold and gems the gorgeous Orient brings
To scatter at the feet of her barbaric kings

That wish has been amply realized and realized too in a manner that none could have dreamt of. These are not the days of conquests, though while we write this we know that land grabbing is going on on a larger and in reality on more barbaric scale than ever before. When we say that these are not the days of conquest, we mean that our own Empire is large enough for us to cry "halt" to the forces of territorial aggrandisement. It yet remains to be consolidated and improved and the real Empire builder to-day would be one who would evolve a new and a firmer bond of unity and concord to bind the lands that already form part of our King's dominions rather than one who would add a few degrees of longitude and latitude to those dominions. Commercial and industrial centres such as Bombay and Karachi rejoice in the change of capital and from Delhi herself the smoke of numerous chimneys rises to proclaim the victories of peace. Learning has made great progress, and the country has now reached that stage when it can calmly take stock of all that it has acquired and all that it has lost in the century and a half of British rule. Very wisely, both the great communities of India have now determined that while the new learning must advance, the ancient lore of the East should not decline and fade away. The great merits of the indigenous culture of the Orient are also being recognised, and a study of origins has taught the people that they must build the new superstructure on the solid foundation of the old, and must not be merely "architects of ruin." The new Universities, the Hindu and the Muslim, would both be within easy reach of India's capital and can prosper under the fostering care of the Imperial Government. The inundation from the West has already fertilized the soil of Eastern India, which had too long been neglected. It is now the turn of the parched but potentially fertile soil of the North to receive the beneficial moisture. And although it is true, as some people fear, that for some time to come the Government would be in a part of India where public opinion is much less articulate, it is also certain that the transfer of the capital would give that opinion not only a living force but also a tongue. We know that this would be beneficial but we also pray that good and honest use may be made of the new power and the newly found voice. It will indeed be a sad day if the North acquires the power of the giant and also uses it as a giant.

While on this subject we may express the hope that, as expected by H.H. the Aga Khan, the comparatively depressed Moslem community would take the fullest advantage of the transfer of the capital. Although the authors of the change rightly refer to the Hindu as well as the Moslem historical associations of Delhi, it could not but be that the people who last ruled at Delhi and were masters in the land for eight centuries before the British took over the Government should have the fresher memory of the two. In the midst of things that would constantly remind them of the past, it is possible for Mussalmans to dream of it and sulk as they did half a century ago. But that way lies ruin, and we hope the lesson that Syed Ahmed Khan, himself an ornament of latter-day Delhi that redeemed its fame, has been too well taught for the community to forget it. If, however, the past shows to them unmistakably what they had done before and given strength and faith, what they could do again, then their future is assured. The Empire of Delhi would no doubt not be theirs as it used to be in the days gone by. But new conceptions of Sovereignty and Nationalism hold sway to-day, and if they worked hand in hand with other communities, and if the Government chose to forget that it was an alien Government, the Empire of Delhi would yet be theirs as it never was in the days of Akbar or Aurangzeb. We earnestly appeal to them to scan the firmament and the charts and shape the course of their bark accordingly. Without abating a jot of their fraternal fervour for their brethren abroad who are bound to them not by common blood or continuity of life, but by the far more rational bond of a common spirituality and culture and common institutions that go to the making of civilization, they can yet work together with their neighbours in the thousand and one concerns of every-day life. A religion that insists on the rights of neighbours so emphatically as theirs cannot teach them to keep aloof from a majority in this country, even though its ideas are not their ideas and its gods not their gods. We have no false notions about Nationalism, and when we see its baneful results in the unredeemed rivalries of Europe, we have no occasion to regard it as the last word in human progress or even as the harbinger of a new heaven and a new earth. But we have a firm belief that modern Nationalism has in its elements of great utility for us in our present divided state. We think it possible to evolve out of the jealousies of to-day a political entity on federal lines, a unique constitution, because, in accordance with our unique situation, it would be a federation of faiths.

For such a federation to come into being, it is necessary to have the guidance of Great Britain, and we firmly believe that in spite of much that is still unreformed in the British Administration, it is for us the best Government at present, and its existence is providential. We say this in no canting spirit, but in the full belief that if a watchful Providence controls the destinies of mankind and it wishes us well at present, the Government that has supplied the materials, and in many cases even the motive power of progress, is one that must be ordained by Providence for the good of us all. But if its being different from us in our fallen state was essential for our progress, its insistence on that difference to day and spasmodic and irrational efforts to perpetuate it are now the surest means of its own decay. While moulding us more and more to its own shape it should also lose its insularity and exclusiveness, for that way lie danger and death.

And lastly, we would appeal in all sincerity to those that form the bulk of India's population, that have on their side superior numbers, greater learning and more wealth, to pause and consider whether much of what they wish to obtain cannot be secured by greater magnanimity towards the claims of the Moslem minority, and more toleration of its suspicions and even its prejudices than by the ruinous rivalry of to-day. A proud people seldom submit to force unless it is clearly beaten. That, in their competition with the Hindus, the Mussalmans are not. The most that anyone can expect in this conflict is a stalemate, but have the possibilities of peace been altogether exhausted? There are other and stronger prejudices to be fought against and subdued than those of each other, and that cannot be done unless the forces of patriotism are combined. We appeal to all for greater sanity and more toleration, and above all we appeal for a complete dissociation of all the great communities of India from the bane of present-day politics, insincere sentiments and cant. Open foes can come to be friends, but insincere friendship can lead to nothing but disunion and disaster.

While the foregoing considerations apply everywhere, they do so with greater force in Bengal. Here not one but two changes have occurred, and in addition to the change of capital, which affects Bengal more directly than any other part of India except the North, we have here a territorial re-adjustment also which has acquired adventitious seriousness from the eventful history of the last six years. We do not care to go over a troublesome past and no purpose can now be served by raking up the decaying refuse. We must face the future resolutely and, if possible, cheerfully. For after all it is that which matters. The chief reason—though we fear it is only the ostensible reason--assigned for the change of capital is that the Government of India look forward to giving the provinces of India administrative autonomy. Bengal, one of the oldest provinces of British India, has already received an earnest of such autonomy in the appointment of its first Governor, and considering that it is the second improvement in its status, the first having been the creation of Council Government, Bengal has no reason to be dissatisfied. With the Viceroy and his Councilors living in Calcutta even for four months in the year, Bengal problems had a tendency to become All-India problems, and the Partition of 1905 which did not concern any other Province except Bihar, Assam, Orissa and Chota Nagpur, exercised Indian politicians considerably. But now that the seat of Empire is removed to the North, and Bengal's provincial status has been improved, its repartition in 1912 is not likely to be a subject of the same universal interest. Its people have therefore to settle down to a solution of their difficulties unaided by the support and undisturbed by the officious interference of men of other provinces. The question, then, arises, in what spirit are they to seek a solution of the Provincial Problem?

In one respect Bengal is fortunate. It has no linguistic difficulties to solve such as make polyglot Madras a hopeless puzzle and keep Gujrat, Sindh and the Deccan separate entities in Western India with little cohesion. In the Punjab the difference between the literary vernacular and the patna of daily intercourse has given to the separatists a chance of creating mischief, while in the United Provinces the main issue in politics is still whether efforts are being made to create another language by excluding even familiar words of Arabic and Persian origin and substituting for them unfamiliar Sanscrit words. In Bengal no such difficulty has yet arisen, but we fear that if the jealousies of Hindus and Mussalmans continue the same issue that separates Hindus from Mussalmans in the United Provinces will be raised in Bengal. Nobody grudges to the Hindu in the United Provinces the Hindu inspiration of his religious literature, with essentially Hindu imagery and a good deal of Sanscrit vocabulary. What the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal require is that where they preponderate school books should not be written in a manner forcing such inspiration, such imagery and such a vocabulary on them to the neglect of the essentially Moslem inspiration, Persian and Arabian imagery, and the vocabulary that is derived from these sources. The ground, they concede, must remain Bengali, but the pattern must be more in consonance with their traditions and their requirements. This is the main idea at the bottom of the differences about text books in Bengal, and though we claim no direct knowledge of the subject, we trust and believe we have not erred in stating the case generally. But while we are on this subject we may mention that throughout Bengal the complaint is that no provision is made for teaching Persian and Arabic in Schools and Colleges, and in this way Mussalmán students are being weaned off from the sources of their peculiar culture which they cannot wholly sacrifice even to nationalism. This is done even in institutions which are partly aided from the Mohsin Fund and the case of the College in the Khulna District is one which would furnish the new Presidency Government an excellent opportunity of inquiring into this matter.

But while on the one hand there is such a neglect of Moslem requirements we find on the other that several Madrasas are maintained from State revenues which teach their Moslem alumni nothing but the ancient lore of Persia and Arabia, and that, too, is done in such an indifferent way that the students seldom acquire a reputation even among the Ulama of their own faith. Most of those who have received instruction in these institutions, far from raising the intellectual level of the community or enlarging its political prestige or productive power, swell the ranks of mendicancy, open or disguised, and even help to breed discord and inharmoniousness. It is this remarkable divorce of the new learning from the old and the separation of the old from the new that has been responsible for the particular backwardness of the Mussalmans of Bengal and the new Government will have to make a searching inquiry into this matter, depending for the discovery of truth less on the old leaders that have done nothing to cure the evil and more on the masses of young graduates who have either been the victims of this system or at least know those who have fallen a prey to it and have no selfish reasons to disguise the facts.

The situation in the new Bengal to-day is this, that while the Mussalmans are in a majority, they possess no other advantage besides the doubtful benefit of a small but distracted and ragged majority. On the other hand, there is a very considerable minority which has every advantage and has left the majority far behind it in the race of life. Too careful a regard for its own advancement in the past made it callous at first to the condition of the minority and subsequently to its interests and rights. In spite of all the fine talk of fraternal feeling and identity of interests, the fact remains that, unique among all provinces and communities, it is the Hindu minority of Bengal that has monopolised throughout the country and even abroad the cognomen of Bengali which should have been applicable to the Hindus and the Moslems of Bengal alike. During the 150 years of British rule in Bengal, the Hindus, having no inconvenient prejudices to hamper them have changed their community beyond recognition. On the other hand, the pride and the prejudices of the Mussalmans kept them aloof from the progress that was going on around them and wrought their complete ruin. While one competitor in the race of life reached the winning post, the other has hardly yet left the pillar.

Now human nature being what it is, and cast and creed dividing India so greatly, it was not to be conceived that any mercy would be shown to the Mussalmans. They suffered every inconvenience and injustice that the poor and ignorant are bound to suffer everywhere, and the peculiar constitution of the Government and the political traditions of Englishmen made it difficult for them to do the Mussalmans bare justice. It was such a state of affairs which the Partition of 1905 incidentally affected powerfully. As we have said before, we shall not enter into what happened during the last six years. But there is no reason to withhold the fact that the outlook for the Mussalmans in Eastern Bengal became more hopeful, and although far too little was done to correct the communal balance in the administration, the educational facilities provided for the hitherto neglected area incidentally benefited the Mussalmans greatly. The partition is, however, now annulled, and unless other steps are taken to maintain its incidental educational benefits to Mussalmans, the result would be to throw back the community to its pre-partition condition and in view of the embittered feelings due to the partition quarrels, the second state of the Mussalmans would be worse than the first.

When the partition was modified, the Mussalmans could have as one of two alternatives refused to regard the new partition as a settled fact, and agitated for its revocation. In view of their poverty and want of education, and still more in view of their ignorance of the arts of agitation, both constitutional and otherwise, we must confess they could never have hoped to win. But they could still have made peace impossible and good government itself a no easy matter. Many of the officials, too, would have recognised some justice at least in their claims and could not have treated their agitation as wholly irrational and unjustified. But, although the state of Moslem feeling in India was, for obvious reasons, far from normal, the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal bore this blow with praiseworthy patience and self-restraint. Their leader, the Hon. Nawab Bahadur of Dacca and his energetic lieutenant, the Hon. Nawab Syed Nawab Ali Chowdhry as well as other prominent Mussalmans threw in the full weight of their influence on the side of a loyal acceptance of the change, without prejudice to their right of seeking the assistance of Government in the development of Eastern Bengal administratively, politically and educationally.

When H. E. Lord Carmichael—who has already created a most hopeful impression on the minds of all with his simplicity, frankness and desire to get at the truth from all sides—landed in Bengal the various communities that greeted him stood in the following position. There were the Hindus, regretful that the Viceroy should bade them a final good bye, yet hopeful of autonomy under a new Government and full of triumphant courage as a heritage of the success of their agitation. There were the Mussalmans, to whom the transfer of the capital meant little but to whom the future, on account of the repartition appeared dubious and the past discouraging, who knew not whether to hope more or fear more from the Government, and who stood in a still greater suspense as to the attitude which the victorious would adopt towards them. Then there were the non-official Europeans who had indeed lost the predominance of their claim on the Supreme Government's interest in the commercial and industrial welfare of Calcutta and were chagrined at the withdrawal of the Government of India from the zone of their political influence, but who had little fear about their commercial and industrial progress, and still looked hopefully forward to the exercise of considerable political influence on the new Government. Finally, there were the European officials at least partly hurt at the annulment of the Partition and somewhat doubtful about the attitude of the new Governor towards them.

His Excellency Lord Carmichael has already told the last of these that he hopes to get to know all of them and to learn what they are doing and thinking and to win their confidence. But with commendable candour he has also told them that it may be—and he thought it was perhaps inevitable—he who has grown up amid very different influences, at times will act as they would not wish him to act, but he was obviously sincere when he said that if it was so, it would not be for any ill-will towards them and that he would at all times be ready to consider any concessions to which experience leads them. After all, it comes to this, that they must supply the long though naturally somewhat narrow experience, and he is corrective, a fresh mind open to accept that experience, or reject it as the result of unconscious prejudices or inapplicable to a new set of circumstances. We would earnestly repeat the advice of Sir Edward Baker to the Civil Service to give the new arrangement their loyal support and we trust there will be no efforts to "capture" the new Governor. We may add we do not think he is easy to "capture" and if "Captured" at all may prove a benevolent but shrewd and tenacious Tartar.

As for the non-official European community, what greater assurance could be given it than the simple assertion that if anything, a British Governor was likely to be prejudiced in favour of the British commercial interests. But such an assertion need frighten nobody, for His Excellency has pledged himself to regard British and Indian interests as identical and, if this is properly interpreted, there is the prospect of greater assimilation of these interests in the next five years.

But when all is said and done, the main factor of the situation is the Hindu-Moslem question. We are glad that His Excellency recognises that it is the very virtues of Mussalmans that have most seriously handicapped them, and this admission leads us to hope that in dealing with Moslem claims Lord Carmichael would not punish the Mussalmans for their virtues. As regards the Hindus, they have every reason to be satisfied with his assurance that he is not going to rule in the interests of any one creed or community but of all and would do his best to unify various interests rather than increase the separation. But, while we are confident, that His Excellency has all the shrewdness of his native land and adds to it the "directness" of his Colonial experience, we hope he will not accept beautiful sentiments for facts, for Bengal is a land of emotions which deceive the people of Bengal no less than others. We trust that when "identity of interests" is being discussed, due regard would be paid to the immediate and narrower interests which are nowhere so hopelessly conflicting as in Bengal, and that when he is asked to listen to the "voice of the people," he would first inquire what the term "people" signifies. It will be impertinence to endeavour to "coach up" His Excellency and we have no desire to do so. But there are certain dangerous pitfalls and it is not easy for a newcomer to escape them. In view of the very large questions that have to be decided almost immediately, we risk even an unintentional impertinence which is, we believe, a much lesser offence than neglect of duty.

To the Hindus of Bengal we would say in all sincerity, "You have so much that the Mussalmans lack. You have so many things to secure for Bengal that need the assistance of every community and all classes. Is it so unpollitic to be magnanimous, so impossible to be altruistic?" To the Mussalmans we would say, "Let bygones be bygones. Wipe off the old scores from the slate and write up an altogether new account. Trust that you may be trusted. Believe that you may be believed." A new era has dawned to-day. Is it to be better than the old or worse? That rests mainly with the people themselves, but partly also with the new Governor and his official advisers. Justice first and popularity afterwards, the interests of India before the interests of caste or creed, service or clique. These are the obvious considerations, yet which is the more likely to be neglected in party strife, the obvious or the obscure? We are hopeful of the future, but duty demands that all must be vigilant. So much is at stake that the most hopeful have need of the greatest vigilance.

The Compulsory Education Debate.

III

SOME objections were urged against the Bill which were intended to prove that it was not only the people that were unripe for compulsion, but that the Department of Public Instruction was itself unready for the change which would flood the existing schools and necessitate the establishment of others. It was contended that a compulsory extension of the present system of primary instruction was most undesirable because the system was most inefficient and the instruction imparted worse than useless, that the greatest need of the hour was not so much an increase in the number of schools as an increased number of trained teachers, a better curriculum and better school houses. Sir Harcourt Butler quoted the words of the Malabar District Board, suggesting 'the improvement of existing schools, their masters, their appliances and their buildings,' as "wise and weighty words of responsible men." It is a pleasure to know from such an authoritative source that the members of the Malabar District Board at any rate had not the saturnal qualifications of Tooley Street, and we can leave the Hon. Mr. Dadabhai to wrangle with his official colleagues about the true inwardness and the spontaneity of these wise and weighty words. But Sir Harcourt said nothing to show where the wisdom or the weight of these words lay. Perhaps he left this portion of the argument to the Hon. Mr. Sharpe to deal with "from a purely professional point of view." Yet we do not know if the Council received much enlightenment from that able and industrious official either. We want, according to him, some 7,500 trained teachers every year to supply a wastage of 5 per cent in the ranks of 150,000 teachers which we have or should have. The verandahs of the village houses had such a unique configuration in his experience, that only about four or five boys were in a position to derive benefit from the instructions of the teacher. The Hon. Mr. Basu had suggested the bamboo and grass buildings of Bengal; but Mr. Sharpe objected to the rain and sunshine coming in through the roof and walls as unwelcome trespassers, found even these to cost at least Rs. 500 or 600, and that without the friendly intervention of the P. W. D., and finally declared them to be unfit for the less genial climate of other parts of India, such, for instance, as the North-West. He concluded that "four years' instruction sans inspection, sans teachers, sans houses, sans equipment and sans everything would . . . be money thrown away." It will not give us, he thought, the kind of education that will brighten homes or sweeten labour, and with a becoming apology he quoted the cynicism of Lord Sherbrooke, "If the new system is costly, it shall at least be efficient; if it is inefficient, it shall be cheap." The ryot was, according to Mr. Sharpe, no fool, and he was praised for the wisdom of not foregoing "his son's help in the fields for education in a school which he feels will do his son no good."

Now, in reply to all this we have to ask a few questions. If the present system is inefficient and no less costly than what Mr. Gokhale proposes to establish, why permit it to continue? Does not Lord Sherbrooke's cynicism supply sufficient wisdom for the Education Department? And what of the ryot, who, we are glad to hear, is no fool? Is he any wiser in foregoing voluntarily at present the extremely productive labour of his son and helpmate, for that dear but nasty education which Mr. Sharpe has been supplying to him, than he would be to forego it for the useless lore that Mr. Gokhale would force upon him? After all, Mr. Gokhale would only extend what Mr. Sharpe keeps limited. Are we then to believe that the expenditure on primary education at present is only a peace offering to inefficiency, a sacrifice designed to propitiate the greedy Molochs who are admitted to have kindled enthusiasm for the education of the masses?

All that Mr. Sharpe and those who think with him can say is that it is better to call a "Halt" to education of the masses on the present lines and to spend any money that we can now secure for education for the improvement of teachers, and inspection, building and equipment. In other words, education must now be intensive rather than extensive. We shall not pretend to ignore the reasonableness of this argument in many cases, but we have to see if it can apply to all cases, and if not whether it is applicable to India in its present condition. In economics, we are familiar with the ideas of diminishing and increasing returns, and we know that in agriculture at least it is the law of diminishing returns that holds good. Nature's gifts are spread on the whole fairly evenly and over a large area, and he would be a poor cultivator indeed who would begin to apply to virgin soil the methods of cultivation practised in countries where land is limited and has been exhausted by constant and long continued cultivation. To our mind, mass education in India is like the cultivation of virgin soil. For many years to come it would produce better results on the whole merely to scratch the surface, scatter the seeds broadcast and trust to the showers of heaven than to use the deep-dwelling plough worked by electricity, make elaborate ridges and drain and irrigate on the latest scientific model. Where 94 per cent of people cannot distinguish "A" from "B", it is a little premature to talk of trained teachers, scientific curricula and the School Beautiful.

It will be conceded by Mr. Sharpe that we have far to go before we can pull up level with England. Yet what is the condition there? Every care is taken to insure that teachers are recruited from those who are physically sound. A medical examination takes place when a candidate is admitted into the ranks of pupil-teachers. During each of the four years of this experience, the recruit is re-examined. Finally, when being admitted into the training college for a two or three years' course, the pupil-teacher undergoes another and severer test. Yet such are the insanitary conditions of schools that there are numerous breakdowns, and Mr. C. Howard Turner has recently published a list of specimen cases relieved during 1910 by the National Union of Teachers which show how frequently and how early in their careers teachers succumb to that disease—consumption. Sir James Vexall, M.P., the Honorary Secretary of the Union, states that "the unhealthiness of the profession is due in part to bad ventilation and imperfect warming of the schools."

Mr. Turner mentions the following facts which are a match for the shower and shine of Mr. Sharpe and should give him some consolation—

Only a week or two ago the matter was raised at a meeting of the London County Council, when a member moved the adjournment of the Council to consider the question of the heating in the Commercial Street School, Whitechapel. On a recent occasion the temperature of one of the school-rooms was actually at freezing point! In the babies' room it varied between 40° and 44° for a whole week, while in other rooms it was as low as 40° and 41° all through the cold snap. The member added the significant remark that several teachers at this school were away with colds. Who can say how many of these colds may prove the foundation of serious trouble? In another school the children complained so bitterly that for several days the parents refused to send them to school, while in still another it was found impossible to get the children to attend to their lessons on account of the thermometer being in the neighbourhood of freezing, so they were kept at physical exercises all day.

It also appears that in many cases the classes are too large and the class-rooms are overcrowded. The Educational Committee of the London County Council is considering a scheme for limiting the number of scholars in one class to 40 in the case of senior departments, and 48 in the infants' departments. Even this is bad enough and we do not know whether our "experts" would tolerate such congestion. In order to carry this scheme out an outlay of 4½ million sterling for buildings alone is needed for the schools of London alone which are within the purview of the L. C. C. But the Committee proposes to extend the execution of the scheme over a period of 15 years, "so that it is evidently in no hurry," as Mr. Turner remarks, "to remedy the shocking state of affairs at present in existence." Here then is a case in which it is evidently not inconsistent with the dignity of the Capital of the British Empire to have badly ventilated, ill-warmed and overcrowded class-rooms, and the Education Committee of the London County Council, lacking the fastidiousness of Mr. Sharpe, considers it better to persevere in compulsion, although it would have to tolerate some of these evil conditions for at least 15 years to come.

When we turn to the question of remuneration, we find that in England—where the teacher is much better paid than certainly in Wales, and perhaps better than anywhere else also in the United Kingdom—12,348 male head teachers get an average annual salary of £173 11s. 2d., while 16,593 women head teachers get an average of £120 17s. 7d. The 16,924 male assistant teachers get an average of £124 7s. 3d., and the 42,957 women assistants, £90 3s. 8d. annually. But these are trained and "certificated" teachers, and number about 89,000. However, as Sir Harcourt Butler and his supporters from the Central Provinces informed the Council, there are altogether some 111,000 female and 35,000 male teachers, or 146,000 in all. That still leaves some 57,000 teachers, who appear to be untrained and uncertificated. These get an annual average salary of £89 15s. 7d. in the case of men and £66 14s. 8d. in the case of women. As these are most likely to be in the main female teachers, we would be justified in concluding that on an average trained teachers and head teachers (the two sexes taken together) receive a salary of £110 a year, while untrained teachers get £70 a year. This, in India, sounds very much like paradise for all but the Europeans, but what is it in England? We may get some idea of it from the fact that coal miners are demanding a minimum wage of 5s a day, which comes to about £80 a year. It comes to this then, that the average salary of about 40 per cent of the teachers of England who are untrained is substantially less than the proposed minimum wage of a miner. Sir James Yoxall is not, therefore, far wrong in concluding that "the whole thing is run upon a basis of cheapness and to find a teacher reasonably satisfied with his lot is rare." Comparing these facts with the wail of Mr. Sharpe, we find that even in England, the school buildings are unsuitable and insanitary, that teachers are underpaid and overworked, that even after 40 years of compulsion 40 per cent of them are untrained.

As regards inspection, it is worth while quoting Sir James Yoxall's opinion. He writes—"Teachers, however, have little freedom in their professions. They are over-managed, over-inspected and over-interfered with in their daily work. It is no wonder that the supply of teachers is falling off." Whether in the Army, or the Civil Service, in Police or Education, our administration in India is ridiculously top-heavy, and with caste feeling so acute among the Brahmins of the official hierarchy, the result is that the vanguard is almost wholly cut-off from the main army of workers, and even less in touch with the enemy of good government. No wonder that when a proposal is put forward to teach the rudiments of knowledge to the masses and make them literate, Mr. Sharpe revolves in his mind the army of European Inspectors that he would have to import from England, raw graduates from the British Universities destined to commence their service in a poor land on salaries that are denied to German savants and not much below those of a Regius Professor at Oxford. But Mr. Gokhale has no desire to follow the lines of police reform in India where a corrupt constabulary with small income and great temptations and opportunities is to be improved by a rise in the number and salaries of higher European officials in the Department.

We are told that the teaching in schools such as Mr. Gokhale proposes would be useless, but it is worth while hearing what those who have examined the facts about education in England say of the results of Board School education. Only recently such a person published an analysis of the knowledge of a number of soldiers in a regiment who had all come out of the Board School grunting mules. He asked them some very simple questions, but it was ascertained that quite a large proportion could not accurately say who were Nelson, Napoleon, Wellington, and Shakespeare, or where and what were the United States of America. The statistical analysis of the answers disclosed the most startling ignorance. Now such a result may justify to some extent the view of that cynical Inspector of Schools who had no faith in mass education anywhere; but it cannot strengthen the case of those who urge that India's case is peculiar and that she would not profit by compulsion. If all who go to these elementary schools do not learn all or much of what they are taught there, some of them at any rate learn something and the general level of intelligence in the country undoubtedly rises. Education of all sorts increases discontent and must do so if discontent is an essential accompaniment of progress. It does not always make people happier, and many an unlettered peasant of India is happier than Schopenhauer ever could be. But for all that education brightens the home and sweetens labour in each degree. If we may say so, literacy by itself adds another and a keener sense to the other five, and we would refer Mr. Sharpe to Gibbons' philosophic eulogy of those benefactors of mankind who invented writing and arithmetical notation and of those less but equally undoubted benefactors of mankind who invented the art of printing, thereby extending the knowledge of the three R's.

It is news to us that the Education Department uses the ryot who is no fool as a beacon light to guide it in its praise or dispraise of elementary education. We do not know whether the sister service of sanitation would discover in the ryot, who is no fool, an authority in hygiene, who would revolutionise our notions about the advantages of ventilation and light, filtered water and wholesome food and about the uses of soap and water and the danger of microbes. This remarkable difference towards the educational views of the illiterate ryot contrasts curiously with the contempt for the untrained teacher. Sir Harcourt Butler has the advantage of having been Settlement Officer in Oudh for no less than seven years, which constitute a somewhat large fraction of a brilliant but not too long career. He has lived in the villages among the people. The people knew him and he knew them. He has inspected at least a thousand schools in his time and has been instrumental in opening over a hundred new schools. As for Mr. Sharpe, he has had more than an amateur acquaintance with these institutions and says he must have seen thousands of these schools. Compared with such intimate knowledge of these institutions we suppose it will be as nothing that we, the people of this country—as Mr. Gokhale pointed out—learn in these schools. Sir Harcourt and Mr. Sharpe would perhaps concede Mr. Gokhale this much, at least, that he was not too vain when he haughtily said "Well, we have done fairly well in life after all, though we received our primary education in that way under untrained teachers."

He quoted very pertinently the recent conversion of the Bombay Government to the view that an indigenous aided basis cannot be dispensed with in rural areas. But Mr. Madge is of opinion that the world has altogether gone wrong since he did not assist at its creation. They all seem to be putting the cart before the horse. There must be teachers, and trained ones too, before you can have any schools or pupils in the country. If he had the slightest responsibility for the Genesis, he would create not only all the heavens and the earth, but also Adam and Eve and their multitudinous progeny before he would think of the need of the Creator. We would like to know whether he thinks it possible to have trained teachers before there are in the country a number of literate people from whom some may be selected for being trained as teachers. With 94 per cent of people wholly illiterate Mr. Madge may just as well cry for an army of Arnolds and Thrings as moan because the wilderness has no sweet hued and sweet-scented roses. But even if there were palatial school buildings, and Heidelberg doctors of philosophy to teach the children the mysteries of Gurmukhi and Urdu alphabets and the esoteric significance of "two and two make four," would Mr. Madge guarantee that he would fill his schools with pupils on a voluntary basis? It would be an experiment worth trying to put Mr. Madge himself in the now deserted Government House to show in a practical manner what a "warm supporter" he has been of primary education "for a considerable number of years." To the palace and the pedagogue may be added a puff in the Engishman and the Statesman and then the result awaited for some time. I've even half the shades of brown related in the town to his old Bhatee, Gunga Din, flocked to his school, we could well understand that the ryot, who is no fool, is only waiting for Mr. Sharpe's trained teachers and six hundred-rupee school houses constructed without the assistance of the P.W.D. and warranted not to rain longer than the heavens or throw the rays of the midday sun through chink and ranny as from a reflector on to the tender pates of his pupils. But without some such guarantee it is not possible to compel local authorities to build schools and train teachers in the hope that wisdom would suddenly dawn on the ryot as well as the relations of Gunga Din. The Government does not insist on the provision of vaccination depots without providing for compulsory vaccination, and if Ram Bakshi and Gunga Din cannot be expected to purchase immunity for the progeny from such a fell disease as small pox merely at the cost of a scratched arm and an increased temperature for a couple of days, would they forego their children's help in their own work for perfect education even in an ideal school? Grant that an Indian schoolmaster is shamefully underpaid. We admit that he is untrained. We consider that the school buildings are far from ideal. We concede that the curriculum and the teaching are capable of indefinite improvement. But we also contend that standards in this matter are elastic and education, like man, never is, but always to be blest. Nothing that has yet been shown warrants us in withholding from 94 per cent of our fellow-subjects the advantages of literacy and experts have to be told, however politely, that as men of light they will no doubt be fully consulted in discussing in what manner these 94 per cent of our countrymen should be educated, but that it is the province of the lay representative of unenlightened people to say whether light should at all be admitted into their homes, or they be left, as hitherto, in Egyptian darkness. Harrington says somewhere in his Oceana that the enlightenment of a few may suffice for the many, but the interest of the few cannot be a safe guide in dealing with the many. That is no doubt a truism, but a truism that is so apt to be forgotten and mislaid when discussing the interests of a divided people ruled by a foreign Government.

By THE HON. MR GUP

"As large a charter as the wind to blow on whom I please."

—As You Take It.

February 27th (contd.)

AFTER BHUPEN BAU had failed to get people intermarried, BRETHOVEN, "in the unavoidable absence of the ADMINISTRATIVE ORPHAN"—who was propitiating the coal mine owners with post prandial orations—chanted out a couple of solos from typed copy, one on Life Assurance Companies and the other on Provident Insurance Societies, presenting reports of the Select Committees. Then rose the MILD HINDU who wished to handicap the fast running ponies of the I.C.S. with Advisory Councils of the Tribunes of the Plebs. RAILWAY SLEEPER grown afraid of the mischief that lurks in the MILD HINDU thought it best to return from the writing room lest by some mysterious twist in procedure the MILD HINDU may rise and persuade Council to cut down his poor little salary. Behind him followed his goods train bringing in pipe, tobacco pouch and box of matches, all of which were unloaded on the siding which the RAILWAY SLEEPER occupies with the legal luminaries that have never yet condescended to shine on the Council.

The MILD HINDU's problem nothing less than the liberating of the administration. As difficult indeed as squaring the circle or circling the square. Only once has it been known to have been done, when they Piccadilly Curussed Leicester Square. Then the MILD HINDU described the Indian Constitution. The District Officer was the base, the Provincial Governments the centre, and the Government of India at the top. But there was yet another factor, the skeleton in all official cupboard, the hand on the wall in all administrative bonquets, the Imp of the Bottle that could not be discarded, the ubiquitous, and the ever-present Secretary of State, "standing behind all and above all, representing Parliamentary sanction, Parliamentary initiation, and Parliamentary control." This is the bogey of all administrators, the nasty fiend that wants "to dictate policy, to initiate instructions, to reject proposals, to have the last word in every question that arises, and the first word in every question that in his view ought to arise." When the MILD HINDU mentioned the BOGEY MAN, some nervous and rather unseasoned bureaucrats turned round and about, up and down to be sure if the BOGEY MAN was there. But the Hon. Members of the Supreme Government assured them that the BOGEY MAN of the First Word and the Last Word had been captured and tamed, and that H.E. had revived the Harrow institution of the Bag. Who talked of Principal and Agent now? It was the bearward that was now leading the bear.

The MILD HINDU wanted the administration to be conducted in the light of day and not developed like sensitive plates in the photographic dark room. That the raison d'être of his proposal pointed out the five factors that affected the position of the Collector for the worse and made him different from the man he once was. Thereafter referred to the official bias of the Decentralization Commission which was "so constituted that its eye was fixed more on official remedies than on non-official remedies." A one-eyed Commission, to be sure. With this singularity of vision what else could it do?

The representative of the Supreme Government wanted less control of the Bogey Man. The representative of Bombay wanted more freedom for Local Governments. The hater of the Secretariat Raj insisted on the recognition of the greater humanity of the Collector. But there it suddenly ended. After this abrupt stoppage nobody would move to recognise the neglected fact that the people were also human.

There was a Door to which he found no key
There was a Veil past which he could not see
Some little Talk awhile of Me and Thee
There seemed—and then no more of Thee and Me.

MILD HINDU to the STARS of INDIA cried,
Asking, "Will you not take my Lamp to guide Officials stumbling in the Kala Juggahs?"

"HEAVEN'S LIGHTS OUR GUIDE!" the SONS OF HEAVEN replied.

The MILD HINDU referred to the regret of some officials about the past and the old autocracy of the Collector. "But," said he, with a wistful look in his eye and a sigh that shook the political bosom, "the past really never returns." On this assurance some of the married love-dried bureaucrats felt relieved and consigned the affairs of the heart of their salad days to the limbo wherein remain their old debts of needy Juntships. But if the past never returns, the present has worries enough. The grass widows and banyas of other days may never return, but what of the educated classes? There were the lawyers. The MOSLEM DOWAGER's tribe was no better than insistent grass widows who were more consistent in extraneous affections than conjugal monopoly of loving sentiment—or banyas with long accounts and longer memories. The MILD HINDU said that the sneering attitude of the officials in India towards lawyers was strange for people who were governed by three lawyers. Forget that officials in India regarded BHUPEN BAU with no less affection than they had for that dear little Solicitor who says nasty things so deuced cleverly that the DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH thinks he could not be a gentleman. But the lawyers not the only shining lights of the Indian firmament. There were the educated men of the landowning classes such as Hon. friend, CHERRY CHITNIS, (CHITNIS becomes more CHERRY than ever). "It may be that the special peculiarities of their position impose special restrictions on the way they express themselves" (MILD HINDU looks at CHERRY CHITNIS and then glances ahead in the direction of REGGIE's glowing countenance.) As the Poet says, tions of tamper permitted in official documents. (REGOR's head remained dignifiedly statuesque). Just as indiscriminate attacks by non-officials cannot abolish the official class, mere impatience on the official side cannot abolish the educated class. Like a veritable usurer, it wants more and more interest in the administration. If you don't give them that, they become mere critics, and the limits of fair criticism are soon reached. Then begins the wide-stretching and vast realm of 124 A and the dominions of sister sections. There should be more Government on the spot (What would the BOGEY MAN say?) and the officials must learn to get on with the educated class. If this is not done, grievances would be aired collectively in the Legislative Councils creating an impression "as though things were wrong here, there and everywhere" (BIJPLN BABU would have liked to know if the MILD HINDU thought "as though they were not.") The MILD HINDU therefore wanted to manufacture in the Advisory Councils a sort of spittoon where non-official critics could "get rid of a lot of poison." Then he quoted from Woodrow Wilson's State, a State evidently as unknown to REGOR as to the UNDESIRABLE ALIEN who looks after the education of the Rajahs since HOORLAIR SAIHED has taken to looking after the education of the less ignorant masses. MILD HINDU's progress stopped for a time only by that great obstructionist, the German language with its pythonic nomenclature. Confessed "that there is a long German name which I dare not pronounce." There are limits, then even to MILD HINDU's courage. All the same, nothing to be wondered at. Germany and things German have a knack in these days of making most people's courage leak away and disappear.

نظر لکے لہ کہیں اونکے دست و بازو کو

یہ لوگ کیوں مرے زخم کو دیکھتے ہیں

(I fear lest the evil eye should affect the strength of his hand and arm. Why do these people stare at the wound of my heart?) "That," said the MILD HINDU, "is another thing. But we know for a fact (He looked fixedly at CHERRY CHITNIS) that they hold the same views as other members of the educated classes. It cannot indeed be otherwise." (CHITNIS became doleful at this inclusion among the Syndicate of Discontent and looked apologetically in front of him, as much as to say, "You know, please, Sir, I did not do it, Sir.") Turning to the other side, declared that the incessant criticism to which some members of the educated classes subject the administration of the country often tries the temper and exhausts the patience of the official class, specially when criticism is ill-informed and is indiscriminate denunciation of the whole tribe. (REGGIE nods approvingly.) "But it serves no good purpose, thought the MILD HINDU, when expressions of impatience and annoyance are used towards the educated class or individuals."

After detailing his proposals, MILD HINDU analysed the evidence given before the Decentralization Commission. Nine English officials out of 68 had favoured District Advisory Councils and two of them THE MEASURER and PETER QUINCE were Members of this Council. As if in anticipation of the coming storm raised by the MILD HINDU, they had been towed into safe harbours. "I am sorry," said the MILD HINDU, "neither of them is now in the Council else I should have expected to be supported by them." Was it sorrow or sarcasm? Could the MILD HINDU have forgotten the official member's motto about utterances and opinions given outside the Council before non-official resolutions are moved, "We have said what we have said"? Anyhow the Liberal Peers in our Upper House are not too few, and even the Tories are seldom Last Ditchers. There were also, he said, four non-official Europeans who gave evidence on the subject and all were in favour of these Councils. Wonder where MELANCHOLY MADAME had gone about that time. Out of 84 non-official Indian witnesses 71 were in favour and only an unlucky 13 were against. "When we remember how many public men in the country, I will not say, take their cues from officials, but I will say have such humility about them that they distrust their own opinion about any matter when it comes into conflict with official opinion, it is really surprising that the number of those that went against this proposal was not larger than it was." The bayer's dozen thus humiliated, he went on to explain that out of 14 Indian officials 7 were in favour of the proposal. "This too not unsatisfactory, taking into account the nervousness of many Indian officials in expressing opinions not likely to find favour with their superiors." But, MILD HINDU, have you also taken into account the fact that the Indian is as big a bureaucrat as they ever made them? Does he not by seige the citadel, scale the walls, and when instant keeps the gate as securely locked as ever against his non official brethren outside?

What was the official objection? "We do consult people at present and will continue to consult them. But we will consult whom we please, when we please, and how we please. We do not want to be bound in these matters." This is wonderful. Complaints are current of slavery to reports and returns, and chains are rattled which tie the bureaucrats to their desks. And when the non-official Perseus comes to set the bureaucratic Andromeda free, she either hugs her chains or shouts, "Votes for Women." As for the when-where-and-how-we-please consultation, the MILD HINDU had no lack of experience. "On this matter we can speak as no English official can, because they have no experience of our side of the Shield. We often find men of straw, men of no character insinuating themselves into the favour of officials and back biting innocent people and exercising a pernicious influence." Who said, "Khan Bahadur"? Absit omen. The best method of selection for the Advisory Councils would be election supplemented by nominations—"for modest men." And I agree with the opinion expressed by REGOR—I do not know what line he will take to-day, but I agree with the opinion expressed by him as the King of the Orange Free State—that if an Advisory Council comes into existence it must grow out of the present District Boards, and my own opinion is that the District Board should elect the major portion of the members of the Advisory Council.

Some object that Efficiency will suffer. But why should that? Kati of the officials suffer? Does the Efficiency of the Supreme Government suffer by discussions in this Council—"though some officials may think that the time of the Council is wasted by these discussions." (Some smiled assent. Some others laughed guiltily.) Others object that the time for such reform has not yet come. "In the opinion of some officials, the time for any reform never comes and yet somehow it does come and reforms do take place!" You see, while they wait for it listlessly at Outram Ghat, wishing it was with Amundsen or Scott, or somewhere in the vicinity of the North Pole, it quietly clammers over the low fence of the Government House where the Parawalla of Sir Frederick Holliday is catching a bomb thrower in his typical Calcutta Police dreams. The Car of Administration, said the MILD HINDU, rolls over our heads, (THE CAR OF JUGGERNAUT opens his eyes as a mild rebuke for taking his name in vain and disturbing his philosophic meditations.) It should not merely roll over our heads but we should be permitted to join in pulling at the ropes. ("Take us all in time" was the naughtiest comment of the MAN AT THE WHEEL.)

When the MILD HINDU ended, CHEERY CHITNIS rose to read out his printed opposition. Revised Edition now published "By Authority" prefaces the bald opposition with a refreshing introduction with usual compliments about having heard the speech of hon friend with great interest and no instruction. "I had hoped I would be able to change the attitude which the terms of MILD HINDU's Resolution induced me to assume. I am sorry, however, with all respect for his opinion and arguments, my views still remain unchanged." Oh, firm SIR CHEERY! Wonder whether REGOR's remain equally unchanged. Wouldn't that be a strange coincidence if they do? Said since we had got reformed Councils two years ago, we must wait longer before asking for more reforms. "I believe in no country is the District administration carried on by a body of Councillors." You see, neither the printer of the speech nor the writer had taken account of the MILD HINDU's quoting the example of Prussia for one, so what was to be done but to read out the speech "as she was wrote." CHEERY CHITNIS an intensely human figure in Indian politics, and believes that even the greatest autocrat of the Heaven-born Service could not desire to lead a miserable existence bereft of popularity. "Everybody wants to be popular, that is a human weakness which supplies a corrective for absolute autocracy." Did not Nero fiddle to amuse his subjects and drown their sorrows when they were mourning the destruction of Rome by fire? CHEERY CHITNIS forgot that human weaknesses and the Heaven-born Service live poles asunder. As for popularity, is not the "Strong Man" the pet of the ladies, and the envy of all Guffins, as well as the despair of the MILD HINDU? According to CHEERY CHITNIS, the difficulty arises from "a deplorable absence of broadminded citizenship." He would wish the minds of all citizens to have at least the dimensions of the KUNWAR SAIHED's back even if not to be as broad as his own smile of utter content. He thinks that "any District officer who is worth his salt would under any conditions seek the advice of local leaders." That extensive phrase, "local leader" covers a multitude of sinners, but little does CHEERY CHITNIS know that salt is, alas, still too highly taxed and far from cheap.

MUD HOKKAR, anxious for the liberalism of the Orange Free State, rose immediately afterwards to rebut the evidence of the last speaker. Only the previous day he had refreshed his memory of the evidence of CHEERY CHITNIS before the Decentralization Commission and had found it in favour of the Advisory Councils. How extremely irrelevant MUD HOKKAR can be at times? How does it help him if it was favourable? That was the evidence before the Decentralization Commission and this before—well, what boots it to say who sat before CHEERY CHITNIS here?

The KHAN BAHADUR brought a little bomb to-day and flung it like a man in the full assembly. Whatever may happen hereafter, the MILD HINDU had on this occasion at least given an analysis that formed "an excellent index of public opinion in this country." The KHAN BAHADUR would now analyse the public opinion of the Punjab. The Land of Five Rivers had three classes, and all supported the measure. There were "the aristocratic ultra-loyal (ye gods!) landowners like my friend the Hon. Free Lance," politicians of that discredited body, "the Congress School"—the mere mention of which imposes on the True Believer a Pryschit of the sixth product of the cow—and last come modestly and with that most despicable repugnance to publicity, "Moderate Liberals" such as "Our beloved Cousin" and "my humble self." Liberalism thy home is Baghbanpura, and Moderation thy name is KHAN BAHADUR—ship! Who talks of the Collector consulting leading persons? Who are the "leading persons"? "In more cases than not the persons who are consulted by the Collector probably have been recommended to him by the Tahsildar, or perhaps their names have been mentioned to him by the Superintendent of his vernacular office." The Council wondered what the Deputy Commissioner of Lahore could have been doing just now. However courageous before officials, the KHAN BAHADUR quailed with fear before the people themselves. "No election for me, if you please." The Land of the Five Rivers possesses, thanks to the KHAN BAHADUR, the unique distinction of still retaining nomination and that distinction must continue as a white feather in his cap.

The white-robed PANDIT followed. He found the district officer to be the most important unit of the administration in the country. A fellow townsman in Prag, the جی اگبر had expressed the same idea in inimitable verse

جو مر ایک گورے کو لفظت گورلر سمجھا

(He understood British rule best of all who understood every white man to be a Lieutenant-Governor.) Well, the Extra Special Lieutenant-Governor of the Disunited Provinces had suggested that if consultation with non-officials necessary, the Collector should choose his men—from the Durbar Lists. Oh lie, Sir DUKHAR HEMPT!

When all these non-officials had strutted their hour upon the stage, RAGGIE stepped out from the wings and told his tale that lacked not sound and fury in the telling of it. Enraged at his baptism as RAGGIE, he now came forward to claim the title and all other appurtenances of his deceased predecessor SANDOW II. The opening sentence itself presaged a storm. With the official blue pencil for a sceptre to thump on his despatch box and on his files, he emphasised his attitude to day. "Sir, in opposing this resolution (Direct, isn't it?) I wish to lay VERY PARTICULAR STRESS on the terms in which it has been couched. The MILD HINDU wants that district administration should be brought into closer contact with the people. I do not quarrel with that desire" (Council much relieved at the postponement of hostilities). Informed the Council that he came from a Province where such a close touch with the people was a special feature. No representative of the people was allowed to escape from the leading strings of the bureaucracy! Turning to the MILD HINDU's scheme said "It sounds very pleasant and very attractive (Sarcasm at 85). It is a very pretty picture that he has drawn for us (Sarcasm at 90) and it seems to have captivated the imagination of many hon. members (Sarcasm at 95) who have spoken so far (Looks at DASHING BOY who has yet to speak). Now, I am very sorry, (smiles blandly) sympathising as I do with MILD HINDU's object, (Council fully convinced of sympathy) that it should fall to my lot to do my very best to shatter this pretty picture" (Sarcasm at 100). And while doing his duty as SANDOW III, followed the example of blind Samson in his agony, and brought down the house that he had himself built up laboriously as plain RAGGIE of the Orange Free State. According to the new SANDOW, the MILD HINDU had been unable to quote a precedent for such Councils. "Prussia? Yes, but what does he know of Prussia? At any rate, I don't know Prussia, and that is just as good. What's the good of reading out of a book?" Awfully pleased with his own lynx-eyed vigilance, remarked that he had noticed one thing. "The MILD HINDU suddenly changed the subject and put the book down, when he came to what appeared to be a strong combination between the judiciary and the executive in Prussia" (Sarcasm at 105). SANDOW III's numerous friends laugh hilariously.)

After this, "emphatically disagreed" with his own manufactured definition of "on the spot." The Head-quarters of a District was not "on the spot." The MILD HINDU had referred to greater expedition of work if a Council attached to the Collector. But the Collector's writing the invariable "strong note saying he disagreed" with the Council would make greater expedition impossible. At this GROVER woke up from dreams of Aboland and wondered why a greater expedition was impossible. The C. E. hunters were "Ready, aye, ready for the field."

After this the newly crowned SANDOW III manufactured some bits of a pretty picture and then neatly smashed them. For the sake of CHERRY CHINIS, his Black Boards were dear to SANDOW III, and he thought nobody loved them as he did. So thundered forth (Sarcasm at 110) that "there was nothing that surprises me so much in all the speeches that I have heard as the apparent contempt with which the speakers have referred to such bodies as the District Board." And on that peg hung a string of complimentary adjectives to honour CHERRY CHINIS which brought blushes to the unaccustomed cheeks of that happy member. When he had fed CHERRY CHINIS fully, threw a crumb in the direction of MILD HOLKAR also.

Having written these obituary notices in the lifetime of the individuals concerned and recited them to their faces, said "Another point to which the Hon. gentleman has referred is the fact that the Collector has naturally at hand no educated adviser to give him help in interpreting the wishes of the people. I cannot for a moment believe that these hon. gentlemen really mean what they say." Little did he think that the hon. gentlemen did not for a moment say what he believed and meant. Thereafter proceeded to select with the MILD HINDU at his elbow an Advisory Council. "Well, I suppose we shall have to put three lawyers on that Council." Sarcasm was rapidly rising to the normal temperature of Sibi and Jacobabad when recollected that the MUSLIM DOWAGER was also a lawyer, and as a special favour to a colleague preserved the status quo ante. But balked of his prey here, turned fiercely on the MILD HINDU and asked, "if I am the Collector and want to consult the people why should I employ a go-between?"

Turned next to the functions of this Council. Legislative proposals? Why, everyone can send an opinion on these, and if he likes to make the Collector a post office, let him do so. But why should the Collector waste his precious time in getting the Council to frame suggestions which may all be treated as waste-paper in another place—that is if they went against the Government view. As for the Collector, why, in sending his own statement of the general opinion in his district, he would no doubt do what the philosopher did who was asked to write an essay on the camel, an animal he had never seen before. He locked himself in a dark room "and evolved the brute out of his consciousness!" Creation of new municipalities, extension of the operations of Acts to new areas, imposition of punitive police, all this seemed to the Strong Man of the Orange Free State as far beyond the powers of the nine Councillors. As for the opening and location and abolition of liquor shops, "well, if the nine Councillors were given any voice in this, it wouldn't be local option which you want—and I wouldn't give." As for the suspension of Municipalities, the suspended bodies would resent if any but the Collector was employed as the hangman!

There was still another objection. If we have a "strong" Collector—a chip of the SANDOW block—the hon. members would deprecate the Council merely registering his decrees; if we have a weak Collector—a chip of some other blockhead—the Council would obtain ascendancy over him. And after all, as SANDOW III. was firmly convinced, Collectors were either goats or sheep. "The Council—I will not mince words, for there is much else to mince to-day—would become a hot-bed of intrigue."

After this self-satisfying destruction that he had wrought—Penelope's feat repeated in the unweaving of what he himself had woven before—he thought it was time to take rest. "Now, Sir, I have attacked with considerable vigour—not to say in a bull-in-a-China shoply manner—the MILD HINDU's proposals." He thought he had left not one stone turned upon another and his house was left unto him desolate. But if Samson destroyed, SANDOW III. would build up also. What he wanted was a ground floor of the Spot and an upper storey of the Man in the Street, and what he thought best was to have no lift, staircase or ladder to make the one commiserate with the other. Such was the house that RAGGIE built.

Who calls him renegade? Yes, he had written a note for the Decentralization Commission. But "when I wrote that note it was not intended for publication." Where's our Official Secrets Act? Are these Imperial arcana to be displayed to the rude gaze of the plebeians in the market place? Anyhow, there was a difference between his views and the MILD HINDU's and—although he did not say it—there was much difference between a starup of a Provincelet and a membership of the Unlimited Assets Joint Stock Company registered under the name and title of the Supreme Government.

The MILD HINDU wanted these Councils to be merely advisory to begin with. What SANDOW III. wanted to know was what they would be to end with. Wonder whether SANDOW III. would have asked the Creator on the first day to submit the complete programme of the creation before he made light. By a curious coincidence just then SIR GUY was writing a chit to SANDOW III. "You had 45 minutes to begin with and you seem to take hours to end with." ST. VINCENT took up the chit to him, and although there was still much thunder in his storage-battery, SANDOW III. turned to his papers to find out his grand peroration. "The nine Councillors intended to be the nine Muses (Sarcasm at 115) would end by being nine millstones (Sarcasm at 120) round the Collector's neck." Little did SANDOW III. think of the Collector's need of ballast, and little did he know that, to anticipate the sartorial trop of his colleague, the Councillors would be the nine tailors that would make the Collector a man.

MADGE must needs follow where a SANDOW leads. Completely satisfied with European juries that let off white murderer, he first showed his stern disapproval of the assessor and then in disapproving elections declared all analogies from European countries as entirely inapplicable to India. No wonder some people wish MADGE was from a European country, and an analogy so that he may not apply himself so often to India and its problems. If anything was needed to discredit elections altogether, it was the statement of "a popular Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation" reserved by Providence for being related by MADGE. This "popular Chairman" thought that some "representatives" were simply representatives of the garriwallas "because it was found that in the course of one election a man was actually returned by not more than a carriage stand." Even, if unlike MADGE, this bear some relation to Truth, why need he grudge the garriwallas a Municipal Commissioner? What is so very wrong with a carriage stand when Lobo's Bandstand returns a member to the Imperial Legislature?

The HON. LONGFELLOW was short and pungent. Related a story of the days when he was in the bad books of the District Officer of Chapra for having cross-examined him effectively and thereby won a case. But better than the story was the definition of "Strong men of the Service." "They go to an absolutely peaceful district, and by their behaviour disturb the whole administration." At which even our SANDOW III. paled and trembled.

When the MILD HINDU rose for a reply it seemed certain that he was going to use dynamite. The humble loyalty of CHEERY CHITNIS and the long-drawn emphasis of SANDOW III's tremendous judgments was heard with obviously great self-control, but the dam could not for ever keep back the rushing flood. As for CHEERY CHITNIS, liked to dismiss him with the remark that as CHEERY CHITNIS had not listened to MILD HINDU's speech before making his own, MILD HINDU would go on with his reply without caring what CHITNIS had said. But on second thought added that CHEERY CHITNIS was more loyal than law and more royal than the king himself. The authors of the reform had appointed a Commission for further reforms. Yet hon. friend, more conservative than the Tories themselves, would postpone them indefinitely because some had already been granted two years ago. One point more. He was afraid of obstructionists in Advisory Councils. What if a little obstruction existed? Ah! MILD HINDU. You know not that a mud fencing two feet eight inches high is the very Wall of China to little CHITNIS.

Then turned to the Strong Man of the Orange Free State who sat proudly on his throne after his great Coronation oration. Yes, he had shattered many a pretty picture, but they were not the MILD HINDU's at all. They were fancy pictures of his own creation. He was furious and convulsive, though he thought was dignified and strong. But MILD HINDU was puzzled, he was surprised, he was astonished, nay, to use the Strong Man's own strong phrase, he was astounded at his behaviour. The MILD HINDU expected more respect for truth from the HOME MEMBER than had been shown, for he had fathered a whole Foundling Home of silly statements on the MILD HINDU who happened to be living in a state of single blessedness. For instance, he did not say a word about the local bodies which could be construed into contempt. Here, thought SANDOW III, was an opportunity of showing his strength. "Oh, what a fibber. I never said a word about contempt. What I said was that the way they omitted any references and put them aside as being unworthy of consideration almost amounted to contempt." All had heard of silence being consent, but SANDOW III had a revised version of his own reading. "Silence is contempt." Be that as it may, even the authorised version of his speech mentions not the absence of references as almost amounting to contempt, but states that references were made and they were contemptuous.

MILD HINDU, however, content with the rebuke that hon. member had earned because he had not really cared to understand their proposal. As for the quotation from Woodrow Wilson's book, he might have adopted a little more charitable attitude towards him. Even though strong men seldom read books, this one was not inaccessible and had suppressio veri been attempted, there were hon. member and his friends ready to snatch the veil. However as hon. member had thrown doubt on the straight forwardness of his action, MILD HINDU would read the portion which he had not read before for the special edification of the hon. member. He would read that portion and would then pass the book on to SANDOW III so that he may make sure that he was not cheated. Thereafter read out the passage which showed that the President of the Administration, that is, the Collector, does not sit on the Committee to administer justice. At this it was the turn of the non-officials to laugh hilariously, and he laughs best who laughs last.

Next, replied to the criticism stating that even those whom the Strong Man would not like to come between him and the people were also of the people, and twitted SANDOW III. on his having exactly the attitude of mind which must be given up if district administration is to be improved. As for want of time, if the Collector cannot spare one day in the month for the purpose, well the idea that some gentlemen have on the subject of the administration of the country are extraordinary. As for practicability, it is only the officials that have a chance of trying experiments and applauding thereafter their grand failure. Give us the chance, said the MILD HINDU, and "would we not shatter it to bits and then, rebuild it nearer to the heart's desire." As regards Commissioners, the MILD HINDU thought like many other officials that they were the fifth wheel of the car of administration, but no one suggested the abolition of the Collectors. SANDOW III. had asked, if that is done what is to happen. He might as well ask if Government ceases to exist what is to happen. Well, not an unreasonable question, nor a difficult one to answer either. One dire result would be the abolition of SANDOW III. and a saving of Rs. 6,666 to annas 8 pies per month.

When the Council divided all the non-official Indian members present voted for the motion, but CHEERY CHITNIS, in the tones of Mrs. Micawber, said, "I will never desert my SANDOW III." and clung to the frock coat tails of the Strong Man from the Orange Free State. Well has the poet said,

The Babe no question nukes of Ayes and Noes,
But Right or Left as told by Nurse it goes,
And Baby's Nurse that brought it up on pap,
And Knightly sings the lullaby she knows.

Female Education.

We publish a letter which Her Highness the Begum Saheba of Bhopal has addressed to some of her friends regarding the girls' school which she has proposed in commemoration of Queen-Empress Mary's visit to Delhi:—

The visit of Their Imperial Majesties to India in December last was an event of unique importance, and we who saw the memorable scenes at the Imperial city of Delhi and elsewhere are never likely to forget their unparalleled significance. I believe I am right in saying that from the tablet of our hearts the impressions which the great ceremonies of Delhi made on us will never be effaced, and the visions of those gorgeous days will always remain before our minds' eye, with their brightness and lustre undimmed by the lapse of time. It is to the coming of the Queen-Empress that I as a woman wish particularly to call the attention of my sisters. The women of India owe a great debt of gratitude to Queen Mary for Her Majesty's gracious kindness and courtesy to them. The great enthusiasm which Her Majesty's coming evoked in the female world everywhere was largely due to the fact that but for Her Majesty's coming, the Purdah Women of India would, through the Purdah system and the way of their living, have lost their share of the interest in the great ceremonies. The presence, however, of Her Majesty in our midst, her kindly interest in everything that concerned us, and her charming courtesy were sources of indescribable delight to all of us.

As far as I can think, one of the principal objects of Her Majesty's visit to this country was her desire to acquaint herself better with the women of India, as she herself graciously remarked in the course of her reply to an address presented to her by Bombay ladies

"One of my chief objects in this tour is to see as much as possible of my Indian sisters, for I believe the more I see of the reality of your lives the more I shall admire and esteem the high qualities for which the Indian woman is renowned. If my first impression, so charming and so powerful, becomes fixed as I travel through India, then, to use the words of your address, I shall carry home agreeable memories, and a sympathy which will bring us into a close bond of mutual esteem, regard and goodwill."

This object of her visit Her Majesty undoubtedly fulfilled—she asked ladies of rank to visit her and graciously afforded them an opportunity of renewing their acquaintance with her at the Purdah party Her Majesty held at Delhi. Needless to say, the charm of Her Majesty's courtesy was nothing short of magical and everyone of us who had the good fortune of being there felt the spell of it. In connection with Their Majesties' visit to Delhi the thought has occurred to me that though the great event of December last will live in the pages of history for all time and though the memories of those days will even be handed down to future generations, the event yet demands a notable monument of public utility raised by the grateful women of India to commemorate the coming of the great Queen from across the seas to Delhi for her Coronation. Delhi has known great events and gorgeous celebrations, but none of a more significant character than the visit of Queen Mary, and it is all the more incumbent on us, the women of India, to signalise her visit in a suitable way and thus prove to the world at large that behind the Purdah also beat hearts quite as grateful as those of men to their Sovereign and his Consort and quite as appreciative of the necessity for moving with the times. After careful consideration I have come to the conclusion that no memorial could better serve our purpose than a well-endowed and well-conducted Institution at Delhi for the education of women. It is evident that the education of women is necessary in all countries and in all stages of civilisation, but in India of all countries and in all stages of civilisation in which we find ourselves it is most necessary, for it is universally acknowledged that the ignorance of women in this country is the greatest clog to the wheel of progress.

During my recent visit to Calcutta I spoke to Lady Hardinge about my proposal for an educational institution for women at Delhi, and Her Excellency has written to me expressing on her own and Lord Hardinge's behalf unqualified approval of the idea. After my return from Calcutta I happened to visit Indore for the Daly College Council meeting and there I had very good opportunities of discussing the project with my brother Ruling Chiefs who were assembled there. My visit to Indore was a particularly happy one. I had in the first place the pleasure of learning of the proposed college at Delhi for the higher education of sons of Indian Chiefs—for whom, by the way, I have always advocated a separate University—and in the second place I had occasion to see my English and Indian friends, with whom I exchanged ideas over the proposed institution for women. To many of my brother Ruling Chiefs I entrusted a message for their Ranis and Begums inviting their co-operation and assistance in the attainment of the object I have in view, and I have had the good fortune to receive encouraging answers. I know so well that behind the veil also there are so many hearts full of broad sympathy and overflowing kindness, and to them I am sure I have not appealed in vain. The qualities of the heart of Indian women are well known and these will have to assist in development of the qualities of the head. As an instance of an Indian woman's high-minded generosity I have only to remind you of the munificent donation of the Begum Saheba of Bahawalpur to the Nadwatul Ulema of Lucknow. That men have done a great deal for our sex in the matter of education is evident, but they have done much more for themselves, forgetting probably that our education was more important than theirs. At the end of the last year the number of schoolboys in the whole of India stood at about 39½ lakhs, whereas that of girls was a little under 7 lakhs. Men have eloquent supporters of their cause in Legislative Councils and elsewhere, and there is no fear of their educational requirements suffering from lack of attention. It behoves us women, therefore, to show some signs of awakening also, for in the present state of affairs, though men and women are side by side in bearing the burden of the old chariot of this country progressing slowly in the ways of enlightenment and culture, men have, if I may say so, by their endeavours constituted themselves a nice rubber tyre up-to-date wheel which wishes to glide swiftly onwards, while women on the other side are still the unaltered, unimproved and unfashioned structure of the olden times.

My idea regarding the institution I have proposed is that we should begin with a well-equipped school which in the course of time will become a model institution of its kind. In this school provision ought to be made for the education of girls of rich as well as poor families. Twelve lakhs of rupees are in my opinion necessary at the outset—4 lakhs for building purposes and 8 lakhs for endowment. The details of the scheme are being worked out and I shall be very pleased to receive suggestions in this connection. For my own part I shall be delighted to give a lakh of rupees from the State and 20,000 from my private purse. My daughters-in-law have also expressed practical sympathy with my scheme, the eldest and the second contributing 7,000 each and the third 5,000 rupees.

I have every reason to hope and believe that my scheme will commend itself to all friends of India who have the education of women at heart and to all my sisters, from Ranis and Begums down to ladies in humbler walks of life, and with their assistance, moral and material, I am absolutely confident of unqualified success.

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

Reuter wires from Teheran on 28th March.—In view of Persia's satisfactory reply to the Anglo-Russian note of 20th February, Britain and Russia have each advanced Persia a hundred thousand pounds.

Reuter wires from Teheran on 1st April.—The Russians have bombarded the mosque at Meshed where numerous partisans of the ex-Shah had taken refuge.

A telegram to the Times from Teheran on the 30th, states that the Cabinet is greatly concerned over Lord Hardinge's intimation that the Government of India may be forced to deal directly through the Consul-General at Bushire with unruly tribes in South Persia. The Cabinet declares that this course would completely undermine the attempt which the Central Government is now making through Swedish officers to restore prestige and order. One Swede is already working at Shiraz, where the remainder accompanied by an armed force are expected in five days.

In view of the political situation in Persia, a representative of the Englishman interviewed his Excellency Sir Mirza Davoud Khan, Meftah-es-Sultaneh, Consul-General for Persia, on Saturday. Sir Davoud Khan, it may be mentioned, was Chief of the Foreign Office in Teheran before his appointment as Consul-General. He was in the suite of the predecessor of Mahomed Ali Shah on the tour in Europe. He has been in Calcutta only a short time. Sir Davoud Khan was present at the Coronation in London and then at the Delhi Durbar.

Our representative asked him if writs had been issued for elections to the new Mejliss and was told that the Persian Government proposed to arrange about the elections as soon as possible.

"What is the cause of the delay?"

"From the latest telegrams that I have received from Teheran, it appears that during the last upheaval in Persia, the Governor of some of the most important provinces had been recalled and new Governors were appointed. As soon as the new Governors reach the provincial capitals, the writs for elections will be issued."

"Is there any possibility of the postponement of elections?"

"My information is that the Cabinet is not only in favour of summoning a new Mejliss, but is anxious to order elections without delay. As all the Governors are not at their posts, it is difficult to arrange about the elections."

Regarding the news that Salar-ed-Dowleh had put the Governor of Kermanshah to torture and then burnt him alive, the Consul-General said he sent a special message to Teheran asking for information on the subject.

"I have received the reply," said Sir Davoud Khan, "that the news is not true. But Salar-ed-Dowleh has been busy creating disorder, and reports of oppression practised by him on the people of Kermanshah are true."

"Do you think that Salar-ed-Dowleh will leave Persia now?" asked our representative.

"The Persian Government inform me that a strong force has been told off for Kermanshah. They will leave Teheran very shortly and they will either capture Salar-ed-Dowleh or he will flee the country," said the Consul-General.

"Did you read the Viceroy's speech on Persian affairs?"

"Yes, I have read it very carefully."

"Do you agree with his Excellency the Viceroy in his views regarding the present situation in Persia?"

"His Excellency the Viceroy's views," said Sir Davoud Khan, "indicate that he is a well-wisher of our country and that he is in favour of protecting the integrity and independence of Persia. This, of course, is very satisfactory. It is exactly what we expect from a representative of a friendly Power like Great Britain. But the portion of His Excellency's speech where he suggests that the British Government may itself make arrangements with the tribesmen in Southern Persia for the security of trade-routes seems personally to me—of course, I have no information as to the views held by my Government on the question—to be rather contradictory to His Excellency the Viceroy's opinions regarding the maintenance of the independence and integrity of Persia. Moreover, it seems to me that if the British Government made any arrangements with the tribesmen independently of the Persian Government, it may lead to serious difficulties in times of stress."

Our representative then asked what, in the Consul-General's opinion, were the best measures for restoring tranquility in Southern Persia.

Sir Davoud Khan said: "The best course, in my opinion, is to leave the Persian Government to formulate its own methods in peace and quietness, to give my Government time to work out its own programme. If the Persian Government is left in peace, it will assuredly devise means for restoring order in Southern Persia."

"We have been hearing a good deal of late of the Persian Government having asked for time to set its house in order but we have seen no results," suggested our representative.

"Have you ever seen during the whole of this period that the Persian Government was left alone to work out its salvation?" asked the Consul-General and then continued: "Throughout this period, the Persian Government has been the object of attack from all sides, and there has been no end to its troubles, so that it is a matter for surprise that there is even the order that exists to-day in Persia. During the past year especially, as you are aware, the Government's enemies attacked it from all directions, and yet the Government has come out safely. A Government which has passed through such a crisis as the Persian Government, and which has shown so great a power of endurance in the face of heavy losses, cannot be said to be unable to think for itself. Now that the period of stress is almost over, the Persian Government will concern itself whole-heartedly with the work of restoring peace and order to the country. The manner in which the Persian Government has met the attacks of the ex-Shah, the way it routed the forces of Sardar Arshad, the successful encounters with the supporters of Salar-ed-Dowleh, the ease with which it has allayed popular excitement and removed the grievances of the Ulema, also uprooting effectively the principles of boycott against British goods conclusively prove the ability of the Persian Government to cope with disorder. The Government has passed through very anxious times. But the situation in Persia now shows signs of betterment. The Swedish officers are engaged in the task of evolving order and the Government is leaving no stone unturned to restore peace to the country. Now is not the time for gloomy forebodings, but rather for hope of better times for Persia. You get news daily from Persia, and can judge for yourself whether the position is improving. If signs of improvement are visible on all sides, the power of the Government must be re-established."

Sir Davoud Khan was not present at the public meeting held at the Town Hall last Wednesday to discuss British policy in Persia. He, however, read the report of the proceedings in the newspapers. It was expected, he said, that the people nourished on British traditions should evince sentiments of humanity and love of fellow-men.

Mr. Morgan Shuster, ex-Treasurer-General of Persia, has been appointed as the South American representative of a New York banking firm.

Reuter wires from Teheran on the 3rd.—The bombardment of the mosque at Meshed resulted in two Russian Cossacks being wounded and fifty casualties among the pilgrims and other worshippers. No followers of the ex-Shah appear to have been wounded.

THE permanent residence of the ex-Shah of Persia does not seem to have been yet determined. He reached Odessa from Astrabad by way of Baku, about the middle of March, and he may remain at the Russian port for an indefinite period. In the interests of the future peace of Persia it would be advisable that he should be made to live much further from Persia than the northern shore of the Black Sea whence he can slip away to the Cyprian. The Teheran Government have agreed to provide him with a fairly large income, and it should be possible for the British and Russian Foreign Offices to agree as to his place of retirement. His adherents in northern Persia have been depressed by the complete failure of his adventure, which at one time promised so well, but some of them are still in arms. If they learned that their late sovereign had gone, say, to Paris or London, their early submission might be gained. They will probably continue to intrigue so long as they can keep in comparatively easy touch with him at Odessa.—The Pioneer.

News by the English Mail.

Teheran, March 12.

English advices, which have been delayed by the interruption of communications, depict a most serious condition of affairs at Kirmanshah. Since 15th February the banks and business houses had been closed, Salar-ed-Dowleh was hanging all the mujaheddin, the executions being conducted in a brutal manner, the Imperial Bank was struck by a shell on February 22nd and the town was looted. The despatch concludes:—"Trouble expected shortly," so apparently Kirmanshah does not lose its head over trifles.

St. Petersburg, March 12.

Mohammed Ali embarked yesterday for Petrovsk, on the west coast of the Caspian, and will proceed thence to Odessa to rejoin his family. He will leave Russia shortly to settle abroad. The ex-Shah's army is being paid off out of the annuity of 75,000 toman (about £12,500) provided by the Teheran Government.

St. Petersburg, March 14.

Mahommed Ali, after landing at Baku, has proceeded to Odessa. He will soon be followed by his brother Shua es Sultaneh. It is probable that Salar-ed-Dowleh will also leave Persia on learning of the ex-Shah's departure and the Government's readiness to restore his confiscated estates. The Turkish troops at Urmiah have been reinforced.

(FROM THE "DAILY NEWS" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

St. Petersburg, March 11.

I have reliable information that a strong force has already moved from the Army Corps stationed at Tiflis upon the Turco-Persian frontier, intending to cover the position occupied by the Turks around Urmia.

It is understood that this military action has been taken concurrently with the dismissal of M. Tcharykoff, the Russian Ambassador at Constantinople.

("NEW YORK HERALD" CORRESPONDENT)

Teheran, March 11.

Salar-ed-Dowleh cut off the legs of the Governor of Kermanshah and then burnt him alive. Other unspeakable atrocities have been committed in the town. He also captured Zenjan and at present laughs at the Anglo-Russian proposal that he should follow the example of the deposed Shah, his brother, and retire on a pension, declaring that the departure of his brother leaves the avenue to the throne open to him.

St. Petersburg, March 10.

A telegram from Khor says that the Christians of Urmia have drawn up a petition to the Tsar and the Duma requesting them to make representations to the Parliaments of Great Britain, France, and the United States with the view of obtaining permission for Russian troops to be stationed in the district of Urmia as long as possible. The khans and landowners have handed to the Russian Consul a request to be taken under Russian protection, as the Turks have seized certain Persian territory and are ruining them by preventing them from obtaining any profit from their lands. (Kurier)

Mr Booth (Pontefract, Min.), for Mr Barton (Oldham, Min.) asked the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether he was aware that there had been an outbreak of disorder at Kermanshah, Persia, and that rebellious tribes had invaded the town, plundered and set fire to warehouses, and caused further loss to Man-hesser merchants, and what steps he was taking in the matter.

Mr. Acland (Cornwall, Camborne) — The Persian Government have informed his Majesty's Minister at Teheran that Salar-ed-Dowleh, brother of the ex-Shah, has entered Kermanshah and looted the bazaars. A message has been sent to him by his Majesty's Minister and his Russian colleague strongly recommending him to leave Persia on certain conditions offered by the Persian Government.

Mr. Booth asked the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether he realised that Lankashire trade interests were mainly concerned with Central and Northern Persia, that the position was getting steadily worse, that heavy losses had been and were being sustained by British merchants, and that further shipments of cotton goods had been suspended; and whether he was in a position to give any information for the guidance of traders.

Mr. Acland. — His Majesty's Government realise fully the serious trade conditions at present prevailing in Persia. The Persian Government are taking such steps as are possible in the matter, but I cannot for the reasons explained at the time promise to take measures beyond what I stated in the House on the 21st of last month.

Mr. Watt (Glasgow College, Min.) asked whether it was a fact that the position was getting steadily worse.

Mr. Acland. — No, I do not think so. On the contrary, I think there is rather an improvement.

The following is the text of the joint Note addressed by the British and Russian representatives at Teheran to the Persian Government on September 11, 1907:—

The Governments of Great Britain and Russia, desiring to avoid any cause of conflict between their respective interests in certain regions in Persia contiguous to, or in the immediate neighbourhood of, the frontiers of Afghanistan and Baluchistan on the one hand, and the Russian frontier on the other hand, have signed a friendly agreement on the subject.

In that agreement the two Governments mutually agree to the strict integrity and independence of Persia, and testify that they sincerely desire the pacific development of that country as well as the permanent establishment of equal advantages for the commerce and industry of all other nations. Each of the two States further engages, in case the Persian Government grants concessions to foreigners, not to seek concessions adjoining, or in the neighbourhood of, the frontiers of the other. In order to prevent misunderstandings in future, and to avoid creating an order of things which might place the Persian Government in an embarrassing situation in any respect whatever, the above mentioned regions are clearly defined in the arrangement. In mentioning the revenues which are affected to the loans concluded by the Persian Government with the Discount and Loan Bank and the Imperial Bank of Persia, the Russian and British Government recognise that these revenues will be in future allotted to the same purpose as in the past, and the two Governments equally engage, in the case of irregularities in the amortisation of or in the payment of interest on the above mentioned loans, to enter on a friendly exchange of views in order to determine by common agreement the measures which, in conformity with the law of nations, it would be necessary to take in order to safeguard the interests of the creditors and to avoid all interference which would not be in conformity with the principles of that arrangement.

In signing that arrangement the two States have not for a moment lost sight of the fundamental principle of absolute respect of the integrity and independence of Persia. The arrangement has no other object than that of avoiding any cause of misunderstanding between the contracting parties on the ground of Persian affairs. The Government of the Shah will convince itself that the agreement arrived at between Russia and Great Britain can but contribute in the most efficacious manner to the security of the prosperity and the ultimate development of Persia.

Persia in the Toils.

THE Joint Anglo-Russian Note presented to the Persian Government last month seems to be as fatal a menace to Persian independence as that other Joint Note of evil memory in the modern history of Egypt. That, it will be remembered, was an Anglo-French Note. The parallel is sinister. Taken in connection with Sir Edward Grey's speech in reply to Mr. Ponsenby's amendment to the address, we are confronted with a state of affairs much worse than had been supposed even from previous utterances of the Foreign Secretary.

Let us briefly recall the circumstances which have led to this situation. Last October Russia "rained ultimatums," in Lord Curzon's phrase, on Persia. The second of these was actually launched after the Persian Government on Sir Edward Grey's advice had humbly complied with the unjust demands of the first. The Mejliss, which Mr. Shuster has told us had made an excellent beginning with constitutional rule in Persia, was destroyed by a coup d'état. Mr. Shuster, because of his adamant honesty, was dismissed. A Cabinet resting on no popular support was set up to treat with Russia. Mr. Shuster's place was taken by M. Monard, a Belgian in the Persian service against, whose appointment even the Times thought it well to allow a prominent protest in its columns. M. Monard is, in fact, and almost by admission, a tool of Russia. That Power, with British assent, demanded a veto on the appointment of all foreigners in the Persian service. It then invaded northern Persia and commenced to indulge in a hideous carnival of barbarism. We referred last month to the execution of the Sikat-ul-Islam at Tabriz as well as of the head of the Armenian community in that town. Professor Browne, writing in the Manchester Guardian the other day, gives some further harrowing details of Russian atrocities. According to a Baku newspaper of February 17, the number of persons hanged was officially stated as 30, but it is believed to considerably exceed that figure. A number of Armenians were marked down for death. Samad Khan Shuja-ud-Dowleh, a known partisan of the ex-Shah, who had been besieging Tabriz before, has now returned under Russian auspices as Governor of Azerbaijan, and is carrying out executions on his own account, and amongst his other exploits has created an artificial famine. "We find people without fire," writes a European resident, "when the temperature is some degrees below freezing, without anything but the hard earthen floor to sleep on, and sometimes with no covering for their bodies at night, and very insufficiently clothed, and no food." And the situation is graphically summed up by a Turkish correspondent: "The gallows, the knout, looting, hunger, humiliation."

At the end of a couple of months of Russian terrorism of this kind there comes the Joint Note. It proposes a loan of £200,000 to Persia at 7 per cent. These noble Powers are not even above playing Shylock in respect of this small advance forced on a weak and poor State. As a matter of fact, Persia is to be purchased for this paltry sum. For the price of one of our smaller passenger steamers Persia is to be bought outright. That is virtually the condition on which the loan is to be made. The Mejliss had rejected a proposal for a much larger loan because even less onerous conditions were attached to it. The spending of this £200,000 is to be under the control of the Treasurer-General, the obliging M. Mornard who is to act "with the approval of the two Legations." In other words, a sum nominally advanced to the Persian Government, and for which the Persian finances are liable, is to be disbursed by a Russian protege acting in conjunction with the Russian and British Ministers in Teheran. When Sir Edward Grey was expounding this interesting scheme in the House, Mr O'Grady incontinently inquired, "What about the Persian people?" "That," replied Sir Edward Grey in his most dignified manner, "is the sort of remark which makes discussion impossible." And, of course, there were sympathetic cheers.

In addition to the arrangements for spending the proceeds of the loan the fedais and "irregulars" in the Persian army are to be disbanded. This we take it, means that Yezim, the extremely trustworthy officer who was responsible for checking the ex-Shah's recent raid, is to be cashiered. Perhaps he, like Mr. Shuster, suffered from a dangerous loyalty and honesty. If he had aided and abetted the ex-Shah he might to-day be even as the successful M. Mornard. The excellent force which he organised is not trusted by Russia. Then Persia is to establish "a small regular army," and, adds Sir Edward Grey, "it might be that Russian officers would be employed in the Persian army." We are sure of it. The scheme is clear. Russia may not advance her own army to occupy Teheran, but Russian officers will control and direct a native army, just as English officers control and direct the native army in Egypt. It will be a not less effective, though considerably less expensive, method than the actual maintenance of Russian garrisons. What may we ask, in that case, will be the attitude of the British Foreign office? Will it consent to the operation, in the British "sphere," of a Persian force officered by Russians? Or shall we have a Persian army in the south officered by Englishmen? That would be open dismemberment, whilst the former arrangement means that there will be established a virtual Russian Occupation. Already, of course, by his action in the Stokes and Lecoffre affairs, Sir Edward Grey has conceded that no British subject may hold any Government post in the Persian capital if Russia objects. For the capital is in the Russian "sphere." Now the Persian army is to be Russianised.

It is scarcely possible to comment on this betrayal. There is only one attempt at a plausible defence by Sir Edward Grey. He constantly argues that without the Anglo-Russian Agreement the situation of Persia would be worse. Professor Browne has shown in a letter which we reproduce elsewhere, the errors and misstatements of fact which Sir Edward Grey makes on that head. But assuming, for the purpose of argument that it were true that without the Anglo-Russian Agreement Russia would have sought to occupy Persia, is that any reason why England should aid and assist her and assume a joint responsibility for her action? Because you believe your neighbour will certainly be robbed must you make a compact with his robber? As a matter of fact, we know that Sir Edward Grey could have saved Persia had he chosen. He could very quickly intervene a few months ago and mobilise his diplomacy and his military forces to prevent Germany getting a foothold in Morocco, or getting certain territory on the Congo, or whatever it was that was then obscurely in dispute. Equally easily could he have prevented Russian aggression on Persia. If he had failed, it would at least have been an honourable failure. Rather he has chosen to make himself an accomplice and he must accept a joint responsibility for the crime—(Edg.)

The Meaning of Persian "Independence."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "NATION."

SIR,—In a previous communication I gave reasons for believing that the Spring-Rice Memorandum of September 4, 1907, which says that the Anglo-Russian Agreement is "based on a guarantee of Persian independence," and that the object of the two Powers was "not in any way to attack, but rather to assure for ever, the independence of Persia," cannot now be repudiated. It is in honour binding on this country. That it was unofficial in form, and that, by the strangest oversight, it was for four years unknown to the Foreign Office, are facts which do not affect its validity, and although it would be wrong to attach too precise a value to particular phrases in an unofficial document, it is clear that the Memorandum as a whole must be taken as a general expression of our policy towards Persia at the time the Agreement was signed.

But the Memorandum does not stand alone. It was followed, as Sir Edward Grey has pointed out, by a Joint Note, presented in the names both of Russia and Great Britain, informing the Persian Government officially of the nature and objects of the Agreement. In substance, this Note, which we are told "is the only official interpretation," differs very little from the unofficial Memorandum of Sir

Cecil Spring-Rice. It is shorter, and perhaps less explicit; but its language is hardly less strong:—"The two Governments," it says, "mutually agree to the strict independence and integrity of Persia." . . . "The sole object of the arrangement is the avoidance of any cause of misunderstanding on the ground of Persian affairs between the two contracting parties." . . . "The two States in signing the arrangement, have steadfastly kept in view the fundamental principle that the independence and integrity of Persia should be respected absolutely."

What language, it may be asked, could be more conclusive? And, at first sight, it seems surprising that Sir Edward Grey, while cheerfully accepting this "official" interpretation of the Agreement, should take any exception to quotations being made from the earlier and unofficial document.

But there is, perhaps, a reason for this difference. Neither in the Agreement itself nor in the official interpretation of it is there anything to define the meaning of the word "independence," or to indicate what the Powers really had in mind when they said that the independence of Persia was the fundamental principle of their Agreement. And the omission is an important one. For what is the meaning that Sir Edward Grey now gives the word? It was an independence, he says, that was "conditioned" by Russian influence. "When you talk about the independence of Persia, you must bear in mind that at the time of the signing of the Anglo-Russian Agreement, Persian independence was already conditioned by Russian influence in the North of Persia." This "influence"—so his argument runs—was diminished, and in part destroyed, by the Persian Revolution. It is, therefore, open to Russia to regain it—apparently by any and every means she can—and it would be "inconsistent," he tells us, on the part of Great Britain to attempt to prevent her doing so. The two ultimatums of last November, the expulsion of Mr. Shuster—a man who had the full confidence of the Persian Government, the imposing on them of Monsieur Mornard, in spite of their protests, the destruction of the Persian Parliament, the overrunning of the Northern towns by Russian troops, the hangings and barbarities at Tabriz and Resht, the disbanding of the native volunteers, and the enrolment of a new force under Russian officers—all these, and other similar acts, which the British Government have supported, become, on this argument, justifiable and necessary. They are in no sense inconsistent with Persian independence. They merely enforce the condition of it. They enable Russia to recover the influence she is presumed to have lost.

It is a plausible and ingenious argument, but it has one grave defect. It takes no account of the Spring-Rice Memorandum, or of the quotations given on this point, both from M. Tsvolsky and Sir Edward Grey. From these it is perfectly clear that the independence which they professed to contemplate was not a conditioned independence at all, but independence in the natural and obvious sense of the word. Neither of the two Powers was to intervene in Persian affairs "unless injury is inflicted on the persons or property of their subjects." Persia henceforth might "employ all her powers in internal reforms," including, it might have been thought, the forcible deposition of a corrupt and tyrannical ruler. She was to be "for ever delivered from the fear of foreign intervention, and would thus be perfectly free to manage her own affairs in her own way." If words like these have any meaning, they destroy the very foundation of Sir Edward Grey's argument. The value of the Spring-Rice Memorandum is not that it goes beyond the official declaration, but that it expresses the same meaning in full and clear language, which cannot now be explained away.

From this it is clear that the policy of respecting Persian independence ourselves, and of requiring that Russia should do so, too, is not merely a policy dictated by British interests, as they have been understood for the last hundred years, but it is a policy to which we are definitely pledged, both by the terms of the joint Official Note, and by the unmistakable language of our own Minister at Teheran. To suggest that the independence of which the Note speaks is meaningless, or that Sir Cecil Spring-Rice's explanation has no validity, are mere evasive devices, too transparent to deceive anyone who takes the trouble to inquire into the case, and it may be hoped that they will now be dropped.

For the moment it must be admitted that it seems very like mockery to speak of Persian independence at all. The events of last November, of which the full effects are only now being felt, have pretty well destroyed what was left of it. But the outer form is still there, and if the Government are prepared even now to stand by their pledges—and thus incidentally to secure British interests—they will use their influence in undoing some of the harm that has been done, and allowing for the revival—however slowly—of a free and undivided State.—Yours, &c.,

PHILIP MORRELL.

News of the Week.

Reuter wires from Ierim on the 2nd.—The Italians have given notice of blockade from April 1st of the ports of Lohia and Camaran, an important international pilgrim station.

The Italians have cut the cable between Camaran and the mainland. They have also captured and taken to Masowah a small British steamer, Woodcock.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Rome, March 12

Two battalions of Infantry with a mountain battery were attacked at Tobruk yesterday morning by a large force of Turks and Arabs, while covering the operations of a company of Sappers engaged in the construction of a new fort. The enemy were driven back by successive bayonet charges and the mountain battery, aided by the guns of the fort, completed their defeat. The Italian losses were one officer and 12 soldiers killed and three officers and 70 soldiers wounded.

Rome, March 13

General Bricola, commanding at Benghazi, being informed yesterday morning that two oases to the north east of Fojat were strongly occupied by the enemy, ordered General Ameglio to attack and occupy these positions. Accordingly seven battalions of infantry, together with three mountain and three field batteries, proceeded to the assault. The enemy, who numbered 6,000, were dislodged by repeated bayonet charges and left 400 dead on the field. The total Turkish loss is estimated at 1,000. In nearly every case death was due to bayonet wounds, one small portion of the field alone yielding 91 bodies killed by this arm. The Italian losses were 3 officers and 26 soldiers killed and 7 officers and 55 soldiers wounded.

At Tripoli two dirigibles made a flight beyond Zanzur over the enemy's encampment at Zavia. From a height of 1,500 metres 25 bombs were dropped into the enemy's camp, causing great slaughter and confusion. The damage was plainly apparent from the dirigibles.

The news of the victory at Benghazi gave rise to a demonstration of patriotic enthusiasm in the Chamber this afternoon. In a brief speech General Spingardi, the Minister of War, recalled the recent successes of the Italian arms at Honi on February 27, at Derna on March 3, at Tobruk on March 11 and now again at Benghazi. This last was the most complete victory of them all and testified most strongly to the able preparation of the Italian commanders and the valour and discipline of the troops. The President of the Chamber, Signor Marcora, replied, sending a salute to the victorious troops.

In announcing the Italian victory at Benghazi to the Chamber, General Spingardi, Minister of War, said:—

"Yesterday at Benghazi the sun of victory, more resplendent than ever, shone forth again upon our arms which achieved a complete victory, all the more manifest from the enormous losses of the enemy. Our possession of the whole coast of Libya has thus once again been consecrated by the blood of our heroes and the victory of our arms. Let us, therefore, send a grateful greeting to all those fighting for our country."—(Reuter)

Constantinople, March 13.

The Ministry of War announces the receipt of a telegram from Edhem Pasha, Commander of the Turco-Arab forces in Benghazi, reporting an important Turkish success at Tobruk. The message says:—

"After fighting, which lasted for 11 hours, the Italians were driven out of their positions and retreated to their ships. The Italian casualties are estimated at 2,000. The Turco-Arab losses were heavy. They include a number of Arab women who were supplying the troops with ammunition and provisions. It is also stated that the Italians have evacuated Ain Zara, in the Tripoli district. This announcement, coupled with the reported Turkish success at Tobruk, has produced the best possible impression in Turkish circles, although the failure of Italy to score a decisive victory in Tripoli is regarded as increasing the probability of the extension of the operations to the Aegean Sea."—(Reuter.)

Vienna, March 13

Telegrams announcing the presence of Italian warships off Salonika have engendered rumours here that Italian naval operations will be undertaken there or in the vicinity. These rumours find little credit in competent quarters.

Severe fighting is reported from Tobruk, where a vigorous Turco-Arab attack was repulsed on Monday by the Italians, with considerable loss on both sides. Reuter's Rome correspondent telegraphs that the official account published there yesterday says that the Italians had 1 officer and 12 men killed and 3 officers and 70 men wounded. The losses of the enemy are described as "enormous."

The Turkish Ministry of War announces the receipt of a telegram from Edhem Pasha, the commander of the Turco-Arab forces at Benghazi, reporting an important Turkish success at Tobruk. The message says that on Monday the Turkish and Arab forces compelled the Italians to retreat on their entrenchments or to take refuge on board their ships. The Turks captured a number of rifles, a quantity of ammunition, and one prisoner. The losses of the Turks and Arabs were 18 killed and 68 wounded.

It is also stated at Constantinople that the Italians have evacuated Ainzaia near Tripoli.

(By Alan Ostler, "Express" Special Correspondent with the Turkish Forces in Tripoli.)

TURKISH HEAD-QUARTERS

Via D-hibat, March 13

The Italians have been forced to evacuate Ainzaia completely. They were continually harassed by night attacks and the majority of the troops retreated some time ago. On the night of March 9 the Ottoman troops attacked the remainder of the garrison and succeeded in reaching the Italian commissariat depôt at Ainzaia, which was set on fire. The Italians, believing the attack to be general, hurriedly withdrew, after shelling the Turkish force without effect.

(FROM THE "DAILY EXPRESS")

Wholly conflicting versions of the battle near Benghazi are given in telegrams issued at Rome and Constantinople.

According to the Italian account, there were at least 6,000 Turks and Arabs, supported by artillery, while the Italian force included seven battalions of infantry, three mountain and two field batteries, and some cavalry.

The Italians claim to have successfully executed a flanking movement which enabled them to pursue masses of Turks and Arabs beyond two oases and to bayonet many fugitives. They found 400 bodies in the oases, 91 being in one place. All had been bayoneted. The Turks are said to have lost over a thousand men killed and many more wounded, whereas the Italian casualties are given as only 3 officers and 26 soldiers killed and 7 officers and 55 soldiers wounded.

On the other hand, Edhem Pasha, the Commander of the Turco-Arab forces at Benghazi, had telegraphed to Constantinople that the Turks scored an important success and that the Italians were driven out of their positions after eleven hours' fighting, being forced to retreat to their ships. He estimates the Italian casualties at 2,000.

Edhem Pasha admits that the Turco-Arab losses were heavy. They included a number of Arab women who supplied the troops with ammunition and provisions. The Arab levees were commanded by one of the Senussi Sheikh's lieutenants.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN")

The Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung states that the Government is taking extensive measure in all places which could be attacked by the Italian navy for the prevention of anti-Christian disturbances. In Constantinople especially the measures are on a large scale. The police have been considerably strengthened, and the whole city has been divided into sections in order better to cope with eventualities. Both the police and the gendarmerie daily receive special instruction on how to deal with a popular rising.

It is reported from Adana that a number of bedjas are going about inciting the population against the Italians. The Government has telegraphed an order to the Vali to arrest the agitators.

(FROM THE "DAILY NEWS.")

The Sheikh of the Senussi has sent to the Porte the following message:—

"I have been informed that the Great Powers are trying to force Turkey to conclude peace with Italy. I know by experience that Turkey has no means to assist us in an effective manner in the defence of our country and that in truth Turkey is not at war with Italy.

"Nevertheless, we are proud of having shed our blood in defence of Turkey and of Islam. I say, therefore, that if the Porte listens to the Powers and betrays us to the infidels, nothing will prevent us from proclaiming a new Khalifate which will better defend the power and the honour of Islam."

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

M. Pierre Baudin, recently reporter on the Franco-German Treaty in the French Senate, writes an article in the Sicile on the situation in Persia, in which, while obviously trying to be indulgent "to the silly and to the friend," he passes some criticism on the terms which Russia and England are believed to be trying to impose on the Persian Government. He finds the interest of 7 per cent. attached to the loan too high, considering that the loan is amply secured on the Customs revenue. Next "the amnesty indiscriminately accorded to the partisans of the ex-Shah and to the robbers who have indulged in all sorts of excesses in the course of the recent political troubles cannot fail to encourage the latter in recommencing their profitable expeditions." The Note," M. Baudin adds, "also speaks of the licence of the irregular troops. But these are the troops which have twice saved the Constitutional régime in Persia, and it will perhaps be imprudent to disband them before a new Parliament is elected and a regular army is organised." With reference to the latter M. Baudin observes, "The Note does not state that its officers will be taken from foreign armies, and yet it is desirable that these troops should be so organised as not to appear to constitute a direct threat to Turkey."

(FROM THE "EGYPT")

According to a report in a Cairo paper, the Sheikh el Senussi has left Kufra at the head of a large army to fight the Italians, including a great number of negroes who have gained experience as soldiers in the wars against the French in Wadai. The Senussi forces, it is said, are extremely well provided with arms and provisions.

The War in Tripoli.

[FROM THE "TANIN"]

(Specially translated for the "Comrade.")

FOUR months ago, when I had left Constantinople for Tirabulus-ul-Gharb, I was a pessimist. The news that had reached us was indefinite, contradictory, the situation undefined, and public opinion nervous. And I must confess here that I had entered the theatre of war with the belief that I should find misery, lack of organisation and order in Tripolitaine.

I remained there for two and a half months and observed without any restraint the most important points and positions of the seat of war. I had intimate intercourse with our officers, and specially with the Arab Mujahids. I had the good fortune to witness to the minutest details some engagements and battles. All these observations and investigations contributed in an increasing degree every day to belie my pessimism, and to-day I return from Tripoli a perfect optimist and in complete confidence of the future.

It is over a month now that I left Aziza the head-quarters of the commandant in Tirabulus-ul-Gharb. As a general statement, I shall here say that the prevailing spirit there was most excellent. Everyone was happy and contented, doing his duty and waiting impatiently for the next battle in order to win glory in it. And the most noticeable thing on our side was a general feeling of confidence, which is such a great operative for success. This was entirely absent in the Italians.

That big Italian Army of at least sixty thousand men equipped according to the latest theories of the science of war is there, lowering its head before our soldiers and the brave Arab Mujahids; perplexed as to what to do, impotent to advance, ashamed to go back. For the last three months it is their enduring torture and shame, powerless to put its aggressive robbers' foot in the haem of our country, and unwilling to return to its den. It is waiting to get its deserts.

The situation of the enemy to-day is exactly the same as took shape after the battle of Ain Zara on 22nd November.

This battle had resulted in our having to leave Ain Zara and opening a new chapter in the operations. After two months of fighting, the Italians, after a tremendous expenditure of money and life, could only take Ain Zara—which has again been captured by us—a place not more than ten kilometres from the town of Tripoli.

This success of the Italians, on which the Italian newspapers are incessantly harping—was in reality a success for them, and who profited by it? The Italians,—military toys—dared thus to put themselves out of the protection of their most valuable asset—the fleet. That is to say, after the battle of Ain Zara the aspect of war was changed. The shells of the enemy's powerful fleet guns did not drop on our tents which were now out of their range. This was fatal to the Italians. The Italian soldier in whose blood a single microbe of valour or of any other military quality cannot live, simply turned into a thing made of wood or stone, as soon as he was out of the protection of artillery of the fleet. He displayed such fear that our Mujahids were really angry with him. Facts, the military situation and their own reluctant admissions prove my statements more than any words of mine.

Spurred by shame, the Italians, after Ain Zara, indulged in some desperate aggressive movements. There did take place some small and some relatively big and really smart engagements such as those of Bir Tobras, Qirj Qaresb but the Italians always emerged out of these engagements worse than they went in and showed that their morale had descended to below zero. These engagements did not, and could not change the military situation on both sides. For us it was a safe position to be out of the reach of their naval guns. But in reality, success was on our side. These three months' encounters resulting in material and moral losses to the enemy, invariably strengthened the morale of our men. They brought a sense of confidence to every man, and added to his pluck, a feeling of obedience to discipline. And last of all, these encounters created such a feeling of comradeship among our warriors as nothing could shake.

You can take in the whole situation from the following—

It is three months now that the Italians are wedged in the tract from the town of Tripoli, to Qirj Qaresb fortifications running parallel to the sea shore and from there to a triangle of about 8 or 10 kilometres to Ain Zara. The number of their troops is 50,000 or 60,000 or perhaps as they themselves say 80,000. Now these hundreds of thousands of mouths want to be fed every day, to be clothed, to be treated, the ammunition of rifles and artillery so lavishly expended to be replenished, in fine all these things are necessary and over them and above them all, hundreds of thousands, aye, millions of francs are required daily to provide these things. Three months have passed thus and the Italians believe more than we do that three years, if they stayed on will pass like this. The daily occurrences have demoralised them so much that not a trace of grit is left in them. Our Mujahids are standing like a wall of iron before them. . . . And if they advance, it is because of their officers who lash them to it. In no direction do they see salvation. Such is the position of the Italian Army. Confidence, obedience to authority, and unity have vanished from among them. I have heard of and seen Italian officers threatening their soldiers with revolver and sword and thus driving them to battle.

On our side the aspect is quite different, I wish to write fully about it, but it should be here sufficient to say that the opposite of what I have said about the enemy is true of our men. There is no exaggeration in this. The unity, the valour, the enthusiasm of our men are at their highest. When they talk of Italians they ridicule them and laugh at them. In their opinion the meaning of the word Italian is one who flees, one who surrenders, one who tears. And their highest amusement is to play with the Italian toys who are very sensitive lest they get broken. We have got everything in Tripoli. When I say that I know what everything means, and I ask my readers to understand that Camel loads of provisions are brought to us continuously. I can say that our Government, since its decline, never entered upon a war so well provisioned. Specially during the last two or three months we have been exceptionally well stocked. And the Italians have not given small help in this matter. Every man in Tirabulus to-day is in possession of something taken from the Italians. This is the position in Tripoli to-day, and it is for this reason that I have returned an optimist from Tripoli.

Italy Burns Her Last Cartridge.

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURC.")

(Specially translated for the "Comrade.")

ITALY has reached her last resources. Rendered powerless at Tripoli, not daring for the past five months to take a single step forward, having imprisoned 150,000 soldiers in the fortifications and covered with shame, she has at last recourse to intimidation directed rather against the Powers than against Turkey, with which she threatened them for a long time. A handful of brave Ottoman warriors force the Italians to acts of cowardice which at the end will have no other result but to bring to light their unworthiness and to provoke general horror and the farcical scene of the opening of the Italian Chambers, the popular manifestations organized beforehand, the grotesque greetings sent by the President of the Italian Chamber to an army which up to date has had no victories other than flight and defeat. The ridiculous tone of the Italian papers which compare to ancient Rome the Italy of to-day, which owes its existence and its life to French pity, the heroism of the Italian fleet, which blockades ports and throws projectiles into towns undefended and without fortifications, all this proves that the Italians exasperated to the last degree wish to play a trick on the world. To begin with they wish to intimidate the Great Powers. In fact from the very beginning of the war, they put their hope in these Powers, they counted especially on the friendly allied Powers to press their friendly intervention on our Government, making it accept the annexation as an accomplished fact. But that did not succeed. Not that the friendly Powers or allies failed in their duty of giving friendly advice to the Ottoman

Government, but solely because the Ottomans, indignant at this unjust attack and this violent insolence undertaken without any pretext, have categorically opposed all ideas of mediation. Deceived in her hope on that side, Italy shortly after conceived the project not of asking the Powers but of forcing them to intervene. It threatened them, in spite of their previous engagements, to carry the war into the Ottoman waters, to blockade our coasts and to bombard our ports. It was a threat directed against the commerce and industry of the Powers, and the Italians had cleverly chosen the weak points of European psychology. The Powers, in fact, intervened, and this time in their own interest, but the Ottoman Government made them understand that it was not Turkey that prejudiced their interest, that it was not she that attacked anybody, but when attacked, outraged and wounded without cause or pretext, she was only exercising her natural right of defending herself, and that this right is so holy and so indefeasible, that not only the Powers but God Himself could not deprive her of it. Besides, in the name of what principle of international right or of war could they be forced to accept the conditions of peace proposed by Italy? The latter wishes to conquer Tripoli. Well let her conquer it. If, for the annexation of a country, it sufficed to make gulling declarations like those of the King of Italy, then Turkey would only have to declare that China and America have been annexed to her possessions. Would the Powers then be so unjust as to compel a Power which has been attacked and insulted unjustly to accept conditions of peace, dictated by an enemy who is constantly being repulsed? The Powers could not but lean towards so just and so well founded a reasoning on the part of the Ottoman Government. They understood that it was not at Constantinople they were to safeguard their threatened commercial interests, but at Rome. They therefore addressed themselves to Rome, advising the Italian Government to limit their military actions to Tripoli and to try and make an effort for a real conquest. Italy pretended to listen to these Powers, she redoubled her activity in Tripoli and sent her new expeditionary corps. But the greater activity she showed the more she increased her forces and the more her impotence became manifest. At each sally her soldiers were defeated. The army of 150,000 men which she has concentrated in Tripoli resembles an immense flock of sheep, which each time that they try to come out of the fold receive blows from a stick, and bewildered and maddened they are forced to retreat to the fold. What is most disheartening and most galling to the Italians is, that one does not even know when this situation, which may last indefinitely, may end. And yet Italy has to feed and maintain this immense army, use her fleet, endure the stoppage of her commerce and the financial and economic crisis. Will she be able to resist long? This is the terrible question put to the statesmen of Italy and which they in their turn put to the King of Italy. To save their position, they have decided to run all risks. The last of these adventures is to fight through their pockets and threaten their commerce by carrying the war into the Ottoman waters. In the bombardment of Beyrouth, the foreign countries have mostly suffered. This reason is simple. They are chosen expressly as objects of destruction so as to provoke in Europe a general anxiety, a movement in favour of the intervention of the Powers for the conclusion of peace. But we can assure the statesmen of Italy that even if Europe intervenes in this way, she would not find in Turkey a Government that would dare to accept peace under the conditions laid down by Italy. If there is a public opinion in Italy, there is also one in Turkey. The latter is not loud, nor demonstrative, but outraged in its deepest sentiments by a shameful and causeless attack, it would not suffer any Government that would submit to this blow. Italy can boast easily of her heroism at sea, she can continue to attack our ports and to blockade them, but this will not influence the issue of the war. These cowardly acts of the enemy will only increase the scorn that the Ottomans feel for them and the ardour to continue the war to the bitter end.

It will only end when Italy will have effectively conquered Tripoli and come to fight with us on land. Then no peace, no reconciliation!

An Interview with an Italian Prisoner.

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURC.")

(Specially Translated for the "Comrade.")

THE war correspondent of the journal Al-Afkar sends the following interview he had with an Italian prisoner at Derna, named Natali Monipelme. The correspondent writes: I met this prisoner in the tent of the Red Crescent. He is a young man of 28 years, intelligent looking and speaks only Italian. The conversation took place between us by means of an interpreter. Here it is as it took place between the prisoner and myself.

Q. Are you comfortable?

A. Yes.

Q. How is that since you are the enemy's prisoner?

A. It is true that I am a prisoner, but it is as if I was at home. I live, I eat and I drink with my enemies as they live, eat and drink. Besides the Pascha (Enver Bey) has just made me a present of a ring of Italian origin. I thank him for it and also for his kind treatment to me. If I had known that I would have been treated so well I would have come over with at least half of the Italian army and joined the Arabs.

Q. Why so, and would your comrades have accepted?

A. No doubt, for we do not care to fight with people who have done us no harm, and besides we do not love war.

Q. I have noticed that the Italian troops in many instances have fled before us. Why is that, since you are more numerous than ourselves, better equipped, prepared for a long time for this conquest, whilst we have been taken unawares, have neither a fleet to defend us, nor a fort to shelter us?

A. It is quite true that our soldiers do not care to fight. They are forced to go out against the Arabs. Their morale is completely lost, and you know that morale is much more important than the number of the troops. On the other side, it must not be forgotten that the Italians fight in a strange country and that the people are full of religious fanaticism.... Courage is wanting in the troops except with the officers, and that is why the losses amongst the latter are so numerous. At the rate things are getting on and if our officers continue to expose themselves on the battlefield, Italy will have no more officers left.

Q. You say that we are led in our struggle by religious fanaticism. Do you forget that you are placed in the same way and that the Pope has blessed you before your departure?

A. It is true, but it has not succeeded in creating in us what we lack, I mean moral strength.

Q. They say that your soldiers spend their nights on board the warships. Is it true?

A. It is so, because we fear an attack from the Arabs during the night—as it is we do not know our way in the day, what would it be during the night?

Q. Is there any trouble in your country, do you believe that that the people will end by forcing the Italian Government to end the war as they did in the war against Abyssinia?

A. At the moment when I left Italy there were some troubles but since then I do not know what has happened. It is possible that at the end the people will rise against the Government if the war continues without success, for on account of it business is at a stand-still.

Q. How do you treat the prisoners?

A. If they are Arabs they are executed, if they are regulars they are sent to Italy.

Q. How do you treat the people of Derna?

A. The inhabitants are obliged to be in doors from sunset till next morning. Those who are found carrying arms are hung. In doubtful cases they are exiled to Naples.

Q. About how many have been executed lately?

A. About 800 to 900 between hanging and expulsion.

Intervention.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Rome, March 10.

YESTERDAY evening the Councillor of the Russian Embassy, acting for the Ambassador, who was indisposed, paid a visit to the Foreign Minister at the Consulta and inquired upon what terms Italy would be willing to accept the friendly mediation of the Powers in favour of the cessation of hostilities. In this step he was followed in succession by the Ambassadors of France, Great Britain, Germany and Austria-Hungary. According to an official communication the Foreign Minister reserves his reply.

The Ministerial Tribuna remarks that it is its duty to register this overture made by five Powers on the initiative of Russia, but that it cannot conceal its own conviction that Italy will do well to push energetically her military operations. The Italian public and Press would be wise not to put too much confidence in these diplomatic negotiations nor entertain sanguine hopes of peace.

This is the first collective action taken by the Powers towards mediation between the belligerent countries. Whether it will succeed or not depends chiefly on their subsequent action in Constantinople. The one irreducible condition made by Italy—namely, absolute Italian sovereignty over Tripoli and Cyrenaica—is so well known that it is not conceivable that it should be ignored in these overtures. Outside that it is, of course, possible that concessions may be made which would help to conciliate Turkish opinion, but in the present temper of the Italian public those concessions will have to be of very moderate nature to gain consideration here.

Paris, March 12.

No reply to the inquiries of Russia and the other Great Powers with regard to Italian terms of peace has yet been received here. These inquiries, which I understand represent the result of the direct Russian initiative in this matter, are naturally confined in the strictest sense within the limits of those four offers which were contemplated in The Hague Conventions. They can in no way compromise the neutrality of any of the Powers which have associated themselves in this action, and they fulfil the essential condition which Great Britain, as well as France, is believed to have postulated—that all the Powers should act together and in the same sense. It depends, I am told, on the nature of Italy's reply whether the Powers will consider it worth while to transmit that reply to Constantinople. In well-informed unofficial quarters not much hope is entertained at this stage of any basis, however slight, for peace negotiations. In Italy, as in Turkey, public opinion ties the hands of the Government.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN")

The Constantinople correspondent of the Journal des Debats sends a useful reminder through his paper of the actualities of the position in which Russia has thought proper to revive the idea of mediation. "Turkey," he says, "has every advantage in defying mediation of all sorts. The price of good offices which she never asked has only too often been paid to her in a coin which has no currency on the market, and which has only enriched her by some bitter experience." Turkey, therefore, looks with suspicion on all attempts at mediation—especially when proceeding from Russia.

"It is difficult," says the correspondent, "to defend here the claim of disinterestedness which Russia is putting forward on the present occasion. People are too little accustomed here to regard Russia as capable of taking account of the amour propre of the Ottoman Empire, or for that matter of its right to exist. I have met here many people who regard her as an accomplice of Italy, bent upon exhausting means of mediation which have no chance of success in order thus to justify an attack upon the Dardanelles, which will then permit her to raise the question of the Straits and to solve it to her advantage." All that Turkey asks is to be left alone. Time is on her side, and will enable her, as she hopes, to reconquer the two African provinces. "This hope," says the correspondent, "was not in existence at the beginning of the war—it was born out of the impotence of the Italian effort, and we see it growing every day under our eyes."

The subject of mediation is also dealt with by the Temps in a leading article devoted to a refutation of Signor Curiemi, the well-known Italian deputy, who complained the other day in the Stampa, of Milan, that France and England, by extending the offer of mediation to Rome, had transformed the Russian proposals into a démarche in favour of Turkey, thus ignoring the "accomplished facts" in Tripoli and Cyrenaica, and breaking (so far as France was concerned) the diplomatic engagements entered into with regard to Tripoli. The Temps makes very light of the "accomplished facts" in Africa, which are nothing but dreams, and as for diplomatic engagements, it denies that they meant anything more than mere désintéressement or implied any diplomatic or other assistance. The Italian publicists, remarks the Paris journal, live by phantoms, and only create "uneasiness and resentments."

The latest step undertaken by the Powers with a view to mediation between Turkey and Italy has left the semi-official Tribuna of Rome to define once more the standpoint of the Italian Government. Complete Italian sovereignty over Tripoli and Cyrenaica, full religious liberty for the natives, including the recognition of the spiritual authority of the Sultan, a general amnesty to the "rebels," a suitable indemnity to Turkey—these are the conditions which the Tribuna, in anticipation of the official reply of the Marquis di San Giuliano, puts forward as the sole basis acceptable to Italy for the conclusion of peace. The journal adds to this the usual melancholy reflections about the obstinacy of the Porte in refusing to recognise "accomplished facts" and about the dangers to the general peace of Europe that ensue from Turkey's attitude.

This declaration of the Roman journal meets with an equal censure from the two opposite camps into which Europe is divided. M. Jean Herbet, who is certainly in touch with the French diplomatic world, writing in the Siècle, observes that if the reasoning of the Tribuna really foreshadows what the Italian Cabinet is about to reply to the "pilgrimage" undertaken by the Ambassadors to the Consulta "in a spirit of clarity, but without much faith or hope," the war will no doubt continue. He says—"If Turkey were unable to defend Tripoli the Italians would have proved it by immediately advancing into the interior, but this is exactly what they cannot do. . . . If on the other hand Turkey stood to gain nothing by prolonging her resistance, the Tribuna would herself have been less anxious to fret at the inaction of Europe and to obtain the intervention of the Powers. Lastly, the peace of the world is much less threatened by the energy exhibited by Turkey—an energy which causes other would-be heirs of the 'Sick Man' to reflect—than by the impossibility of accepting a compromise in which Italy has placed herself by proclaiming the annexation of territories not yet conquered."

On its part the Vienna Foreign Office publishes through the Montags Revue the following remarkable warning.—"The neutral attitude of the central Powers has hitherto formed the rule of conduct for the whole of Europe, and their influence will also be exercised in the same direction in the future—let us hope with the same effect. Nevertheless the Italian Government must by no means absolutely rely upon desiring under all circumstances complete protection from the rigorous impartiality of its allies. If the action of the Italian navy should inflict damage upon important interests of the western Powers or of Russia it may give rise to protests and even retaliatory measures which Austria-Hungary and Germany would not be able to prevent. The danger of a European intervention against Italy has passed, but it will be well for Rome to remember that such considerations as recently determined the London Cabinet to suggest intervention have by no means disappeared."

Constantinople, March 12.

It is stated that the attempted mediation of the Powers in the war has failed completely. —(Exchange)

The Dardanelles.

(FROM THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH" VIENNA CORRESPONDENT)

In authoritative circles here it is believed that the intervention of the Powers having proved ineffectual, the Italian fleet will probably undertake action against the Dardanelles. It is supposed that the outer forts of Scud el Hahr and Kum Kalesi will first be bombarded. The prospects of the Italians are regarded as not unfavourable, because their naval artillery is excellent. It is also considered possible that after silencing the forts Italian troops may be landed to form a base for future operations. A high official in Vienna remarked that it is doubtful whether the Italian Government will be able to withstand the public opinion that will be created by such action.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople, March 8.

I understand that the Governors and military commandants at the Turkish seaports on the Mediterranean have received instructions authorising them to take all necessary defensive measures in the event of the appearance of Italian warships. Further artillery and infantry reinforcements are being despatched to the Dardanelles. The recent attack on Turkish vessels at Beirut and the fact that Italian cruisers have been sighted at several points in the Aegean in the course of the last ten days seem to have inspired these precautions.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN")

According to a Constantinople telegram the Governor of the Dardanelles has just informed the Consuls of the Powers that from to-day both steam and sailing ships are forbidden to navigate the straits outside a channel specially marked by buoys which begins off Harussen Point, on the European coast.

A Lloyd's Dardanelles message says that the straits are mined, and Government tugs will henceforth accompany passing vessels.

The following semi-official note was published at Rome—"Some newspapers have announced that there are Italian warships in the Aegean Sea. This statement is absolutely incorrect"—(Reuter)

(FROM THE "DAILY NEWS")

Mr. F. Grey has received from the British Ambassador at Constantinople a communication to the following effect—

"A notice has been issued by the Porte forbidding the passage of the Dardanelles by night from 6th March for all merchant vessels."

His Majesty's Vice Consul at the Dardanelles reports that since Sunday contact mines have been placed in the Straits, that a channel marked by buoys will be left, and that at least two pilot ships will be meeting vessels from each direction.

Vienna, March 12.

In military circles here it is believed that the bombardment by Italy of the Karaburnu forts, guarding the approach to Salonika, is imminent. Information received here shows that the Turks have about twenty-five thousand men available in this locality, while the entrance to the harbour at Salonika, is guarded by a triple line of mines.

Naples, March 12.

Advices received here appear to indicate that the entire Italian fleet, with the exception of the reserve squadron and the battleship Regina Margherita is now in the Aegean Sea. It is suggested that the first action to be taken will be the occupation of a port or an island near the Dardanelles to serve as a base.

There is a rumour that in the matter of action against the Dardanelles Italy is acting in agreement with Russia.—(Central News)

The Board of Trade have received a notification from the Foreign Office to the effect that the Turkish Government on the 10th instant began to lay contact mines for the defence of the Dardanelles. It is assumed that the work has now been completed. A channel marked by bouys will be left and at least two pilot ships will meet ships from each direction.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Paris, March 13.

The probability of Italian operations against Samos appears to be quite unfounded. There is reason to believe that at the beginning of the war the Italian Government gave an express assurance of its intention to respect the neutrality of Samos in accordance with the status of the island as defined in the Sultan's Firman of 1832 with the assent of the three protecting Powers, Great Britain, France and Russia. It is not regarded as improbable, however, that the Italians may decide to operate against other islands in the Ægean.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN")

The Neu Freie Presse of Vienna published last week an authoritatively worded Note to the effect that Great Britain had approached the Great Powers with a proposal to undertake a collective démarche at Rome with a view to preventing any action of the Italian navy on the Asiatic or European coasts of Turkey. The Note added that the proposal had met with the opposition of Germany and Austria-Hungary, which regarded any such interference with the movements of the Italian navy as a breach of neutrality.

The news has been stoutly denied in the Italian press, but a Berlin telegram to the Kölnische Zeitung confirms it, merely adding that not only the allies of Italy but also France received the proposal unfavourably.

As against this it is interesting to place on record the "denial" given to the statement by the often inspired Rome correspondent of the Temps. "In diplomatic quarters," he says, "absolutely nothing has been heard of the alleged initiative of the British Government," and "it is certain that Sir Rennell Rodd, the British Ambassador in Rome, has never spoken to the Italian Government on the subject of the limitation of naval operations." A personage of "high authority," though not actually a member of the Government, has assured him that the Vienna report is merely a "new piece of bluff having for its aim to embroil Italy with the Triple Entente." The impression, says this anonymous informant, who may be looked for in the vicinity of the French Embassy at Rome, "the impression produced by the present diplomatic situation is that the greatest obstacles to a solution of the Italo-Turkish conflict emanate from the allies of Italy. It is with a view to neutralising the bad effect produced on Italian public opinion by this attitude that the Austrian bluff of a British démarche to which Germany and Austria are said to be opposed has been invented. The truth, on the contrary, is that if Berlin and Vienna had shown a little more goodwill peace would have been on the best road to realisation."

It is certainly a pity that the Rome correspondent and his informant have not read the important Corriere della Sera, which, while denying the accuracy of the Vienna statement, says that "all that England has done was to inquire of the European Cabinets if an understanding with Italy (on the subject of her naval action) would be useful." The Milan organ then breaks out in reproaches against Europe, which "would prefer an inactive Italy, without energy and averse to colonial enterprise, to a recuperated one disturbing the plans of other Powers and threatening to upset the balance in the Mediterranean." It may be noted that the official denial issued by the Stefani Agency does not touch the point. It states that no steps have been taken by any Government at Rome in order to limit the naval operations, whereas the information published at Vienna refers to an exchange of views between the European Cabinets set on foot by Great Britain.

M. Tcharykoff.

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

St. Petersburg, March 11.

The oft rumoured recall of M. Tcharykoff is an accomplished fact. His appointment as Senator is something in the nature of a disgrace. M. Tcharykoff's departure from Constantinople is popularly ascribed to intrigues at the Foreign Office. A more probable reason is the failure of the policy of conciliating Turkey, in which he persisted in spite of lack of encouragement from the Tsar. Just at the moment when the Powers are acting as peacemakers between Turkey and Italy the necessity for M. Tcharykoff's recall appears regrettable.

Constantinople, March 12.

The unexpected news of M. Tcharykoff's recall was at first received here with a mixture of incredulity and concern. It was afterwards confirmed by the Turkish Ambassador in St. Petersburg, who also informed the Ferté that he had received assurances from the Russian Government that its policy in Constantinople would undergo no change. These assurances have, however, not altogether allayed the apprehension caused by the news.

Vienna, March 12.

In one respect the removal of M. Tcharykoff from the Russian Embassy at Constantinople is regarded here as simplifying the outlook in the Near East. He has long been credited with a personal policy distinct from that of his Government, and, though he is not the first Russian diplomatist of whom this has been said, it is undeniable that his activity, whether laudable or blameworthy, was not calculated to deprive Russian policy of the appearance of ambiguity. Henceforth, it is supposed, the attitude of Russia towards Turkey will be clearer, but, inasmuch as the nature of M. Tcharykoff's alleged personal policy is not precisely known, doubt prevails as to the direction in which the Russian efforts will now tend.

In the Austrian Press M. Tcharykoff is taxed with Pan-Slav aims, and his removal is therefore greeted with some satisfaction. On the other hand, his friends claim that he worked for a good understanding between Russia and Turkey on the basis of the opening of the Dardanelles to Russian warships, and of the formation of a Balkan League under Russo-Turkish auspices. If this be true, his removal might imply a change of method in regard to Turkey, though not necessarily a change of object in so far as the opening of the Dardanelles is concerned. The near future may, perhaps, throw light on this not unimportant point. In the meantime it should not be forgotten that, as an authoritative Italian journal remarked last week, Russia has been the only Great Power to maintain from the beginning of the war a consistent attitude of friendship towards Italy. Neither the Russian press nor the Russian Government has allowed its bearing to be affected by the influences and incidents that have caused waverings elsewhere. No surprise need therefore be felt if the further course of events in the Near East should reveal a concordance of views and sentiments, if not indeed of action, between Russia and Italy.

Constantinople, March 12.

In Turkish circles the recall of M. Tcharykoff is generally ascribed either to the Russian Government's dissatisfaction with his conduct of the recent informal conversations with the Grand Vizier concerning the question of the Straits or to its intention to adopt a new and more imperious attitude in its dealings with the Porte. It is impossible, in the absence of any but the vaguest information concerning the nature and scope of the above mentioned conversations, to express any opinion with regard to the former theory, while the latter can only be proved or disproved by time or by the nature of the Russian Government's choice of a successor.

While by no means blind to the mistakes of the Young Turks, M. Tcharykoff held that the new régime was infinitely preferable from the European point of view to the old, and never concealed his belief that they deserved to be given a fair chance by the greater and lesser European Powers. His attitude on this point undoubtedly did something to dispel the secular Ottoman mistrust of the "Moskov" and all his works, though the Jewish and other influences to which Young Turkey has shown itself peculiarly susceptible prevented his conciliatory policy from being appreciated as much as it deserved. Similarly his advocacy of a better understanding between Turkey and the Balkan States and between the Balkan States themselves was misinterpreted by Turkish Chauvinists and aroused the suspicion of those whose ambitions were likely to be adversely affected thereby, but none the less it did much to promote a Turco-Balkan détente at a moment when peace seemed likely to be jeopardized by Chauvinists on both sides of the frontier.

St. Petersburg, March 13.

The newspapers agree that M. Tcharykoff was an unsuccessful Ambassador, but entirely disapprove of the manner of his recall. Their opinion coincides with the views prevailing in diplomatic circles. M. Sazonoff, the Foreign Minister, throughout deprecated M. Tcharykoff's attitude, and suggested his transfer to another post, but the humiliation inflicted on the Ambassador is unwelcome to the Foreign Office. It is surmised that M. Tcharykoff precipitated his fall by outspoken opposition to the mediation proposals which will be collectively made at Constantinople as soon as Italy has formulated her reply. His recall implies no change in Russia's policy towards Turkey.

Vienna, March 13.

In the diplomatic circles best qualified to express an opinion upon the removal of M. Tcharykoff from the Russian Embassy in Constantinople it is suggested that, though Italy has not yet answered officially the recent joint inquiry by the Powers, the inquiry may yield a positive basis for mediation, and that in view of this possibility the Russian Government wished to be represented in Constantinople by a diplomatist of less accentuated opinions. The attitude of M. Tcharykoff is reported to have been not only Turcophil, but anti-Italian, and his estimate of the probable course of the war to have been erroneous. He is said to have believed Italy incapable of steady effort, political or financial—a mistaken conviction, derived possibly from his own short and one-sided experience of Italy as Minister to the Vatican during the years immediately following the Abyssinian campaign of 1895-96.

St. Petersburg, March 14.

It is understood that M. de Giers, the Russian Minister to Roumania, will succeed M. Tcharykoff as Russian Ambassador in Constantinople.

Constantinople, March 14.

The Zurnal, in a leading article, laments the recall of M. Tcharykoff, whom it describes as the one diplomatist who succeeded in avoiding every species of dispute with the Ottoman Government. It refers in highly complimentary terms to the fact that he was the first foreign Ambassador to instruct his Consular staff to avoid an uncompromising attitude on questions connected with the capitulations and praises his tactful avoidance of a diplomatic incident by a "transformation" of the Russian Government's Note on the Malison question.

Other journals confine themselves to somewhat gloomy comments on the possibility that the recall of M. Tcharykoff forebodes an entire change of Russian policy in the Near East, and in some cases hint at an impending Austro-Russian understanding in regard to the Balkans.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

The dismissal of the Russian Ambassador at Constantinople, M. Tcharykoff—for such it is—seems to have produced a bad impression.

sion in Turkish political quarters. "People at Constantinople," says the correspondent of the Journal des Debats, "recall the similar fate of Baron Mayor des Planches, the former Italian Ambassador to the Porte, who was recalled a few months before the declaration of the war. That experienced and prudent diplomatist was, like his British and German colleagues, much upset at what he conceived to be the 'surrender of his Government to the influences of an unscrupulous intrigue,' and knowing well the difficulties of a campaign in Tripoli he repeatedly warned the Italian Government against the adventure, and for several months tried on his own responsibility to delay the fatal hour. Ultimately he fell and was disgraced. Turkish public opinion sees in the recall of M. Tcharykoff a similar sinister omen. M. Tcharykoff, too, had, ever since his appointment, pursued a conciliatory policy towards Turkey, offering a sort of protective friendship in return for the opening of the Dardanelles, and latterly championing the status quo in the Balkans. His disgrace foreshadows, then, according to Turkish conceptions of the situation, a change on the part of Russian policy. With him has disappeared the last obstacle to what is believed to be M. Sazonoff's policy of 'realisation,' and all the uneasiness which has been caused by the Russian plan for one-sided mediation will reappear."

In an editorial note introducing the above message the Journal des Debats characterises the news of M. Tcharykoff's recall as "grave," and sees in the action of the Russian Government a "sign of the dissatisfaction caused at St. Petersburg by the prudent reserve maintained by M. Tcharykoff in the mediation business." The journal adds significantly: "There is in Russian diplomacy a party which urges common action between Russia and Italy, and recommends violent pressure on the Porte in order to compel her to accept the Italian terms. M. Tcharykoff no doubt did not fail to draw the attention of his Government to the gravity of this step. His recall would seem to signify that the St. Petersburg Cabinet has decided upon a 'forward' policy."

The allusion to the party which advocates common action between Russia and Italy refers, of course, to M. Isvolsky, who, together with Signor Tittoni, his fellow-dupe in the Bosnian affair, has instigated from Paris all the recent steps of Russian diplomacy against Turkey. One can judge from the attitude of such an influential organ of the French grande bourgeoisie as the Debat, that France would not be greatly edified by an Italo-Russian co-operation against Turkey.

How bitter, indeed, is French feeling against Italy—and by implication against any assistance that could be given to her—is shown in a message which the Siècle prints from its Constantinople correspondent. Speaking of the rumours of an impending armistice, the writer asserts positively that there is absolutely no foundation for them. Turkey being more than ever determined to carry on the war to the end. "The Italians," he says, "who were at the beginning of this infamous war so badly informed as to believe that it would be a simple military promenade across Africa, are still under the same delusion, and believe that by their demarches they could impose peace at Constantinople. They will, on the contrary, only succeed in covering themselves with still greater ridicule in the eyes of Europe and the Turks. The latter, so far from thinking of making peace, are taking all possible measures to offer a terrible resistance to the Italians should they be seized with the fantastic idea of attacking the fortified ports in Europe or on the Dardanelles. The Italians ought to know that this very perilous operation may constitute for them a veritable disaster, and cause them to lose in the eyes of Europe whatever little glory the Italian navy has won by the bombardment of undefended Tripoli and Ben Ghazi."

Such language, which a "patriotic" paper like the Siècle permits to appear, is scarcely calculated to inspire much hope that a co-operation between Russia and Italy would be regarded by France with favour.

M. Jean Herbetie, writing in the Siècle on the subject of the recall of M. Tcharykoff, the Russian Ambassador at Constantinople, seems to be inclined to ascribe it on the one hand to "the cordiality which he so largely manifested towards the Turks," and on the other to "the rancour of a Minister, or former Minister" (obviously meaning thereby M. Isvolsky). He deals, however, more especially with the question of his successor, and while discussing the rumour which has designated as candidate for the vacant post M. Hartwig, formerly of Teheran and now of Belgrade, betrays clearly the point of view from which France regards the future of Russo-Turkish relations.

"While rendering," says M. Herbetie, "full justice to M. Hartwig's correct and genuinely Russian attitude at Belgrade, one has some difficulty in forgetting that he was in Persia the persistent champion of a policy hostile to the two principles which he would have to act upon in Turkey—the Anglo-Russian accord and the constitutional regime. His arrival on the shores of the Bosphorus would therefore be regarded as foreshadowing a Russo-Turkish tension and a divergence of views between St. Petersburg and London. Of course nothing shows so far that these disagreeable theories could be realised, but what will Russian diplomacy gain by allowing them to arise? Is it not enough that people at Trifia, as reported a few days ago by the Voice of Russia, have been talking about grave events impending between Russia and Turkey? Is it not enough that the Tribuna, taking its desires for realities, has announced a Russian mobilisation on the Ottoman frontier?

"If the Russian Foreign Office wants to pursue in the Near East a policy which accords with the great traditions of the Slav race it ought not to ignore the following two lessons of history. The first is that such a policy would not find encouragement in Berlin or in Vienna unless it is to cost Russia a good deal and bring her in little or nothing. The other is that cordial relations between her and Turkey and the integrity of the Ottoman Empire will be more advantageous to Russia than all the quarrels and partitions. This is a thesis expounded by Prince Kotchubey in his memorandum of 1802, it is a thesis put into practice by Nesselrode in 1839, and it is a thesis recommended as against all international action in 1870 by a man who cannot be reproached with having been the least energetic M. Tcharykoff's predecessors, namely, General Ignatieff."

The allusion to the "great traditions of the Slav race" in the Balkans and to General Ignatieff may not be quite appropriate. The warning, however, that France would not relish a new adventure of Russia in the Balkans is quite clear, and probably well founded.

(FROM THE "DAILY NEWS" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, Wednesday.

The recall of M. Tcharykoff, the Russian Ambassador at Constantinople, no doubt because he was too friendly to Turkey, is coupled here with the mobilisation of Russian troops along the Black Sea and in the Caucasus. So far these two facts are unexplained, but they bear a sinister significance for Turkey.

The Debats says that the mode of M. Tcharykoff's recall indicates the marked disgrace of the Ambassador. "There is," it says, "in Russian diplomacy a party which is pressing for common action between Russia and Italy, and which recommends violent pressure upon the Porte to compel it to accept Italy's terms."

The Constantinople correspondent of the Temps says that Turkish opinion has been rendered uneasy by M. Tcharykoff's recall and the Russian mobilisation. People are asking whether the Russian Government's attempts to persuade the Powers to force peace upon Turkey were not the first sign of a secret agreement between Rome and St. Petersburg. As for the nature of that agreement it is considered not unlikely in Constantinople that Russia may take action in the North at the moment that Italy takes action in the Aegean.

A Vienna despatch to the Echo de Paris reports a great movement of Russian troops towards the Turkish border in Armenia.

Competent observers here take for granted that Russia is now working in conjunction with Italy, and they more than suspect that the indefatigable M. Isvolsky, now Russian Ambassador here, is, with Signor Tittoni, the Italian Ambassador, responsible for this agreement. But a joint attack upon the Dardanelles or upon Turkish territory is regarded as impossible. France, with her millions invested in Turkey would not be disposed to allow it.

A Story of the Desert.

By ALAN OSIER, ("Express" Special Correspondent with the Turkish Forces in Tripoli.)

Gharian, February 11.

The German Red Cross field Hospital is installed at Gharian. Or, at least (for some of the big tents have still to be set up), the doctors, assistant and gardes malade have brought their wonderful equipment here, to the top of the mountains, after three days of the gallantest toil that ever I saw performed by horses, mules and men.

This should be a saga—"How the Red Cross came to Gharian." It is a tale worthy to have been sung by the skalds, whose ballads delighted the common fathers of ourselves and of the Germans a thousand years ago. Myself, I cannot hope to do justice to the story.

There is something of Hannibal's crossing of the Alps, with elephant trains and packs borne on the heads of the sweating negroes, there is something of the adventures of the early settlers of Western America crossing salt plains and prairies with their hooded wagons and not a little of the hardihood and resource of the explorers who, even as I write, may be dragging sledges across the hummocks and icefloes of the frozen deserts of the Antarctic.

When the Germans came to Aziza, with three hundred and sixty heavily loaded camels and fourteen wagons laden with cases too big for a camel to carry, I thought it impossible that they would ever get their stores and instruments up even the first of the hills that lead to Gharian.

That was six days ago. To-day the last of the wagons has been pushed and pulled by men and horses over the last of the mountain roads, and what seemed impossible has been accomplished.

I came with the wagons from Aziza. I am proud that I have helped to drag them up the rocky beds of mountain torrents, toiling in shirt-sleeves side by side with bearded German professors and pink, perspiring German peasants. There are fifteen of them—three doctors and twelve gardes-malade and hospital assistants, and "Wullahi!" as the Arabs say, "These are children of men!"

They set off late in the evening of 7th February, mules and horses of the Turkish artillery dragging the wagons across the soft, clinking sand of the desert. It was a slow journey. Darkness—the velvety blackness of a moonless African night—hid the track before we had travelled five miles.

So we halted and made great bonfires from dried twigs and thorn bushes, and waited for the moon to rise. The soldiers of the Turkish escort sang wild, plaintive songs, and the Germans responded with the simple tunes of the fatherland—"Die Lorelei," "Tannenbaum," "Straßburg," and, of course, "Die Wacht Am Rhein." At midnight the moon rose, pale and golden, and the creaking wagons bumped and jolted through the sand till dawn. It was a strange journey. Somehow, these blond, simple-hearted fellows seemed out of place in the African desert. Their songs and choruses, their jollity and kindness, belonged not to this barren savage land, but to a world of pleasant fields, forests, glades and rolling rivers.

They brought with them the atmosphere of a country life which I have not enjoyed for something like a year, and made me realise, with a sudden pang of homesickness, the beauty of lanes and woods and fields in friendly, kindly Europe.

Only two of them had ever ridden on horseback before—but, disdaining donkeys, more than one insisted on learning then and there the art of horsemanship. Their evolutions on (and off) the backs of quarrelsome Arab stallions serve to beguile that long night ride. At daybreak we halted and slept for a few hours. The road was becoming really bad by now, being full of huge boulders and unexpected precipices, and both men and horses were in need of rest. When we continued our march it was across country such as that in which the horses of the Galway "Blazers" learn to jump like goats and climb like cats—country in which the wagons had literally to be lifted over the dried beds of rivers, dragged through thorn thickets and hauled across belts of shifting sand. Here the way must be cleared with spade and mattock, there the reluctant wheels forced round with levers. Now a series of pits must be filled up, and now, fixing extra ropes to the shafts, Turk and Teuton hauled until the skin came from their palms, while the horses' hoofs clattered vainly to get a grip on the slippery rocks.

There was no distinction of rank or class. The Turkish officer in charge of the escort, the German doctor in charge of the hospital party, toiled and gasped side by side with private soldiers and Bavarian peasants. The Germans joked with the stolid Turkish soldiers, and the latter, understanding not a word of what was said, smiled gravely, and urged the straining horses forward with whip and spur and wild cries.

So, by evening, we came to the foot of the mountains. There are, as I have said, two veritable mountain stairways to be climbed by those who wish to reach Gharian, and as it was hopeless to think of working more that day the wagons were left at the foot of the first ascent and guarded by the Turks until next day.

In the morning, reinforced by forty sneaky Arabs, the Germans set to work again. The task before them was ten times more difficult than that they had accomplished. Perhaps if you imagine Shooter's Hill covered with boulders of basal and granite of all dimensions, from the size of a football to that of a furniture van, and then increase its height and steepness by at least one half, you may conceive an idea of the road up which these wagons must be hauled. That was a day of toil beyond belief. One wretched horse literally snapped the sinews of its leg. A wagon overturned, carrying men and horses with it, and would have crashed down a seventy-foot precipice, but for a jagged granite boulder that jammed against the axle.

At the end of the day most of the wagons had stopped the rise in a more or less shattered state. There still remained two to be accounted for. These two had been left far behind in the desert on the day before, for they carried particularly cumbersome cases, one containing a great filtering apparatus and the other a refrigerator.

By midday on the next day, when the other wagons had begun the ascent of the second "stairway," which is rockier if possible even than the first, these wagons were still missing.

The arrival of the filter was an all-important affair, and it became urgent that someone should go back over the mountain huntabout in the desert, and find these wagons.

I count it an honour that I was permitted to undertake this, and was not unreasonably proud that I managed to take the filter to pieces, pack it on the backs of two camels and bring it into Gharian by a shorter route, while the Red Cross party were still wrestling with their carts at the foot of the second ascent. I had engaged Arabs for the performance of this feat, and by making them literally prop the camels up on either side, managed to get the filter over apparently impossible ground. The warmth of the welcome which the Germans gave me on my arrival was a thing that I shall not forget. They had left three of their carts at the foot of the last hill overnight. This morning, harnessing extra horses and also men to the shafts, and levering the wheels along with might and main, they brought their task to a close. Standing at the top of the hill, bare-armed, flushed and perspiring, they looked down at the jumble of crags and boulders that they had mastered. The doctor in charge sighed complacently. "I am glad that we have brought our hospital over that road. I do not think any people in the world would do such a thing except Germans—and Englishmen," he generously added. They are fine men, these Germans of the Red Cross.

Italy's Plight.

THE Italians are behaving like children in the conduct of their war with Turkey. Having embarked on their Tripoli adventure in the spirit of schoolboys proposing to rob an orchard, they are whining now to the Powers to help them out of their scrape. They are not fighters, and, brag apart, have nothing in them of the qualities which go to the making of a conquering race. The Piedmontese, it is true, have some grit in them, but as for the rest, and especially the Neapolitans and Sicilians, they are a poor, unmanly crew, vicious, depraved, cowardly, essentially degenerate. They rushed into this war, knowing nothing of what war meant, thinking, indeed, there would be no more fighting than just firing their rifles against an unarmed enemy, having the amusement of a bit of plunder, and coming home after a few weeks as heroes, with medals and trophies and tales of their valour. But the first battle proved them cowards. With the exception of the Bersaglieri, who made some stand, they dared not face the least enemy in the open and have since remained closely behind their earthworks and under protection of the guns of their fleet. This is their present position, a hundred thousand of them afraid to make any forward movement, idle in the seacoast towns, having wasted the four winter months favourable to an advance, and with the prospect before them of an African summer, with its burning desert winds, for Tripoli is essentially a desert.

As to the Italian Government at home, it stands in an attitude towards the Courts of Europe of extreme ridicule. It has solemnly annexed the province it has been unable to conquer, and so has made a retreat from North Africa impossible without gross discredit. It would seem that the leading motive of the raid, as far as the King of Italy was concerned, was the hope that he would get his Imperial allies of Germany and Austria to consent to his assuming a title of Emperor equal to their own, and it is to this futility that we may ascribe his insistence on annexation instead of any less absolute form of dominion. There is a rage just now for empire everywhere, and Italy would like to measure herself with the best of her neighbours, and, as she was bullied in the past, so now she desires to bully others. She calls this her "self respect," her sense of "national dignity." At the same time she is not ashamed to make appeal to the Powers for help in her military predicament. What she wants is that these should put pressure upon Turkey to leave off its too successful fighting and acknowledge the paper annexation as a reality.

Sir Edward Grey is capable of almost anything in the way of diplomatic weakness, and yet we do not think he will go so far as this. He was willing to let the Italian Government try its hand last summer, and by declaring Egypt neutral to give it practical assistance, but this was because he thought he could detach Italy from the Triple Alliance at a moment when he had made up his mind to help France in her quarrel with Germany over Morocco. But to-day the position is not quite the same. He is less keen for a fight with the Kaiser and Italy has less to offer. She has proved herself contemptible as a fighting force, and her methods have discredited her as an ally. There is no reason why our Foreign Office should be otherwise than contented with the actual position of impotence in which Italy finds herself. Let her waste herself in Africa, let her spend her money! Why not? The worse position she finds herself in, the better it will be for the enemies of the Triple Alliance, of which she is still a partner. The only real trouble is the disturbance she is from time to time capable of making in the Levant and the Red Sea. The Italian fleet may become a nuisance to British trade; but the injury it can do to Turkey is very little by its operations, and England has it always in her power to put a stop to it by the threat of allowing Ottoman reinforcements to pass through Egypt by the land road to Tripoli. We are of opinion, therefore, that Italy will be left to stew in her own North African juice, notwithstanding her impotency and her undignified prayers for a one-sided intervention. There are many signs that Italy is recovering from her debauch, and that the advance in the quotation of the shares of the Banco di Roma which took place at the beginning of the war, however gratifying to Signor Pacelli and his financial associates, is not regarded as a sufficient compensation by the nation at large. Tripoli, it is realised, will never provide any serious outlet for the Italian surplus population, whilst the cost of holding it must constitute a severe drain on the Italian budget. Signor Girotti offered a calculation some time ago in La Riforma, from which he made out that the annual cost of the "new colony" will be 200 million lire, in addition to the initial cost of the army of occupation. Then there will be the additional cost of naval and military defence, the fleet needing to be augmented in proportion to its greater responsibilities. Altogether Signor Girotti works out the annual burden to be 350,000,000 lire, equal to about £14,000,000. This is an exceedingly conservative estimate, and since it was made the army in Tripoli has been nearly doubled, so that altogether the prospect for the Italian tax-payer is not a pleasant one. These facts cannot be obliterated by the hilarious ratification of the decree of annexation in the Chamber and Senate.

The Week.

Founder's Day at Aligarh.

THE fourteenth anniversary of the late Sir Syed Ahmed Khan was celebrated on the 8th. Nawab Vikar-ul-Mulk speaking on the Syed's relations with the Government told his hearers that to criticise some measure of Government honestly and at the same time boldly could never be counted as disloyalty and that this was the policy handed down to them by their great leader.

The Nadwat-ul-Ulama.

AT THE annual session of the Nadwa at Lucknow Maulana Shibli said that the local Arabic College had justified its existence. He said the religious leaders must move with the times. Resolutions were passed asking the Nizam to make the education of religious guides compulsory and asking Government to allot a portion of the Imperial Durbar grant to Moslem religious institutions.

Home Rule.

MR. BONAR LAW en route for Belfast met with a tremendously enthusiastic reception at Larne, being welcomed by large crowds headed by bands singing the National Anthem and firing rockets. Similar scenes took place at Belfast.

Belfast presented a most animated appearance on the 9th on the occasion of Mr. Bonar Law's speech. Special trains arrived from all parts of Ulster and processions paraded the streets with bands and Union Jacks.

Reuter wires from Belfast on the 9th.—On the occasion of Mr. Bonar Law's speech here to day, there was a demonstration of several hundred thousand persons. Tremendous enthusiasm was manifested. Mr. Bonar Law with Lord Londonderry, Sir Edward Carson, Mr. Walter Long, and other prominent Unionists observed the manifestants from the platform, a procession eleven deep and stretching four miles marching past and saluting Mr. Bonar Law, who bowed his acknowledgments.

In his speech Mr. Bonar Law said the Unionists regarded Ulster's cause as that of the Empire. Ulster's resolution to resist Home Rule must prove irresistible. He emphasised that Tariff Reform would benefit none more than Ireland. To-day's demonstration, he declared, showed that Home Rule was not the end but the beginning of the Irish problem. There had been no change in British opinion with regard to Home Rule. The Radicals had sold the constitution and thought they had sold Ulster, but Ulster was not theirs to sell. (Cheers.) The present danger was very great. There was no hope that the Government majority would be broken, but the loyalists must trust themselves and help would come.

The meeting passed a resolution assuring Mr. Bonar Law of Ulster's unalterable opposition to Home Rule.

Sir Edward Carson, presiding at a subsequent meeting, said they would meet the resolution heedless of consequences. Their one object was victory.

The Unionist papers are enthusiastic over the magnificent demonstration at Belfast as proving that Ulster is not shrinking from an expression of its resolve to resist Home Rule to the end.

The Radicals sympathise with Ulster's fears, while they are scornful at the Conservative policy regarding them. The Radicals are confident that the safeguards in the Government Bill will be a most effective answer to the demonstration.

China.

THE Times regards the Chinese Republican Cabinet as possessing many advantages over its predecessors under the old régime. The paper points out that almost all the members of the present Cabinet were educated abroad and says they must have a grasp of realities unknown to the ignorant obscurantists of the Tsungli Yamen and the Wai-Wu-Pu.

Reuter wires from St. Petersburg on the 7th.—It is announced that Russia has decided to join the group styled the "Four Powers" Banking Syndicate for the issue of a loan to China. Russia makes the proviso that the issue shall in no way prejudice special Russian interests in Manchuria, Mongolia and West China.

Reuter wires from St. Petersburg on the 9th.—A telegram from Urga states that in response to an invitation from Yuan-Shi-Kai asking Northern Mongolia to join the Chinese Republic, the Kutuchta replied that the people had proclaimed their independence in order to maintain the inviolability of religion and territory. He begged Yuan-Shi-Kai to respect the frontiers of Mongolia and to support the Mongolian Government, in consolidating the internal administration and in strengthening its friendly relations with neighbouring States. Though the Kutuchta had been ready to renounce independence, it was impossible to oppose the wishes of the people and he suggested that Yuan-Shi-Kai should submit the Mongolian question to the Powers interested.

Tibet.

THERE are ominous rumours of fresh trouble brewing between the Tibetans and Chinese at Gyantse.

Mr. Mashihchan, the Chinese official who was in charge of Pipitang (near Yatong), has arrived here with his family and some Chinese soldiers. It appears that he has been in difficulties about funds. He sent some men to Lhasa for money, but they have been delayed and it is doubtful whether they can get through the hostile Tibetan soldiery.

It is rumoured that heavy fighting has broken out in Tibet. A Chinese attack is reported on the monastery near Lhasa, which was vigorously met by the monks.

No official information has reached here regarding the rumoured massacre of Chinese in Lhasa. On the 9th it is said there were only one hundred left alive. These have found sanctuary in the Dalai Lama's brother's house.

A Moslem Scholar.

WE ARE much pleased to learn that Mohamed Yusuf Khan, B.Sc. (Civil Engineering), of Durham University, M.R.S.I., A.M.Sc. the younger brother of Mr. Mohamed Karani Ilahi, B.A., B.L., Pleader, Chief Court, Sialkot City, has passed the M.Sc. examination in Civil Engineering of the Durham University from the Armstrong College, Newcastle-on-Tyne. As a special favour to Mr. Yusuf for his high abilities and his heading the list in the B.Sc. examination the University has held this special test of M.Sc. for Mr. Yusuf this March instead of its usual dates in June. Mr. Yusuf is the only Indian who has passed the M.Sc. Civil Engineering from any British University. He is staying in England to try for the P.W.D. Imperial Indian Services in which there is not one single Muhammadan up to this day throughout the whole of India.

Anecdote.

AN ARROGANT little white man sneeringly asked the great Dumas if it was really true that he had negro blood in him. "Yes, Monsieur," was the reply. "My father was a mulatto." "And his father?" "He was a negro." "Oh! really! But who was his father, then?" "His father," said Dumas, "was a monkey." "A monkey?" said the little white man. "You don't mean it?" "Yes, Monsieur, I do. You see, my ancestry began where yours ends."

During the English tour of the one and only Pavlova, she was desired to write in a hotel visitors' book and she obliged with "I dance because I must.—Anna Pavlova." Since then the ever merry Joe Coyne has been at this hotel, seen the book, and entered underneath, with his Quaker love of truth, "I sing because I can't.—Joe Coyne."

TETE À TETE

THE recent session of the Nadwat-ul-Ulama will be remarkable in the history of the movement in that it has been presided over by Syed Rasheed Raza, the famous scholar of Egypt. It is the first time in the recent annals of the Indian Moslems that a great theologian and man of letters has been invited from a distant country to guide the deliberations of an assembly mainly composed of their ulema and those interested in the ideals for which the important movement of Nadwah stands. The fact is significant in two of its aspects. In the first place, one feels the unity and broad comprehension of Islamic culture which makes it possible for a gentleman, grown up in different environment, to enter easily and naturally into the spirit of the conditions obtaining in India and treat them with true insight and sympathy. Secondly—and this perhaps to some extent explains the first,—the general situation all over the Islamic world is almost alike in its broad intellectual and social character. The deeper evils that afflict Moslem society in all its parts, in Russia, Persia, Turkey, Egypt as well as in India, are not different in kind. Everywhere the problem is one of fresh intellectual equipment and social reconstruction. The inspiration of Islam is still a vital force, but it has got to be released and set to work by removing the thick encrustations that ignorance, religious indifference, and other secular causes have left over the Moslem mind. The intellectual renaissance of the Mussalmans in one part of the world will react on the other parts and thus hasten its final consummation. This is the true "Pan-Islamism," i.e., the intellectual response of the Mussalmans of the world to the best impulses of modern civilisation and not the political monstrosity that weighs on the brains of some alarmists in Europe.

A CORRESPONDENT writes that "the Government Gazette of Eastern Bengal and Assam, dated 6th instant (March), 'Favoured Nation publishes the new appointments in the Provincial and Subordinate Executive Service.

Out of four Deputy Magistrates we find only one Muhammadan and out of fourteen Sub-Deputy Magistracies only two have been apportioned to the Mussalmans. Is this the method of safeguarding the Muhammadan interest? Is that the number they are entitled to in proportion to their population? Is the Government prepared to say that no qualified Muhammadan candidates were available? Is this the reward of loyalty or of contentment? Or, after all, is this the customary treatment of "the favourite wife"?

As we informed our readers a fortnight ago, we have been in communication with the Right Hon'ble Mr. Ameer Ali with a view to equip a "Comrade Party." The "Comrade Party" to go to the seat of war as part of the British Red Crescent Society organisation. We had announced our intention of writing to him to accept our offer. We are now glad to state that we have authorised

Mr. Ameer Ali to organise a small field hospital on behalf of the readers and other sympathisers of the Comrade and send it to Tripoli. It will also, we believe, deeply interest our readers to learn that we have arranged for a correspondent to accompany the party who will supply us, direct from the field, prompt and authentic information about the progress of the war. We have hitherto had to depend for war news on the melodramatic accounts made in Rome, while news from Turkish and other reliable sources reach India after a wearying lapse of time. The despatches of a correspondent in direct communication with us, will, we are sure, be read with considerable interest. The arrangement will, no doubt, cost us a good deal, but we are confident our readers and others who have been so liberal in response to our appeal on behalf of the war sufferers, will redouble their efforts now that we have definitely decided to send our own party to the field.

It is, indeed, a matter of regret that the collection of funds for the Moslem University is not proceeding as swiftly as it should. The desirability of collecting promised donations has been dinned into the ears of the Moslem public so often without any appreciable effect that one may well begin to doubt if the desire for a university was as intense and genuine as it appeared to be. The total collections up to 25th March were Rs. 20,08,508-12 8 1/2, which means that about 15 lakhs more shall have to be collected before the University comes into being. We note with pleasure and admiration the indefatigable efforts of Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk Bahadur who in spite of the infirmities of age has been touring through some of the districts in the U. P. for the realisation of the promises. Let us hope the Moslem leaders in other provinces will imitate the example of the venerable Nawab and speedily realise the money that is outstanding in their respective spheres of influence. We are glad to learn that the work in connection with the University Fund is progressing very satisfactorily in Hyderabad. Several gentlemen of weight and influence are interesting themselves in the work of raising funds and we hope to be able ere long to announce handsome donations from the distinguished members of the Hyderabad Aristocracy. The general appeal of the Moslem public to H. H. the Nizam to raise the annual Hyderabad grant to the Aligarh College to Rs. 50,000 is, we believe, being favourably considered, and we trust we shall not have long to wait before the decision of His Highness is announced. We may mention here by the way that some misapprehension has been caused about the annual grant of Rs. 20,000 recently announced by Her Highness the Begum Sahelwa of Bhopal, which has been incorrectly reported to have been Rs. 2,00,000 by a section of the Press. Let us once more impress upon the Moslem leaders the urgent nature of the task that lies before them. We trust they fully realise the magnitude of the undertaking on which they have embarked and will spare no effort to make it a success. The character and honour of the Moslem community are on their trial—its capacity for sustained work, self help, and power of organisation, its spirit of self-sacrifice, sense of duty, and devotion to great and noble causes. The collection of funds will mark only the initial stage in the creation of the University. The weightier problems still lie ahead. But the success in the preliminary stage will be the correct measure of the capacity of the Mussalmans to grapple with the great constructive work of organising communal education with any degree of confidence. We hear that the Secretary of State's despatch on the Moslem University has been received by the Government of India in which Lord Crewe, while generally approving of the constitution of the University on the lines submitted by the University Committee to the Government of India, has withheld his assent to the principle of affiliation. We do not know on what grounds His Lordship has based his decision in a matter so vitally important to the development of Moslem education on right lines. Perhaps Sir Theodore Morison, whose views on the question are well known, has influenced Lord Crewe's opinion. If so, he has done the greatest disservice to a community whose views and feelings he ought to know and understand. We are constrained to say with regret that many of the troubles of the Aligarh College date back to the time when Sir Theodore Morison was its Principal. We trust, however, that the Government of India will move the Secretary of State to reconsider his decision on the subject. Otherwise much of the utility of the scheme will be vitiated and its power to help in the spread of the right type of education will be enormously curtailed. We hope the Moslem leaders will take early steps to settle the matter with the Government of India.

WE LEARN through Reuter's recent cablegram that the second act in the disgraceful farce about Morocco has come to a close. The end of the Farce.

the French Protectorate has at last been formally established over that doomed and luckless country. One feels a touch of wierd irony in the solemn hint of Baron Reuter, who has been punished with unconscious humour for his sins, that the transaction has been duly "signed." This is but a classical instance of the euphemistic lore that modern Imperialism has accumulated in its notorious career through a prying and incredulous world. The lay mind can well imagine the sort of pleasure with which Mulai Hafid must have signed the death warrant of his country. The whole transaction, with the final exit of the Moors as their own masters from the stage, bristles with many a moral and not a few melodramatic tales. International finance is the one dragon which is throttling all the fine impulses that ever redeemed human endeavour from ugliness and brute lust and imparted to the whole range of life and purpose the beauty that is divine. It is modern finance that has evolved modern Imperialism in its most militant aspect. The French Bourse, more than any other single force, is responsible for the fate of Morocco. Mining syndicates and company promoters control the forces of diplomacy to an extent never known in the history of the world before, and States and ministers are but the passive instruments in the development of schemes for ruthless material exploitations. The real authors of French aggression must have winked mightily at one another when they listened to the grandiloquent exposition of the French colonial methods delivered recently in the Chamber by the Resident General of Tunis. In that analysis, which is in effect a bare-faced panegyric sung to a society of mutual adulation, there were clumsy efforts at altruistic feeling and unctuous references were made to the restraint and chivalry of the nation that so manfully bore the White Man's Burden in Africa. It was evident, however, that the minister in charge of the Colonies moved guiltily in his seat. The land-grabbing scandals of the French adventurers who are forcibly depriving the Moors of their lands even before the Protectorate has been "lawfully negotiated" and defying law and justice under the patronage of their own consular courts, must have given to the Moors the foretaste of how they are to be civilised and made fit for the proud dignity of being enfranchised as French citizens. "France has to carry out the sacred mission of civilising North Africa," i.e., to dump atheism, Parisian conventions about tastes and manners and modes of life, cafes resounding to the echoes of mirthless gaiety produced by huge drink, in places where life is yet simple and honest and illumined by the light of faith.

THE "civilising mission" of the French, however, is a comparatively tame affair compared to the manner in which Russia is seeking to bear the "white man's burden" in Persia. As the Novaya Vremya informed the world the other day, Russia, too, like her French ally, has felt a "call," though to outward seeming it has borne the appearance of earth-hunger tempered by assassination. After crushing life out of the best and noblest patriots under her iron heels in Tabriz and calling it "order," she has now turned her attention to Meshed, one of the most sacred places in the country, and bombarded a mosque, killing many pilgrims and others while engaged in prayers. We do not know whether civilised Europe will be roused to protest against this outrage, the horror and enormity of which have convulsed the whole Islamic world. When Persia has already been reduced to tutelage, with her sovereign rights crippled and her liberties taken away from her, sheer pity would demand that the reign of terror and wanton carnage introduced by Russia should come to an end. One is almost ashamed of even hoping that considerations of fairplay and common humanity will appeal to the Muscovite, whom nature has deprived of both. It is to the British Government that one turns in the last resort to see justice done to a forlorn and down-trodden people. The weak and halting attitude of Sir Edward Grey has often been justified on the sole plea that the Convention has got to be maintained for the sake of the moral influence it enables England to exert on St. Petersburg. "So far the only consequence of this policy has been that Russia has had her way with supreme nonchalance, reducing the British Foreign Office to a passive role. But, of course, the Convention has got to be maintained." Sometimes even the best of motives are reduced to a mere fetish and convention through lack of will.

THE ANJUMAN-I-HIMAIT-UL-ISLAM of Lahore represents the oldest and most important effort of the Punjab Moslems to organise modern education on communal lines. The activities of the Anjuman are wide in their scope and the results that it has achieved during upwards of quarter of a century of its existence, on the whole justify the influence that it carries with the community. The rather persistent demand for reform in the working and constitution of the Anjuman which was raised a few years ago, was in itself a measure of the inherent vitality of the movement of which the Anjuman is an outward symbol. Ideals of progress are, by their very nature, difficult of definition and very slow of growth. They are apt to grow dim in the severe conflict of motive and opinion, that is the inseparable accident of a period of transition. We are glad, however, the Anjuman has successfully weathered the storm, quickened its pace, striven to form the right perspective and achieved the necessary harmony for the growth of its aims and aspirations. The anniversaries of the Anjuman have always been very interesting and inspiring functions. They attract hundreds of visitors from all over the Moslem Punjab and even from beyond, who are treated to a very interesting and varied programme. The anniversary that has been just celebrated during the Easter holidays appears to have been a success. These celebrations, however, are in the nature of popular festivals, and though they have been serving a useful purpose by sowing the seeds of right and definite ideas, they could not be expected to initiate fruitful discussions or formulate definite lines of work for the spread and development of communal education. A provincial educational conference was urgently needed for the purpose. We are glad such a conference has come into existence. The Hon. Sahebzada Aftab Ahmed Khan presided at its recent session, and we are sure a man of his ability and experience in educational matters must have guided its deliberations into fruitful channels.

It is, however, our painful duty to remark that the by-no-means super-abundant energy of the Moslems of the Panjab is to a large extent running to waste through unwholesome friction amongst themselves. We may believe with the vivacious Frenchman who stoutly maintained that a little intellectual sparring and protestant energy of debate made life worth living. But it is one thing to feel the stress and exhilaration born of the interplay of vital ideas and quite another to fret and foam and toil with hard words under the influence of dark moods and flighty tempers. Some of the recent manifestations of party feeling amongst the Moslems of the Panjab can scarcely be regarded with equanimity by the well-wishers of the community. We need not go into the causes that are responsible for this tension of feeling. It may, however, be noted that the true democracy of Islam is beginning to assert itself and find an utterance. It is possible the sudden and unmistakable growth of popular opinion, its strength and directness, have alarmed the self-constituted "leaders", who find themselves stranded in a sea of doubts while the mass of the community has moved on. Circumstances, however, deal mercilessly with false heroes of the platform and the marketplace, and popular verdicts about public men are usually based on unerring instincts.

Public opinion cannot be for ever bullied by those who imitate the tones of the Oracle without first making sure of the inspiration. The Panjab Moslems are perhaps thoroughly sick of the guidance that they have hitherto received, or rather of the evasions and suppressions that have done duty for guidance. They now call for a definite and sympathetic lead. The treatment meted out in one of the meetings, held in connection with the recent Anjuman celebrations at Lahore, to the gentleman who had some time ago lectured the Indian Mussalmans on their political responsibilities, serves to show that the quack and the charlatan will no longer be suffered in the counsels of the community. Still, however, we must deprecate the unedifying controversy and personal recriminations to which the wholesome popular ferment has given rise. It would be hard to excuse the indecorous lengths to which party papers have gone in traducing their adversaries. There can be no more impressive object-lesson of the dangers of irresponsible journalism than the studied hints and insinuations that were recently made by a vernacular paper called Millat and another against the loyalty of an important section of the Punjab Moslems. Ephemeral journals of the sort deserve nothing better than silent and dignified contempt. It should, however, be the duty of the patriotic and public-spirited Mussalmans to raise their public activities to a higher level of unselfishness and effect reconciliation and harmony in their ranks. We hope we shall not be misunderstood when we say that public interests are much more important and weighty considerations than personalities, however largely they may happen to bulk in the public eye. Let those that are honestly disgusted with the things as they are cease sulking morosely in their tents. They should come forward and take the lead if they feel confidence in themselves and in the strength and righteousness of their cause. Devoted, unselfish service is needed everywhere for all purposes that affect the welfare of the community. Ambition to "lead" has had its day. Ambition to serve has less outward attractions, no doubt, but it is the only measure of a great and beneficent life.

THE rumours of Russian intervention in the Turko-Italian war that have been hurtling through the diplomatic atmosphere of Europe have been persistently denied as false, but the general nervousness of the situation lends some weight to the growing apprehensions that Turkey may have to face some menace from that quarter. The military impasse in Tripoli has made Italian diplomacy all the more active and keen and we can quite understand the frantic efforts of her agents to manoeuvre an organised European pressure for coercing the Porte to her will. Russia may have been tempted to co-operate with Italy with the object of securing a free passage through the Dardanelles. The insurrectionary dregs in the Balkans, who are always ready to dance to the tunes of the Muscovite, have had no less incitement from Italian agents to create civil disturbances and anarchy. The unrest thus manufactured in the heart of the Ottoman Empire, the license given to Cretan revolutionary propaganda and the semi-official publication of Italian peace terms have created the sort of atmosphere that may hasten the development of Italian schemes to bring about European intervention, without apparently doing great violence to international sense of justice. Router's latest cablegram shows that the Powers "are agreed to the terms of the request to the Porte with regard to the termination of the war." Their request will, of course, be based on humanitarian grounds and "in the interest of Europe generally." They will invite the Porte "to signify the conditions on which it is prepared to terminate hostilities." The Porte may be trusted to accept the good offices of the Powers consistently with the integrity and honour of the Empire; and we hope there will be no effort to press the "irreducible minimum" of Italy as the only basis of settlement. The true basis can be no other than that of the stricken field. If Italy finds the conquest of Tripoli an impossible task, she may be asked to trace back her steps and console herself as best she can with her unrealised and grandiose dreams of empire. If Europe could not punish the brigand, surely it cannot now sit as a judge to give the final award to him, because he is also a coward and has miserably failed to rob. But whatever may be the trend of European diplomacy—and we are afraid considerations of equity and peace will not be the sole guiding principles in its conduct—there can be no mistaking the shrill and impertinent pacifisms that periodically emanate from that ubiquitous scribe, the Vienna correspondent of the Times. We reproduce a sample of his latest efforts elsewhere, in which he warns the Young Turks that better terms than those offered by Italy cannot be obtained. "If the Committee continues to obstruct a tolerable settlement," says this portentous Authority on European affairs "a hard blow will be hit at some vital spot of the Ottoman Empire." He foresees disaster in the Balkans and trouble in Crete. According to him, "the Powers are believed to admit the practical impossibility of preventing the Cretan Deputies from reaching Athens." If the Powers are helpless to control Cretan affairs, why did they undertake to supervise them? As regards the other dangers to Turkey, we think it would be infinitely better if the Empire is handed over to the great Vienna correspondent for administering it on the lines of his own devising.

The Comrade.

The Provincial Conferences.

THOSE students of public affairs who are perpetually forming fresh resolves to come to some tremendous conclusion, but somehow or other miss the last touch that would transmute the hopeless mass of their impressions into definite ideas, should turn to the Provincial Conferences for what they lack in facility of conviction or constructive faculty in the region of pure thought. Politicians, and philosophers who weave theories along devious political paths, are divided from the prophets by a thin line.—the latter create miracles, the former foretell them perpetually. But the student of affairs has to watch in ceaseless vigilance what are portentously called "the signs of the times." He exists for them, those elusive political and social portents, and would willingly die for their sake, if need be. The public life in this country being what it is, "the signs of the times" are not to be had in abundance. The student, therefore, has for the most part of the year to rout the elements of his thinking out of a pathetically threadbare journalism in which a host of old familiar arguments are pursued to inconclusive garrulity. It is only when the Provincial Conferences come round with the changing seasons of the earth, when Nature breaks through her spell of monotony and leaf and bud and bird and beast awaken to fresh joys of life, that "the signs of the times" begin to fall round the student of Indian affairs, thick as autumn leaves. It is entirely his fault if he fails to make use of the material and come to conclusions.

There are those who maintain that the Conferences are nothing more than a revue of the annual journalistic output of the country, packed into three strenuous days of platform oratory. This attitude, however, is a trifle cynical in ignoring the existing state and character of Indian political life. Paradoxical though it may seem, it is, nevertheless, true that the professional politicians of the Congress school have been stereotyped into a clique which has reduced political thinking to a dead level of sameness and threatens to become a great intellectual tyranny. The Congress demagogue is, sometimes, overheard to deplore public indifference to public questions, and a provincial Congress organ was only the other day mourning the dearth of organised public activity in its province. The fault does not lie with the public but with the methods that have been hitherto in vogue in all public organisations. From the Congress downwards, the autocratic ways and temper of the "leaders" who have treated all differences of opinion as heresy, while they have filled the country with democratic war-cries. Words without wisdom avenge themselves on those who utter them in vain. The glaring monotony of the Indian public life is the result of forcing the awakening mind of the people into the cast-iron mould, that may break but would not bend. It is a shallow philosophy that seeks to find unity of effort through a uniformity of opinion. A fully-developed national life is a rich texture of multi-coloured hues into which is woven an infinite variety of aim, motive and desire. If the entire people of India were to rise one fine morning, uttering the same hopes, thinking the same thoughts and moved by absolutely the same motives, it would be an unutterable calamity and one might well, like Huxley, pray for some kindly comet that would sweep the whole affair away as a desirable consummation. It would, therefore, be idle to expect the Press and the Platform responding to fresh inspiration and initiating fresh forms of public endeavour as long as freedom of thought is suppressed by those who control the only efficient instruments that democracy has evolved for the organisation of public will and intelligence. If the Provincial Conferences bear the primeval curse of Indian political life upon them, we have no reason to be surprised, even though we may justly deplore that they are comparatively barren of practical results.

As we have already said, these Conferences afford abundant materials to a student of Indian affairs in order to arrive at a true estimate of the conditions that govern the political development of the country. Let us take, for instance, the Bengal Provincial Conference and the U. P. Provincial Conference that have just concluded their sittings and see what they have achieved. If we understand the term aright, a conference is perhaps meant for taking counsel together and formulating definite lines of action in regard to the matters affecting the welfare of a definite social or political group. The Provincial Conferences are, we may take it, organised for this purpose ie., to focus public opinion and direct it to well-considered ends. In practice, however, they very often sink into public demonstrations that are treated to big oratorical performances of almost exactly the same pattern as the presidential address of the latest Congress session, and tuned to the loudest notes of the Congress Press. The Hon. Mr. S. Sinha, the President of the U. P. Conference, was only half-conscious of the want of provincial initiative and individuality when he said that "for one thing it has become a common practice of late for Presidents of our Conferences to deliver prodigious inaugural addresses, encyclopedic in scope, surveying political, social or industrial problems, as the case may be, from China to Peru, and public taste has become more or less accustomed to expect, if not to always appreciate, such portentous performances which, however, is for me a task to which I am absolutely unequal." It is rather a pity that after this pathetic protest the Hon. Mr. Sinha should have himself succumbed to the temptation, begun to discuss first principles, laid down laws for the guidance of all India, alike that is and that is to be, and wound up with an apology for his sins of omission. His address might well have been delivered from the Congress platform and so might have been Mr. A. Rasul's, the President of the Bengal Conference. There is a lack of provincial perspective and grip with truly provincial problems, a sad lack of local atmosphere in both, and with the alteration of a few formal paragraphs they might very well be delivered from any platform in India from Cape Comorin to Cashmere without losing a jot of their generously broad and indefinite outlook.

The questions dealt with in these Addresses have been at least for the whole year past the stock-in-trade of daily journalism. If, however, it is useless to look for fresh movement of thought taking definite shape in popular assemblies, one may at least reasonably expect that the miserably limited round of topics will be treated in some fresh form, from new standpoints or, at any rate, in the light of fresh facts and fresh experience. We hope we will not be understood to mean that the utterances of the Hon. Mr. S. Sinha and Mr. Rasul are devoid of interest. Mr. Sinha's address is a clever performance in many ways and deals broadly and comprehensively with many public questions. With some of his views and those of Mr. Rasul we find ourselves in complete accord. It is, however, when they have tried to deal with the root problem of the Indian situation that they betray the incurable conventionality and bias of their political opinions. Take, for instance, the Hindu-Moslem question. Both of the Presidential addresses are full of fine sentiments and obviously honest intentions. But when they begin to examine the causes of the friction, they indulge in assumptions some of which are ridiculous, if not worse. Any journalist of note or a public man of knowledge and experience ought to be able to see the rank absurdity of the argument that papers of the type of the Fatima have made classical the sort of argument that blamed the Partition of Bengal for the growth of racial tension. The Hindus and the Mussalmans of Bengal, we have been told with wearisome persistence, lived ideal existence before the Partition came down, like some lone fiend from a ruined hell, to break their neighbourly felicity. Let us grant that for the sake of argument. But why should the Partition have become a racial question? Was it not because the dominant and powerful Hindus of Bengal saw in the creation of the new province with its Moslem majority a chance for the Mussalmans to recover their status, break racial monopoly and secure in some measure the equality of opportunity which was justly their due? The authors of the Partition agitation were in fact responsible for the birth and growth of communal bitterness. It were they who developed sectarian formulas and religious war-cries and sought inspiration for their fight against an administrative measure from the occult sources of the Hindu faith. If, therefore, administrative acts and changes that may hold out a fair chance to the Mussalmans to recover their lost ground, without in any way affecting Hindu interests, are to be condemned as unjust and held responsible for consequences that are in reality the results of communal aggressions, we may well despair of the Hindu-Moslem problem ever reaching a peaceful solution. Mr. Sinha has quoted with evident gusto the remarks of that favourite of the Congress politician, Lord MacDonnell, who thought the creation of the Province of Eastern Bengal and Assam would give "predominance to Muhammadans in a country that was essentially Hindu." Even united Bengal has a Moslem majority, and if numbers alone are to determine the character of an administrative unit, the Presidency of Bengal is a Mussalman rather than a Hindu province. But the true mischief of the remark lies in its tacit assumption that things are to be left everywhere as they are to placate Hindu opinion, even though the change be loudly called for in the interests of justice and fairplay. The attitude that regards Hindu or, for the matter of that, Congress standpoint as the sole test of administrative measures and public policy stands in the way of the evolution of a united Indian nation.

We are afraid neither Mr. Sinha nor Mr. Rasul has risen above the common level of the partisan in the consideration of this vital question. Mr. Rasul has even descended the ordinary plane of good taste and common courtesy to fling wild and vulgar hints at the Mussalmans because they can see no intellectual absurdity in a purely Moslem standpoint of politics. It is unworthy of a public man whose sole title to respect is that he claims intellectual independence. While explaining the absence of the Mussalmans from the so-called "Provincial" Conferences, he has the audacity to accuse the whole community of stupidity, lack of patriotism, political imbecility and moral cowardice. He says.— "Our critics forget that it is not the want of sympathy with the aims and objects of the Conference and the Congress that keeps the Mahomedans back from them, but it is the want of education and the fear of official disfavour. Mahomedans are not as well educated as the Hindus and most of those who do get the benefit of education enter the public service and are therefore debarred from attending political meetings. There are some educated Mahomedans who are either of independent means or are in independent professions, but the less said about the reasons which prevent them from joining the Conferences and the Congress the better for them and the community which has produced them. There are others again who are told by their leaders that the 'Sircar Bahadur' is against these political organisations and that the Hindus are their enemies and that the political interests of the Mahomedans are different from those of the Hindus." We are at a loss to understand the aggressive shallowness of this paitry effusion except on the hypothesis that Mr. Rasul believes himself to be the only Mussalman who has learnt the elements of political honesty and has striven hard to hold on to a straight and difficult path. To assign base and unworthy motives to different sets of ideals and beliefs is the primitive weakness of the human mind, and the measure of a man's fitness for useful public life is the degree to which he has realised that his standpoint is but one of the infinitely various standpoints for judging the entire scheme of things and that he alone has not discovered the secret of human felicity. Mr. Rasul may be a good representative of himself, but that is not a very great achievement; nor does it give him any title to justify his loose political thinking and narrow fanaticism of views by rashly indulging in mud.

In regard to the question of the public service, the Hon. Mr. Sinha had the fairness to admit that "it is an absolutely legitimate aspiration of the Muhammadians that they should get their fair share of appointments," though he could not forego the luxury of indulging in the favourite platitude of the Congressman as well as of some of the officials that in "the recruitment of the public service" "efficiency" should be "the supreme consideration." Is it meant to insinuate that the Mussalmans want to lower the level of efficiency by insisting on being admitted into the public service without undergoing the necessary test of fitness? Or does it mean that they as a community are unfit, at any rate, in comparison with the Hindus? The argument of the educational backwardness of the Mussalmans has lost every shred of relevancy under the existing conditions. The Mussalmans have made sufficient progress in education, and they are ready to compete for admission into all branches of the public service, provided the terms are equal. It is not the disparity of educational standards, but the formidable opposition of the monopolist, that stands in the way of their getting a "fair share of appointments." We trust "efficiency" arguments will, in common fairness and decency, be dropped by those who profess to talk sincerely "about compromise and reconciliation between Hindus and Mussalmans."

There are various other matters dealt with in the addresses, some of which deserve our entire sympathy. We need not, however, take them up for detailed consideration. We would only say in conclusion that if real provincial public life is to be built up, if genuine public spirit and civic sense are to be evoked amongst the people and if, above all, active efforts are to be made for the growth of organised public will and intelligence, there should be greater freedom and larger scope for the growth of common ideals, greater mutual tolerance, sympathy, and comprehension. Without a change in the attitude and the methods of those who lead and control public activities, the Provincial Conferences will remain the futile demonstrations that they are to-day. Uniformity of opinion should cease to be artificially imposed. There should be greater confidence in the public opinion itself growing freely and evolving ultimate unity of direction. Democracy cannot be reared under the shadow of thoroughgoing despotism.

The Compulsory Education Debate.

IV

We have already dealt with the official view in regard to the principle of compulsion which the Hon Mr. Gokhale sought to introduce by his Bill in the system of Primary education. But even more important than the question of compulsion is the financial aspect of the scheme. As a matter of fact, that too is only another aspect of compulsion. The Bill provides three kinds of compulsion, compulsion of parents to send their children to school, compulsion of local authorities to provide the schools by contributing towards their cost if they wish and the first form of compulsion to be applied to the local area which they control, and compulsion of Government to contribute the other part of the cost of the provision of educational facilities. But as Mr. Gokhale, anticipating the debate itself, declared, "of course the whole thing hinges on whether the Government of India are prepared to find a good part of the cost." "That is," he added, "in fact, the real crux of the question, and whether the Bill is accepted or thrown out, it is perfectly clear that no large extension of elementary education is possible in the country, unless the Government of India came forward with a generous financial assistance." What has happened then is that the Government refuse to compel parents to send their children to school for a variety of reasons, none of which are even alleged to be applicable to all areas and few of which are really deterrent anywhere. The Government refuse to compel local authorities to provide schools partly because they know only too well on what short rations they have kept the local bodies, and partly because under the Bill they cannot compel them to do so without pledging to bear the main portion of the cost themselves.

But what is to be the cost? When compulsion is in full force and at least 10 per cent. of the total male population is at school, money would be needed to provide instruction for 12½ million boys. Of these about 4 million are already at school and cost the country less than Rs. 4 per head per annum. Provision will therefore have to be made for the remaining 8½ million boys, and at the present rate, it should cost the country no more than 3¼ crores. But Mr. Gokhale provides a little more than a rupee per head extra for improvements and calculates the cost, as also did Mr. Orange, the late Director-General of Education, at the rate of Rs. 5 per head. That gives a total cost of 4¼ crores of rupees, and to be on the safe side he puts it at 4½ crores. In other words, he leaves a margin of 125 lakhs for improvements of existing arrangements.

Nowhere was a basis of discussion and we were entitled to expect that the Education Department would either accept these figures—which were arrived at by the then highest educational officer of Government and submitted to Government according to their instructions—or explain where they erred. Mr. Gokhale knew fully well the importance of accurate estimating, and commenced his remarks on the subject by stating that "a lot of wild criticism has been indulged in by the opponents of the Bill on this point," and that "all sorts of fantastic estimates have been brought forward to discredit the scheme in the eyes of those who can be misled by such tactics." To this the only answer that Sir Harcourt Butler vouchsafed is the following —

This estimate leaves out of account altogether the cost of increased inspection and training of teachers the cost of the machinery for enforcing compulsory attendance, the cost of adequate school buildings and appliances, and the multiplication of cost which will be necessary in numerous areas by the provision of separate schools for separate classes of the community who will not frequent the same school. It leaves out of account also the cost of prolonging the course beyond four years, which the best opinion regards as wholly inadequate even were it accepted as a beginning we shall not break down illiteracy on a four years' course. Apart from these shortcomings, the estimate is based on an assumed figure of Rs. 5 per head per scholar a year, a figure which allows little or nothing for improvement. Now if we are to make education compulsory we must give sufficient and suitable education and we cannot give that at the present rate of salaries with the present cost of living.

No—at the very lowest estimate the cost must, in my opinion, be at least double Mr. Gokhale's figure if we are to make any impression in the country.

The Hon Mr. Sharpe, whose professional qualifications it has become impossible to forget, adds little to Sir Harcourt's details beyond explaining that "we shall have to pay for the free supply of books, we may have to pay for free meals." He does not wish to be hard on Mr. Gokhale "because he has cut down his bill." He understands and appreciates the reasons whatever they be, but without letting in a penetrating ray of knowledge into our ignorance of such occult things, he is content to tell us that he thinks that "those reasons are far outweighed by what I may call professional considerations." As a matter of fact Mr. Gokhale had no reason to cut down the bill of costs and we are inclined to think that the unmentioned "professional considerations" are equally mythical. If they exist to day, how are we to know that they did not exist when Mr. Orange presided over the Department. If official successors take to destroying the laboriously built up reputation of official predecessors, we fear not a shred will be left of official prestige and that superstitious awe in which the non-official world stands of official wisdom. Who "assumed" the figure of 5 rupees per scholar per year that Sir Harcourt should complain. It rests on the estimates framed by Mr. Orange and it is amply borne out by the scale of present expenditure. If Mr. Orange had erred, it was open to Sir Harcourt or his professional advisers to explain the error. We refuse to magnify the cost by including improvements that the Education Department has hitherto refused to carry out. It has been content so long to impart a certain kind of instruction in a certain manner to 4 million boys. We ask it hereafter to impart the same instruction in the same manner to 8½ million more. Although not possessed of even half of the professional virtues that have marched past us, we have at least some of the amateur ardour for education which has been exhibited, and we, the people of this country, prefer to plough more ground and cast the seed over a larger area before adopting all the top-dressings and phosphorus manures that Mr. Sharpe has been preparing only in theory in his secret laboratory. We ourselves have some idea of his piling up the costs like all worthy solicitors, for in spite of the fact that Government pay high enough salary to their college tutors—called professors, perhaps because that dignity alone could cover their few years and accomplishments—Mr. Sharpe insists that the Moslem University shall provide for a higher scale, and although Government Colleges spend no more than Rs. 435 per scholar per year, the Moslem University must show resources enough to spend Rs. 500 per head. We too understand his reasons, but we fear we cannot appreciate them as highly as he does and have no desire to provide for an inspection that will cost more than the tuition or the free meals which even Europe has not yet provided. The estimate of Sir Harcourt Butler is for all he has chosen to state a mere guess—and it is a bad one at that. So far Mr. Orango's figures hold the field, and even Mr. Sharpe has not ventured to parade the portly figures of his own creation.

The question of ways and means is more important, for if a Morley had insisted on the introduction of compulsory primary education or a Curzon had in an impetuous moment carried it out, we are certain that the Education Department would have gladly accepted the offer of 4½ crores and at the end of it returned a crore or so to His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief to raise the Military Budget from 31 crores to 32. Mr. Gokhale suggests that the local bodies should bear a third of the added cost, the Government of India supplying the remaining two-thirds. Is 3 crores such an impossible sum to raise? Mr. Gokhale gave the notorious instance of the military charges which have risen from 16 crores at the end of Lord Ripon's administration to 31 crores to-day. That is an instance of increased expenditure of 15 crores. But we have another instance equally serviceable, namely, of the diminished income from opium. Only two years ago the opium revenue exceeded 11½ crores and this year we have budgeted for no more than 5½ crores. Here is a decline in revenue of 6 crores in two years. At this rate the whole increased cost of primary education could be provided in a single year, while if we take the accelerated rate of increased military expenditure, it would take no more than seven months to do so. But nobody wants the cost to be increased so rapidly and the least that it would take up to reach the full stature of expenditure would be 10 years. What then is a paltry addition of 30 lakhs to the expenditure every year? Mr. Williamson ventured into a foreign land without permission and without provocation. All too sadly he paid the penalty of his action with his life. But it occurred to the Government of India to take several hundred lives for one in revenge and to call this vindictiveness a vindication of our imperial dignity. That has cost us close upon 2 crores already and who knows that the vendetta of Mr. Williamson may not entail the full 3 crores which we shall need every year for banishing illiteracy from the men at least in this country.

What we should like to suggest is that the salt revenue, which after deducting all expenditure amount, to 4½ crores and which comes mostly from the people who would directly benefit from compulsory education, should be earmarked for that purpose. But in any case if an additional tax must be levied Mr. Gokhale suggests an increase of 2 per cent. in Customs, which would bring in the required four crores. When even ways and means are clearly indicated, we do not know what holds Government back. But whatsoever checks their ardour, their official apologies are wholly inadequate to cover their shortcomings in this respect.

CORRESPONDENCE

"Khwab-o-Khiyal"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE"

SIR,

Your leading article of March 23rd on the "Khwab-o-Khiyal" contains the following passage: "Writings such as those of Sita Ram could easily lead to breaches of the peace, and we are surprised that those responsible for the contents of the Fauji Akhbar at all allowed these passages to go in". May I be permitted to draw your attention to the letter from a correspondent which appeared in the Fauji Akhbar of March 30th (page 8 in the Urdu edition, ("Fauji Afson, ke hie ek namunāsib kitāb ki ishā'at") from which it will be seen that the Khwab-o-Khiyal was carefully edited before publication in the Fauji Akhbar and all passages which were in any way open to objection were deleted.

"Essays: Indian and Islamic."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—I have just opened your issue of 30th March and have perused with pleasure your note on Mr. Salahuddin's "Essays Indian and Islamic." I was inexpressibly shocked at the quotations which you had given of the work of this sturdy son of Islam. I was even surprised by your attributing this irreverent and irreligious way of referring to Islam and our noble Apostle to the essayist's "close study" of the savants of the West. Well, I suppose there are other students of these savants of the Agnostic world. The evil lies not in the study of the irreverent and irreligious critics only. This study nowadays cannot be avoided. The evil lies in the defective and bad early training, surroundings and in the unfortunately extensive desire on the part of many Muslim parents to give their hopefuls a purely mundane instruction that it may fit them to earn their roti honourably or rise to be "dipti sahibs, balister-sahibs" or even "habu sahibs." They care not to teach the youths the meaning of Islam, the spiritual truths that underlie it, the status and meaning of the inspired Prophet, the significance of Inspiration. Thus the parents, always having their eyes like Belial—that ignoble under-hero of Milton—upon the earthly things, are the real authors and originators of this early bedazzlement of the "youthful idea" whose unsophisticated mind cannot meet the shock of the cold glitter and the hollow criticism of the German, European or Agnostic critics, utilising their batteries on the historical ground and seeking to demolish religion and reverence. I expect more such writings will appear in future.

محقق ازین بیمار کرد اسف و گند *

حالہ را بیمار کرد اسف و گند

I was in the beginning often shocked by some half ignorant writers using the words "بانی اسلام" "founder of Islam" which has a sinister significance when used by the critics, inasmuch as it merely means that Islam is the concoction of the active brain of a Qureshite Arab of the 7th century. But sooth to say, Mr. Salahuddin has beaten these writers hollow and has advanced many degrees in saying of the Apostle that his selections of the dogmas of Judaism and Christianity were faulty or that he was master of vituperation, which reminds one of Disraeli's attack upon Lord Salisbury as a "master of gibes, flouts, and jeers."

Now there should be no mistake in what I mean. If the learned author is a Mussalman, belonging to any known or definite sect or even a rational exponent of Islam who has taken up some visionary "Broad Church" as his model, he cannot be allowed to deny the basic truth of Islam that there is an eternal Existence, which can and does inspire apostles for the هداية (guidance) of mankind and that of all such appointed agents of the Almighty, Muhammad was the greatest and that whatever he said was in conformity with and by order of the Creator and Ruler of mankind. Now the words that I have used may be verbally taken exception to by some Schools, but the general purport of Islam will be defined by all the professors of the faith to include the above-mentioned doctrines.

If, unfortunately for Islam and fortunately for the cause of free-thinking or German criticism, there be any such amongst us who deny the basic truth, then they should have the courage of their convictions. They should not tacitly take up the pose of an orthodox Muslim before Europe and thus deceive the readers of the West into a wrong idea as to what Islam means in the eyes of every Mussalman. On the other hand they should not lead blindfold the ignorant amongst the English-reading Muslims amongst us (who sometimes derive ideas of Islam from such writers) into a hidden disbelief and practical denial of the Message of our great lord and Apostle. Let them honestly say that they were Mussalmans by birth and by sympathies, but that their ideas are independent and free and in their works they do not claim to represent the accepted view of the community, to which in matters other than doctrinal they do belong.

Now suppose we hold to the principle that everyone who utters the word لَا إِلَهَ إِلَّا اللَّهُ — مُحَمَّدٌ الرَّسُولُ اللَّهُ however he may openly interpret them, is a Mussalman (religiously as distinct from politically), we will end by falling into religious nihilism. For لَا إِلَهَ إِلَّا اللَّهُ may be interpreted to mean "there is no force operating in the world but a cosmic force, all pervading, not self-conscious" and مُحَمَّدٌ الرَّسُولُ اللَّهُ according to the very liberal and comfortable beliefs of some of our latter-day Platos and Luthers, may be represented to mean nothing more than this, "This Cosmic Force evolves out of itself a self-conscious being called man, and one man Muhammad (ﷺ) was a highly intelligent leader of mankind who uttered some wonderful truths mixed up, of course, with many things which in latter days prove obnoxious to progress and are worthy of being weeded out."

If there are some who wish to found such a school of thought I for one would welcome their separation from amongst us and would be ready to meet them in fair field. I am, in the present age, an advocate of religious toleration and wish to extend it in Persia to the Bahis and Bahais even, because I regarded their separation as useful to Islam. The agnostic or the extra-rationalistic church amongst us, if it has a moral conscience, should openly come out so that we, the poor "benighted" Muslims, who do not care a penny for the writings of non-religious scoffers of Germany, France or England, may meet them openly.

KHAWJA GHULAM-US-SAQLAIN.

A Short Story.

Vicissitude III.

THE NAUTCH GIRL.

MR. ALI HOSSAIN was very sad—very sad indeed. He felt that in spite of everything life was not worth living. The bitter drop that poisoned the joy of his life was the absolutely unreasonable jealousy of his wife. And his wife really had no cause to be jealous. He was quite devoted to her, but of course it was absurd of her to expect that he should not occasionally pay the tribute of innocent admiration to any one but her. And it was always purely innocent. In spite of his arguments, protests, and expostulations his wife persisted in being jealous. This morning there had been a terrible scene over a nautch girl, who had lately taken the town by storm, and whom he had praised—somewhat injudiciously—as he now reflected. But good heavens, his thoughts ran on. If he were like some men, his wife might with truth be jealous. He wished he could pay her out for once and make her sorry for her absolutely unfounded reproaches.

While he was thus reflecting moodily, seated in his study, a voice was heard calling to him from the verandah.

"Where are you, old chap?" and his brother-in-law, a gay young fellow of about 23, entered the room. "Well, how are you after last night's dissipation? I say Ali, the new nautch girl sings rippingly. Why don't you arrange to have a tamasha here one evening?"

"Oh shut up" was the savage answer, and Mr. Ali Hossain relapsed into gloomy silence.

"Why, what on earth has upset you? You look pretty blue, and you don't seem particularly amiable. Domestic troubles eh?" grinned the unsympathetic bachelor.

Ali Hossain could contain himself no longer. He unburthened himself of all his woes, but did not get much solace. His young brother-in-law seemed too overcome with merriment to say anything.

"I see nothing very funny," he growled. "I wish you were in my shoes, then perhaps you might sympathise with me a little more, instead of coming in with idiotic suggestions about having a nautch here."

The young fellow sobered down. "Sorry old man, but it really is comic from one point of view. Look here, I've got a good idea in my head. I think this will smooth matters for you and give you a little peace. Listen—" and he drew his chair near him and whispered a few words in his ear.

The other smiled and nodded and after a few minutes the cloud had quite vanished from Ali Hossain's face.

"By Jove, you're a brick," and linking arms, the two went out of the room together. In the afternoon Ali Hossain went to his wife's room. She received him coldly, still mindful of his misdemeanours. He did not sit down as usual, but said "I only came to tell you that we have arranged for some singing and dancing in the drawing-room this evening after dinner. Mrs. Leach wishes to hear some Indian music. The men will all leave as soon as dinner is over, so you need not keep purdah. All the ladies can sit in the drawing-room." He left the room immediately and gave her no time to reply.

Mrs. Ali Hossain was very angry. She felt sure her husband had done this on purpose to annoy her, especially after what she had said about that horrid nautch this morning. She half thought of refusing to appear, but on second thoughts decided it would not be advisable. Mrs. Leach was the Commissioner's wife—it would not do to offend her—and besides Mr. Ali Hossain rather admired Mrs. Leach. With a sigh Mrs. Ali Hossain began to prepare for the evening, mentally determining to make her husband pay for it all afterwards with compound interest.

Immediately after dinner the men left straight from the dining-room, and the ladies took their seats in the drawing-room. Mrs. Ali Hossain and her cousins were already waiting for them, and orders were given for the nautch to begin.

The nautch girl had arrived, but evidently was not quite ready to appear. A tent had been prepared for her and from where Mrs.

Ali Hossain sat she could catch glimpses of the men gathered round the canvas flap. Presently the curtain was lifted and Mr. Ali Hossain emerged with the hateful creature hanging on his arm. Mrs. Ali Hossain felt as though she could have stabbed them both. The nautch girl entered, followed by her musicians. She stared round her insolently. She certainly was a pretty creature, though rather masculine looking. Mr. Ali Hossain had crept in the room behind her, and stood near the door. He seemed unable to take his eyes off her. Every time she passed him in the dance she gave him a smile which set poor Mrs. Ali Hossain's fingers tingling. After a little time the English ladies wearied of the entertainment and went to their hostess's room to put on their wraps. After their departure Mrs. Ali Hossain returned to the drawing room. To her horror it was empty, but from her husband's study adjoining came the sound of hilarious laughter, the popping of bottles, and occasionally the clink of anklets and the twang of a sitar. Compelled by her jealousy she crept quietly to the door, peeped in and saw the brazen creature lying on the sofa and her husband bending down tenderly over her. This was enough to inflame the jealous woman beyond measure. Rushing in she prepared to denounce him in no measured terms, when the words were arrested on her lips by the sight of a wig of long black hair on the ground. Looking up she caught sight of the nautch girl's face plainly—and was greeted by bursts of loud laughter.

"Doesn't your brother make a pretty 'hair'?" For once Mrs. Ali Hossain was at a loss for an answer.

Mr. Ali Hossain has not the slightest hesitation now in expressing his admiration for any one. If his wife shows signs of becoming jealous he has only to utter two magical words—"Nautch Girl."

LIL

The S. P. M. R.

READER, are you an uncle?

Because, if so, will you join the S.P.M.R., or Society for the Protection of a Maligned Relationship? I cannot think you will refuse, because as things are it is difficult for a self-respecting man to admit that his brother or sister has forced this unsolicited distinction on him.

To begin with, the unlucky person so circumstanced has a millstone of tradition hung about his neck. Old and ingrained prejudice has rated uncles in the same category as baronets and step-mothers. Who ever heard it said, among the titles to respect of any famous man you please, that he was good uncle? I have searched the records, but in vain. On the other hand, history and literature are in a conspiracy to make the term synonymous with all that is prosy, preachy, overhearing, over-reaching, villainous! I have traced the slander as far back as Horace. Don't be an uncle to me, says one of his people, and another of them talks about "the lashes of an uncle's tongue." And see how it persists, when one still hears the phrase, "He talked to me like a Dutch uncle." (It would seem that the Dutch variety is especially pestilent). How can a man be expected to take up his uncular burden cheerfully, in the face of such obloquy? How can nephews and nieces rise superior to it? This, this and no other must be the reason why we never read in our newspapers that a grateful nephew has left uncle Robert residuary legatee, that a bereaved niece has erected a sumptuous mausoleum to the memory of uncle Ferdinand, where she may murmur to herself at midnight, "Oh me, my uncle's spirit is in these stones!" There will be a difference presently, or the S.P.M.R. will know the reason. And then uncles will be able to hold up their heads again in decent society.

To revert to that conspiracy. Passing over the wicked uncles of the Babes in the Wood—thus were our infant minds indoctrinated—the greatest name in literature is also the greatest offender. When one thinks of Claudius, King of Denmark, of King John, of Richard III—I heavy is the task, but the S.P.M.R. will not shrink from it. I will attempt a forecast of its methods.

Claudius. This amiable prince has been shockingly maligned presumably because he happened to be the younger Hamlet's uncle. The time has now come to offer to the world the latest flashlights of the lantern of historic research upon an obscure byway. (1) Claudius was the eldest son of his father, and consequently was kept out of his rightful dominion by the elder Hamlet, sui-disant King of Denmark. (2) Gertrude was originally betrothed to Claudius—a love-match on both sides—and was rudely snatched from his expectant arms by the said Hamlet. (3) The gentle and forbearing disposition of Claudius may be inferred from the fact that for over twenty years he left his brother in possession of his kingdom and his bride. Also (4) his keen sense of justice, which after constant deliberation spread over that period, did not permit him to allow such a disgraceful state of things to continue permanently. (5) The "taking off" of the elder Hamlet, thus admitted necessary, was effected in the least offensive manner possible, considering the period. (6) The celebrated "commission," pursued by the younger Hamlet on board-ship, was by him totally misconstrued, he being at the moment in one of his fits of cerebral derangement. As a matter of fact, Claudius packed him off to England to undergo a rest-cure.

Now for King John. John, surnamed Lackland, yet styled King of England! How explain the anomaly? By one word, and that word Arthur. Arthur's first act, on his worthy uncle's accession, was to rob him of Anjou, his second, to embroil him with the King of France. Such ingratitude is almost without parallel, even among nephews. And when Arthur was dead and gone, a mistaken view as to the manner of his exit caused poor John to forfeit Normandy. Shakespeare knew that Arthur was killed in falling from the battlements of a castle, what he did not know was that the lad, who had a passion for architecture, was estimating the altitude of the wall with his eye, and accidentally fell over.

Richard III. A peculiarly bad case of misrepresentation. If ever there lived a man overflowing with the milk of human kindness, it was Richard. Why, not even the Lady Anne, who had some surface reason for misjudging him, could hold out against the innate beauty of his disposition, coupled as it was with a modest ardour! Then, look at the callous indifference of his brother Clarence. Richard was ready to go all lengths, even to the extent of taking the pledge, in order to break Clarence of his fatal habit. He often said, "Malmsey will be the death of you, Clarence!" And so, alas, it was! Then, take his solicitude for his nephews. The boys were notoriously delicate, and the Tower, with its cheerful outlook on the river, was considered one of the most salubrious of the royal residences. That was why he sent the little princes there, to recruit after influenza. Of course, it transpired, later, that the drains were out of order, with results which everyone must deplore. But sanitation was then in its infancy, and it is most unfair to put the blame on Richard.

The above is only a tithe of what the S.P.M.R. has to say about this deeply misunderstood sovereign. Which reminds me as Honorary Treasurer that subscriptions are due, and may be sent to me at once, care of the Editor of this paper.

Oh—and the other day two men, strangers to each other, but obviously dog lovers, were sitting side by side in a railway carriage. With the first man was a Welsh terrier, who was taking an active interest in the second man's luncheon. Indeed, before it was over he managed to secure a mouthful. "You must give your dog a new name," said the second man, "you must call him 'Chancellor,' because he robs hen-roosts. These are chicken sandwiches." You don't see the application? Well, perhaps it isn't obvious, only the speaker happened to be

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

REPLYING to Colonel Yates regarding robberies in Persia, Sir Edward Grey was unable to say whether the payment of British and Indian commercial claims would be one of the objects of the next loan. The first object must be the restoration of order.

Reuter wires from St. Petersburg on the 6th.—The shrine at Meshed has been surrendered. The guardian of the Sanctuary has written thanking the Russians for respecting the tomb and mosque.

The incendiary Seyyid and twenty-four others were arrested. The robbers lost 39 killed and 26 wounded but the leaders escaped by a secret exit.

Reuter wires from Teheran on the 6th—Sir George Barclay, the British Minister, informed the Persian Foreign Minister yesterday that the British Government did not contemplate entering into direct negotiations with the chiefs of the Southern tribes.

To-day he informed the Persian Government that the British troops at Bushire would be withdrawn when the assailants of Mr. Smart, the British Consul, had been captured and punished.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT)

Teheran, March 15.

AN UNDERGROUND crisis exists in the Cabinet regarding the much delayed answer to the Anglo-Russian Note. It is customary for the minute authorizing all such documents to be signed by all the Ministers, but in this instance the Foreign Minister has hitherto not succeeded in inducing all his colleagues to append their signatures. The form of the answer has also not been settled, as the Government is making a prolonged fight over the army question, endeavouring, before agreeing to enter upon a discussion, to commit the two Legations to the employment of officers of minor powers only. This is unacceptable, as Russia does not approve of the appointment of officers other than Russian—even though they are from a minor Power—in Tabriz and other important northern towns.

In the light of recent history the recalcitrance of the Cabinet is generally regarded as futile, yet, curiously, Ministers appear to have derived encouragement in their opposition, particularly on this very point of officers for the army, from the recent debate in the House of Commons.

It is probably impossible to find any student of politics in Teheran to-day who would not say that by accepting all the Anglo-Russian proposals and warmly cultivating Russian friendship it would be possible for Persia to save the framework of her independence. On the other hand, worse will certainly befall her from a policy of ineffectual resistance or of perpetual compliance under protest.

Teheran, March 17.

The reply to the Anglo-Russian Note is believed to be now ready, as the two Powers have given Persia an assurance that they have no desire to limit the size of the army, and do not object to the employment of officers of the minor Powers for the army as well as the Gendarmery. This assurance, naturally, does not refer to the Cossack Brigade, the officers of which will always be Russian, and does not lay down any principle restricting the army to the services of officers of the minor Powers.

In accordance with the Anglo-Russian proposal contained in the Note, the Government is already disbanding the fedais. The disarmament so far is proceeding quietly.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

Teheran, March 22.

The following is a summary of the Persian reply presented yesterday to the Anglo-Russian Note of February 18.—

The Persian Government, deeply touched by the good intentions of the two neighbouring Powers, and animated by the desire to give their proposals the most favourable consideration, has the honour to state the following:—

(1) The Government accepts the Anglo-Russian advance of £200,000 at 7 per cent. to be secured by the surplus revenues from the northern and southern Customs and to be a first charge on the next loan.

(2) The Treasurer-General will be entrusted with the control of the expenditure of the advance, a considerable portion of which will be allocated to the organisation of a Gendarmery under Swedish officers.

As regards the other points of the Anglo-Russian Note, the Persian Government, being convinced that respect for the integrity and independence of Persia, as well as its pacific development, is an object of sincere solicitude to the two friendly Governments, shows its pleasure at these good dispositions by the following reply:—

(1) With a view to evincing its sincere desire to establish on a solid basis of friendship and confidence Persian relations with the Governments of Great Britain and Russia, the Persian Government will take care to make its policy conform to the principles of the Convention of 1907, while taking note of the assurances contained in the preamble of the said Convention.

(2) After the withdrawal of Mohammed Ali and Salar-ed-Dowleh from Persian territory, the Mujahids [Nationalist volunteers] will be disbanded, and the other irregular forces will be gradually trained and incorporated in the regular army;

(3) One of the fundamental points of the Cabinet's programme is the organisation of an effective army proportionate to the needs of the country. The Persian Government will inform the two legations of its programme of military organisation, so that a friendly exchange of views can take place;

(4) Concerning Mohammed Ali an agreement has been reached and will form the subject of a separate Note.

Having thus given proofs of its goodwill, the Persian Government hopes to obtain the effective help of the two Powers on the following points:—

(1) A loan necessary for the realisation of reforms, the conditions of which would involve merely questions of interest, amortisation, and security;

(2) The evacuation, as soon as possible, of Persian territory by the foreign troops.—(Reuter.)

A further Reuter telegram from Teheran states that the reply is considered entirely satisfactory.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT)

Teheran, March 22.

In connection with the Persian reply to the Anglo-Russian Note I learn that a curious difficulty, which has been safely surmounted, was raised by two Continental Powers regarding the Anglo-Russian Note. It will be remembered that the preamble of the Convention states that Great Britain and Russia desire equal advantages for the trade and industry of other nations, but it appears to be considered in certain quarters that Persia by accepting the Convention might destroy the value of this statement regarding other nations in the preamble since the Persian recognition of the subsequent test might result in the exclusion of other countries from commercial advantages except in the neutral zone. The two Powers in question have accordingly informed Persia that if her reply to the Anglo-Russian Note conflicted with the policy of the open door or their existing commercial treaties with Persia containing most favoured-nation clauses, these Powers would not recognise such a reply nor accept its consequences. The Persian Foreign Minister, with the full approval of the Anglo-Russian Legations, drew the attention of the two Powers to the clause in the preamble, and stated that this would hold good. The reply seems to have fully satisfied the Powers in question, and no further step has been taken.

St. Petersburg, Tuesday

In contradiction to the reports which have appeared in the newspapers to the effect that the situation at Tabriz is threatening, an official communiqué states that no ground exists for the adoption of further extraordinary measures. It is pointed out that the recent domiciliary search for arms was without result, and only had the effect of irritating the population.

"Moreover," the communiqué significantly remarks, as the Russian court-martial has already passed death sentences upon 37 persons, and the Acting Governor of Azerbaijan has inflicted the death penalty upon 50 others, there is no need for repressive measures beyond those already taken. Life in town is now resuming its normal course.

The present Governor of Azerbaijan is Samad Khan, a partisan of the ex-Shah, who had been in open rebellion for several months before his appointment as Governor by the Russians.—(Reuter)

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN")

The Nouvelles Vremya prints some telegrams from its Persian correspondents which lead one to think that perhaps the Russo-British demands have been modified in some points. The demand for the disarming of the Bakhtiari, it would appear, met with a serious difficulty. The Regent refused to give his consent to this measure, which he fears would provoke disorders, and in the absence of regular troops jeopardise the existing state of things. If, the Regent declared, the two Powers should insist on carrying out the disarmament, he would have no option but to leave the responsibility to them and resign.

At Tabriz the process of disarming the population has encountered some check, the nature of which is not explained. According to the St. Petersburg journal, out of 15,000 rifles imported from Russia only 600 have been seized, and cartridges are openly sold in the streets at prices below their actual cost. The whole Armenian quarter is alleged to be armed to the teeth and ready to break out in revolt at any moment. There is no means of checking these statements, but one is inclined to doubt their exactness and suspect on the part of the Nouvelles Vremya a desire to create an atmosphere of uneasiness that may strengthen the hands of the Government in refusing to withdraw the troops. It is, as a matter of fact, announced that according to orders received from St. Petersburg the troops at Kazvin will remain there "for some time yet."

"The new Turkish Ambassador, Emin Bey, arrived here to-day. The Persian Government apparently took all possible measures to efface the affront which he received on his arrival at Enzeh, where owing to all the guns having been removed by the Russians he did not receive the customary salute. The Ambassador drove into Teheran in a State carriage drawn by six horses which had been sent for his conveyance, and escorted by a large body of troops. A salute was fired as he entered the city gates"—(Reuter)

England and Persia.

THE reply of the Persian Government to the demands put upon it by England and Russia is a rebuke to both. The Persian Government declares that it is "deeply touched" by our good intentions in Persia. We do not like such "deep touches," and we hope that there will be no occasion for them in the future. On the nature of the new Anglo-Russian scheme in Persia, the reply sheds little light, but that little, so far as it goes, is not unfavourable. The loan of £200,000 for which Persia expresses such gratitude will hardly see her over a couple of months' expenditure, but the proceeds of the loan, small as they are, will be subjected to the control of the Treasurer General, who will devote a considerable portion of it to the organisation of a police force under Swedish officers. The Treasurer General is, of course, Mr. Shuster's successor. He is a Belgian, M. Mercard, who is believed to be under Russian influences, and the officering of the new force by Swedes is perhaps to be regarded as an example of the kind of concession that Sir Edward Grey has been able to wring out of Russia in the negotiations. For the rest, the reply of the Persian Government is more encouraging than we had ventured to hope. We gather that as the result of the Agreement that has been forced upon her the Persian Government will conform to the "principles" of the Anglo-Russian Convention of 1907, will disband its irregular forces, and will obey the wishes of the two Governments in its military organisation. We had feared worse things than these. The new Agreement, so far as can be gathered from the Persian reply, says nothing about European control except over the police and the army; and subject to these exceptions and to the raising of interest on the new loan the new scheme would seem to leave the new Government quite unfettered. But it is very wrong that we have not had from the Foreign Secretary a full account of the new proposals that have been made. If the Persian Government can publish its reply, surely it is time for us to know what were the contents of the Note to which it has replied.

But what are the principles of the Agreement of 1907 to which the Persian Government has now given its adherence? The April number of the Asiatic Quarterly Review contains an article by Mr. H. F. B. Lynch which is the clearest exposition of these principles that we have yet seen. Mr. Lynch quotes with great effect from the speech of Sir E. Grey on the Agreement with Russia in February, 1908. "Under the Agreement," he said, "we bind ourselves not to seek certain concessions of a certain kind in certain spheres. Buthese (he continued) 'are only British and Russian spheres in a sense which is in no way derogatory to the independence and sovereignty of Persia.' The maintenance of Persian independence is the fundamental principle of the convention, and by it everything that is done under the Convention will have to be judged. 'Nobody,' writes Mr. Lynch, 'desires to deprive Russia of any legitimate influence in Northern Persia. Let her apply her capital and industry to the development of the country. It will be good for Persia, good for Russia, and good for the rest of the world. That is quite a different thing from covering the country with her troops and performing acts of sovereignty which are wholly incompatible with the bedrock principle of her Convention with ourselves.' Persia, under protest, has signed a declaration by which she binds herself to respect the 'principles' of the Anglo-Russian Convention. These are not inimical to Persian independence on Sir E. Grey's own showing. But if the terms of the new arrangement are such as to impair that independence, we shall not be taken in by talk of maintaining 'principles.' The old Anglo-Russian Convention, as we knew it, will have been torn up, and in its place will have been substituted a new Agreement.—Manchester Guardian.

Mohammed Ali ex-Shah.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Odessa, March 18

MOHAMMED ALI SHAH, with three followers, arrived here yesterday morning at 8.45 by the so-called Baku express, a train that occupies ninety-six hours between the two termini. His arrival, although previously announced in the local Press, attracted no public attention. The only local authority to receive the royal exile was the Assistant Policemaster. With his wife and two younger sons the ex-Shah proceeded in automobiles to the villa in the Sturdsakaya in the Langeron suburb. About noon the Acting Governor, Colonel Ilin, called upon Mohammed Ali and remained in private consultation with him for an hour and a half. Although the subject of the earnest conversation has not, of course, been allowed to transpire, it is generally surmised that His Excellency was the purveyor of certain commands or instructions from the Government to the returned ex-Shah with reference to his future domicile and other arrangements. Colonel Ilin had a second interview to-day.

Mohammed Ali declines absolutely to accord audiences either to local or foreign Press representatives. It has leaked out, however, that the "Persian Pretender" is much depressed and in a very unamiable mood. That is not a matter for surprise, seeing that his last hope of regaining his lost throne has now been finally dissipated. It is further understood that Mohammed Ali is under the impression, or delusion, that Russia was the cause of the failure of his attempted raid upon Teheran and his reinstatement as ruling head of the Kajar dynasty. Whether he had really some kind of provisional promise of support from Russia when he surreptitiously left Odessa last July to prosecute his forlorn campaign will probably only be discovered by the future historian.

It is rumoured to-day that the ex-Shah prefers to take up his permanent residence in England rather than in Russia. That is very likely merely a passing preference, arising from his present resentment towards his Russian host. He will, no doubt, when he cools down and regains a more philosophic mood, perceive the prudence and expediency of accepting the advice of the Russian Government with regard to his future arrangements and place of domicile; on his compliance with the expressed wishes of Russia and England depends the payment of his pension of £9,000 per annum.

The spacious and luxuriously furnished residence provided for him in the Gigol Street is no longer at his disposal, and for the present Mohammed Ali, with his family, suite and attendants, is rather incommodiously housed in a villa of a dozen comparatively small rooms.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

The Westminster Gazette publishes a telegram received from Mr. Ameer Ali from the British Red Crescent Mission in Tripoli asking Mr. Ameer Ali to appeal to Britain, India, Egypt and British Colonies for funds for the relief of the refugee coast population. Mr. Ameer Ali remarks, "India is doing her best, may we not look to Britain for assistance?"

The first Turkish elections are proceeding under conditions exciting the gravest dissatisfaction among the Opposition parties, particularly among Christians, which accuse the party of Union and Progress of employing the most arbitrary methods for excluding or terrorising the Opposition voters.

Italy has extended the blockade to the Southern Yemen coast and also northward so as to include Loheia, but neutral vessels proceeding to Camaran, the sanitary station in connection with Mecca pilgrimage, will be allowed access thereto under surveillance of blocking vessels.

Reuter wires from Port Said on the 9th.—The Italian merchant cruiser Duca Di Genova, which receives a subvention from Government, has captured a Greek steamer carrying contraband and taken her to Tobruk.

The Times correspondent telegraphs from Cairo that Edhem Pasha, Turkish Commander at Tobruk, has arrived from Tripoli. He says that the Turkish troops still number ten thousand assisted by two hundred thousand Arabs and that they can hold out for a year. The Turks recently fired at and brought down an Italian aeroplane at Benghazi.

At a recent meeting of the Indian Red Crescent Society, it was resolved to send a telegram to (1) H.I.M. the Sultan, (2) H.H. the Grand Vizier, (3) Asim Bey, Foreign Minister, and (4) Ahmad Riza Bey, late President, Turkish Parliament, to the effect that Moslem feeling is intensely against recognition of Italian rights in Tripoli.

The following translation of an extract from a private letter to the Secretary from Ahmed Riza Bey may be of interest:—"Do not be discouraged. There is no peril at home. There are simply squalls engendered by the politics of the moment and they are sure to vanish in due course. The Society of Union and Progress is ever influenced by the desire to use its influence for the renovation of the country and the welfare of the Ottomans. You must make this fact known and aid us in our patriotic enterprise."

REUTER wires from Constantinople on the 10th:—The Powers are agreed as to the terms of the Porte with regard to the termination of the Turko-Italian war. They will point out the desirability of peace in the interests of Europe generally and request the Porte to signify the conditions on which it is prepared to terminate hostilities in view of the offer of the Powers to mediate.

THE Times is publishing a series of articles on the British Army in Egypt. It praises in the highest terms Sir John Maxwell's able leadership, the keenness of officers, and the splendid training and vigour of the men, but is strongly of opinion that the present strength of the Army of Occupation is dangerously low, especially in view of possibilities arising from the Turko-Italian war. The Times urges that when the troops are withdrawn from South Africa, they should be sent to Egypt, which is an incomparable training ground, is healthy for British troops, and inexpensive.

Vienna, March 15.

AN OFFICIAL TELEGRAM from Salonika states that an Albanian band ambushed the escort of Hadji Adil Bey, the Turkish Minister of the Interior, on the road between Ipek and Djakova. Secrecy is maintained as to the number of victims. A wounded officer of the escort has been brought to Uskub. Hadji Adil Bey has sent a battalion of infantry and several guns against the aggressors.

Vienna, March 17.

Competent opinions differ whether the advent of peace will be hastened by the Italian condition. Save on the one point of annexation, which is not open to discussion, they are felt to offer Turkey the chance of an honourable and not unprofitable settlement. But it has long been clear that the Committee of Union and Progress has in view rather its own interests as a political organization than the general interest of the Ottoman Empire. The end of the war might prove to be the beginning of the long-deferred reckoning with the Committee. It is, moreover, possible that the Committee will regard the very largeness of the Italian conditions as a sign that Italian resistance is weakening and that, with a little more squeezing, Italy would be still more open-handed. It could make no greater blunder. However much or little truth there may be in the rumours of a Russo-Italian agreement for joint action against the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles, it is quite certain that, if the Committee continues to obstruct a tolerable settlement, a hard blow will be hit at some vital spot of the Ottoman Empire.

The effect of such a blow upon the Balkan States and the Christian races of Macedonia cannot be foreseen, but, apart from this consideration, it must not be forgotten that the Cretan question is gradually assuming a character as menacing as it has ever possessed. The Powers are believed to admit the practical impossibility of preventing the Cretan Deputies from reaching Athens and the futility of expecting the Greek Government to shoot, imprison, or expel the Cretan representatives. If the island be re-occupied by international forces, the Venezelos Cabinet is likely to fall, and with it the only guarantee possessed by Europe that Greece will, on the one hand, pursue a moderate policy, and that, on the other, the dynastic crisis will not be re-opened.

The moment seems, therefore, to be approaching when the Powers who have hitherto viewed the Near Eastern crisis from the standpoint of their immediate individual interests will be confronted with the alternative of undertaking unanimous action in Constantinople in regard both to the Tripolitan and the Cretan question of allowing matters to take a course which only one of the miracles of Allah, invoked by Field-Marshal von der Goltz, can prevent from becoming catastrophic.

Constantinople, March 18.

An Iradeh was issued to-day sanctioning the addition of two new articles to the existing Press Law. The first requires all persons who desire to publish a newspaper in the capital to deposit £T.500 with the Government as a guarantee. In the case of provincial newspapers only £T.100 is required. Would-be founders of Ottoman journals are further required to prove that they have been blessed with an education in Government secondary schools or corresponding unofficial institutions. The second article forbids officers of the active and reserve forces and ex-officers to contribute articles dealing with foreign or internal politics to the Press, under pain of imprisonment ranging from a week to six months.

This addition to the Press Law, which will effectually prevent ex Colonel Sadik Bey and other leaders of the Union and Liberty Party from expressing their views in the Press, has caused much indignation among the Opposition, while the first of the new article is vigorously criticized by practically the whole Press, including the Tanin and the Jeune Turc.

Another Iradeh published to-day sanctions the new law further restricting the right of public meeting, and inflicting penalties ranging from a week to five years' imprisonment, with hard labour, for infractions of it. In spite of semi-official assurances that the court-martial will be abolished in a few days' time and the Imperial declaration that the above mentioned laws, though put into operation at once, will be submitted for the approval of the Chamber when it meets, public opinion appears unfavourably impressed.

Sofia, March 18.

Shukri Bey, General Secretary in the Turkish Ministry of the Interior, and Abdul Kerim, Inspector of Public Instruction, have arrived here to ask the representatives of the Macedonian Internal Organization what reforms would satisfy them and under what conditions they would put a stop to the bomb explosions and revolutionary activity. The representatives of the Organization gave the uncompromising reply that the Organization refused to negotiate with the Turkish Government and would continue its revolutionary activity until it had attained its object—autonomy through international European intervention.

St. Petersburg, March 21.

Professors Miletich and Georgov of Sofia University have arrived here as delegates of the Macedonian Committee to agitate in favour of European intervention against the atrocities perpetrated by the Turks. A Press campaign has already been started. In leading articles and interviews they insist on the revival of the programme of reforms outlined at the Reval meeting. The delegates proceed hence to London and other capitals.

Vienna, March 15.

The Austrian Premier, Count Sturgkh, replying to-day to an interpellation upon the rumours of an impending bombardment of Salonica by Italian warships, stated that the rumours were unfounded and that, according to official information, there was for the present no danger of a bombardment of the city.

An official telegram from Constantinople announces, on the other hand, that the Turkish Ministry of Marine has called upon the French mining company at Heraklea to hold its entire stock of coal at the disposal of the Government. It is supposed, adds the telegram, that the coal is needed for the movements of the fleet in the Dardanelles.

The Neues Wiener Tagblatt reports, "from a well-informed quarter" at Berlin that the removal of M. Tcharykoff from Constantinople was due to his partiality for the Young Turks. His attitude increased the difficulty of an agreement between Constantinople and Rome, whereas M. Sazonoff desires to put an end to the war. Rome and St. Petersburg, adds the Tagblatt, are now in close touch and are certainly weaving at a web dangerous to Turkey. Apart from the strong interests of Russia that peace should be concluded before movements in Macedonia begin, care for the corn trade of Odessa obliges the Russian Government to contemplate measures for the removal of obstacles to the navigation of the Dardanelles.

Constantinople, March 15

Russia has applied to the Porte for its assent to the appointment of M. de Giers, the Russian Minister at Bukarest, to succeed M. Tcharykoff as Russian Ambassador in Constantinople.—Reuter.

St. Petersburg, March 19

The Turkish Embassy denies the advance of the Anatolian Army Corps towards the Persian frontier. The denial is not received with conviction in Russian official circles. The persistent increase of Turkish forces at Urumiah within the debatable zone and even within undoubtedly Persian territory is somewhat inconsistent with the Embassy's assurances.

Constantinople, March 17

Most of the Turkish newspapers comment on the attempt on the life of the King of Italy, and with the exception of the newly-founded paper Lakk, they express condemnation of the act. The Lakk, however, greets the attempt as the precursor of a revolution in Italy.

The Tanin sees in it a symptom of the real state of mind prevailing in Italy, which, the newspaper says, the Italian Government is striving to conceal from Europe.

The Jeune Turc declares that the whole of the Ottoman Empire is feeling indignation at the odious attempt. This journal attributes the act to the disenchantment of the Italian people whom a maladroit and adventurous policy has thrust into the impasse of a war from which the Italian Government no longer knows how to extricate itself.—Reuter.

The Times received from Sulaiman Bustani Effendi, formerly Deputy for Beirut in the Turkish Chamber and now a member of the Senate, a letter in which he says—

"I have read with great astonishment the communication of your Vienna correspondent in this morning's issue of the Times, in which he gives currency to an atrocious rumour that the despicable attempt on the life of the King of Italy was inspired from Turkey. In the first place, allow me to express my deepest abhorrence, which will be shared by every Ottoman, at the attempted crime, and, in the second place, to give expression to my intense indignation and the indignation of my fellow-citizens at the extravagant and wild insinuation."

Constantinople, March 18.

The Ministry of War has decided to create a school and training ground for military aviation at Bulgurici, above Scutari, on the Asiatic shore of the Bosphorus. Credits amounting to £17,000 have been granted for this purpose and for the purchase of the services of foreign instructors and pilots. Two Turkish officers, who are at present studying aviation in Paris, will preside over the school, and two aeroplanes of French or, according to some accounts, of Belgian make, have arrived here. A national subscription has been opened in favour of the "Fourth Arm."

Cairo, March 20.

According to a report received here, Enver Bey, one of the Turkish commanders in Tripoli, has been wounded. It is not stated whether the wound is slight or serious, and in view of the difficulty of obtaining trustworthy information from the Turkish camp, it is impossible to say whether the report is more than a mere idle rumour.

Canea, March 15.

The crisis has apparently come to an end. To-day the Assembly met and after stormy deliberations decided to elect a permanent Commission of 81 members, including the President and the Bureau of the Assembly, from whom five, selected from the various parties, will form an executive body holding office in rotation for one month. The Commission will be entrusted with the election of 69 Deputies to the Greek Chamber on March 24th the date of the elections in Greece.

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURC.")

(Specially translated for the "Comrade.")

THE Terdjuman-i Ittihat publishes the following telegram dated the 5th March received from Ertoghul Bey, an Ottoman volunteer at Derna—"We have been in action for 11 hours. The enemy has been pushed back and has suffered enormous losses. Immense booty has fallen into our hands. This victory of ours is brilliant and decisive."

The Agence Ottomane has received the following communication from the Ministry of War—

From Homs—Our troops after having re-occupied the hill of Mergheb have been obliged again to abandon it. The Italians having received considerable reinforcements delivered their attack simultaneously from three sides and were supported by the guns of the naval squadron. Two guns of the Italian Mountain Artillery were, however, put hors de service by us and had to be abandoned by them.

From Tripoli—A detachment of a hundred men of Tadjoura and Djefara delivered an attack against Tadjoura and in the course of action five Tadjourais who had been armed by Italians and fired on our soldiers were taken prisoners and two others were killed. The five prisoners were court-martialled, with the result that two have been condemned to death and three sentenced to a term of imprisonment.

In the morning two Italian dirigibles appeared over Zanzur and dropped five bombs on our soldiers. Fortunately no one was hit.

From Derna.—Five of our men quietly approached in the night the fort situated to the east of Akaba and fulfilled the purpose for which they were sent. They also destroyed with bombs a turret of the fort and killed the sentry.

According to Zeit (Vienna) the coal strike in Great Britain threatens to paralyse the action of the Italian fleet, which depends mainly on England for its coal supply.

The Agence Ottomane has received the following information from the Ministry of War—

"According to a telegram received from the Commandant at Homs, which was forwarded to the Minister of War by the Commandant at Tripoli, the Ottomans have delivered another attack in the night on the Italians. This attack was directed on the Italian position on the Mergheb mountain and was completely successful, the position in question being captured eventually by our soldiers. The action continues."

According to a telegram from Enver Bey sent from Derna, in the night a detachment of our soldiers, composed of Regulars and Militia, which was placed in ambush in the environments of the Italian fortifications, suddenly opened fire at 40 metres distance on an Italian battalion, of which an officer and 30 men were killed. Another Italian battalion has also suffered considerable losses. Enver Bey wires that our losses might well be called a little bleeding of the nose.

According to a telegram received from the Commandant at Henghazi, 25 horsemen of the Magaribe tribe made a sudden onslaught on a battalion of the enemy, put it to rout completely, killed 20 men, and captured four mules and a quantity of arms and ammunition.

Another telegram received from Colonel Neshat Bey informs the War Office that a body of Italian Infantry which comprised 500 Erythrean soldiers, under the command of Italian officers, delivered an attack on an Ottoman detachment of about 100 men. The action lasted from 3 o'clock in the morning till sundown. Our detachment was quickly reinforced and thereupon took the offensive. The action resulted in the enemy retreating and being pursued up to Ain Zara. Owing to darkness we could not exactly ascertain the extent of the Italian losses, but on the route our soldiers found 20 dead bodies which the Italians could not carry away. Two Erythrean Mussalmans have been taken prisoner and many rifles and mules have also fallen into our hands. Our casualties were 6 dead and 13 wounded.

Berlin, March 17.

THE Italian reply to the inquiries of Russia and the other Powers concerning the conditions upon which hostilities with Turkey might be terminated is described by the North German Gazette as being precise and fully corresponding with the form of the question. It is remarked that even if there is no immediate consequence in the sense of a termination of the state of war it is valuable that the exchange of views promoted by Russia will be continued in the light of the Italian reply.

There is in reality no great optimism here, but the Foreign Office appears still to believe in the possibility, at any rate, of an armistice.

Rome, March 17.

In spite of official denials of the statement published in the Corriere della Sera on Saturday, there is reason to believe that the terms of peace as stated are substantially correct and I am therefore sending a résumé.—

The Marquis di San Giuliano yesterday afternoon consigned into the hands of the Ambassadors of the Great Powers a Note containing certain conditions the fulfilment of which would induce Italy to consent to the cessation of hostilities.

The Note may be divided into four parts—an introduction, a summary of the fundamental ideas of the Italian Government on the situation, an enumeration of the conditions on which peace may be based, and a conclusion.

The Note opens with an expression of thanks on the part of the Italian Government to the Powers for their idea of mediation and a full agreement with the reasons which led them to that step. It briefly states the causes which led Italy to declare war on Turkey, and accentuates her determination to preserve at all costs the Balkan status quo ante.

It proclaims the perfect willingness of the Italian Government to discuss the conditions which may lead to peace, but insists on the recognition by Turkey of the full and complete sovereignty of Italy in Tripoli and Cyrenaica.

It demands the withdrawal of all Turkish troops and officials from Tripoli, at the same time guaranteeing the abolition on the part of Italy of the increased Customs duties.

Seven points are then defined as necessary and reciprocal concessions on the part of both Italy and Turkey:—

1. Recognition on the part of Italy of the religious and spiritual authority of the Khalif in Tripolitania and Cyrenaica, with this proviso, however, that such authority does not, in any way, control or influence the administrative and political systems in those countries. [The conditions, in short, should be identical with those contained in Article 4 of the Austro-Turkish Agreement concerning Bosnia and Herzegovina in February, 1909.]

2. Respect, on the part of the Italian Government, of the religious liberty, uses, and customs of the Moslem population.

3. Italy's assurance of the complete immunity of that part of the population which might have taken up arms against her.

4. A guarantee to the creditors of the Ottoman Public Debt of a sum of money corresponding to that produced by the Customs of Tripoli and Cyrenaica.

5. Full purchase of the property of the Ottoman Government in these two vilayets.

6. Re-establishment by Turkey of the status quo before the war, in all that concerns postal arrangements, Customs dues, and Italian schools, and at the same time a promise on the part of the Italian Government to abolish Italian post offices in the Turkish Empire when other Powers possessing similar offices in Turkey shall have suppressed theirs. The Italian Government also proposes to substitute for her present private agreements with Turkey a régime of International Law, so soon as the other Great Powers accept the same conditions. Italy also demands that Turkey should settle claims of Italian citizens in the Empire which were existing before war was declared. She would consent that such claims should be submitted either to The Hague Tribunal or to a mixed Court.

7. Italy would not be averse to taking such measures as should lead to an agreement of the Great Powers to assure efficaciously the integrity of the Turkish Empire.

The article concludes with a declaration of the irrevocable determination of Italy to preserve, as the basis of all conditions of peace, her inviolable right to the sovereignty of Tripoli and Cyrenaica.

Paris, March 19.

It is stated that the Turkish Ambassador, Rifaat Pasha, at his interview with M. Poincaré yesterday, informed the Prime Minister that the Turkish Government could not entertain the Italian terms of peace in the form in which they have become semi-officially known in Constantinople.

(FROM THE "TIMES.")

We published yesterday from our Rome Correspondent a résumé of an article in the Corriere della Sera giving what there is reason to believe is a substantially accurate account of the memorandum in which the Marquis di San Giuliano informed the Ambassadors of the Powers of the conditions on which Italy would be ready to make peace with Turkey. As the Italian attitude with regard to the recognition of Italian sovereignty in Tripoli and Cyrenaica was not clearly brought out in that résumé and as the point is of capital importance, we give below a full translation of the passage in question.—

To-day the step taken by the Powers opens the way to a cessation of hostilities, if not to a real and genuine formal treaty of peace. The Italian Government consequently declares itself ready to discuss the conditions which could lead to a settlement. This settlement should imply for Turkey the implicit recognition of the new state of things (nuovo stato di fatto) created by Italy in Libya and on the part of the Powers the recognition of the new juridical situation (stato di diritto), or, in other words, of the sovereignty proclaimed by Italy over the two African provinces which belonged to Turkey.

The formula adopted by the Italian Government would not therefore oblige the Ottoman Government to sign a treaty of peace in which the sovereignty of Italy over Libya should be expressly recognized. It would be sufficient for us in substance that our sovereignty should be recognized by the Powers and that Turkey should desist from hostilities.

In addition to the parts of the article summarized yesterday, the following deserves attention.—

And thus, continues the memorial, Italy, while pursuing by all the means that she may think useful the operation of war, declares herself disposed to examine, moreover, other eventual conditions that the Powers on their initiative—always on the basis of the irrevocable sovereignty of Italy over Libya—may wish to put forward for safeguarding as completely as possible the amour propre or prestige of Turkey.

(“MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.”)

According to the Italian press, the Marquis di San Giuliano's Memorandum comprises four parts. In the first the Italian Government thanks the Great Powers for their initiative, the second is devoted to a review of the Italian claims in Tripoli, the third sets forth the Italian terms of peace, and the fourth concludes the argument.

The Journal des Débats commenting upon this reply, points out that the first part contains only what is due to the Great Powers, inasmuch as the Ambassadors only acted “by the desire of the Consulta [the Italian Foreign Office], which was anxious to indicate officially the conditions on which it would be inclined to make peace without appearing to take the initiative in the matter.” As regards the second part the journal agrees that the war is a danger to Europe, but declares that “the responsibility for this perilous situation rests no doubt upon Italy, which declares war on Turkey without the slightest provocation.” The journal pronounces that the Italian arguments to justify that piece of aggression are still less valid than those by which Count von Aehrenthal tried in October, 1908, to justify the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina. Austria was, at least in effective occupation of the two provinces, whereas Italy to this day is powerless to proceed to the real conquest of Tripoli.

Passing to the third and most important part of the Italian Memorandum, the Journal des Débats notes with satisfaction a certain progress in the conception of the Italian Government concerning the real state of things, inasmuch as it no longer demands the explicit recognition of the Italian annexation of Tripoli by Turkey, but merely desires a tacit acknowledgment of accomplished facts in the form of withdrawal of the Turkish troops. The Paris journal, however, points out that even this modified demand raises a number of difficulties, among which the question of the treatment of the Arabs, who will certainly continue the fight, occupies not the last place. Are the Arabs to be treated as belligerents, or will they be regarded as rebels?

As for the other conditions indicated by the Consulta, the Debats shows that they are faithfully modelled upon those on which the Austro-Turkish conflict was settled in 1909. They include the recognition of the spiritual authority of the Sultan, complete religious tolerance, a general amnesty, a promise to suppress the Italian post offices in Turkey and to renounce the privileges enjoyed under the capitulations if other Powers should do likewise, the payment of a vested indemnity estimated at £3,200,000, and lastly a guarantee of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire.

The Debats justly observes that these terms would all prove acceptable if only the first one were absent. As it is, both the Cabinet by proclaiming and the Italian Chamber by endorsing the annexation of the still unconquered provinces had committed a fatal mistake, and Turkey, short of renouncing her independence as a State, cannot agree to recognise her own dismemberment. “Turkey will only bow before an accomplished fact. Italy by proclaiming the annexation has undertaken to conquer the two provinces, and so long as she is not mistress of the country over which she claims sovereignty she will not be in a position to compel recognition of that sovereignty."

It would appear that the Italian Government by demanding in its recent Memorandum, in reply to the démarche of the Ambassadors, the recognition of the annexation of the two Turkish provinces by the Great Powers has committed a new grave mistake. The Rome correspondent of the Temps sends the following significant message to his journal:—"People are asking themselves here whether the Powers will not be prevented from making an eventual démarche at Constantinople by the demand of the Italian Government that the annexation of Tripoli should be recognised by them apart from and before the recognition of the accomplished fact, which is claimed from Turkey. Such a recognition would clearly be contrary to the neutrality which the Powers have repeatedly declared to be the guiding principle of their attitude towards the two belligerents. This initial mistake may well prove enough to bring about the definitive collapse of all attempts at mediation."

That the writer, who is notoriously pro-Italian, is not mistaken can be seen from a telegram in the Stèle from its correspondent at Constantinople. It says that the Turkish Cabinet has been semi-officially informed of the contents of the Italian Note and has decided to refuse the Italian offers without further ado. In these circumstances it questions whether the Great Powers will transmit these offers to the Porte at all. "It is noted that Italy is demanding the recognition of the annexation not from Turkey but from the Powers, a procedure which will have this result—that several Governments, three at least, will, in order to avoid the appearance of acceding to this demand and of departing from the attitude of strict neutrality which they have assumed from the beginning of the hostilities, refuse to submit the Italian terms to Constantinople. It is as well to note," the message adds, "that these Governments (which include the French Government) have not replied to Italy's notification of the decree of annexation, and have informed the Italian Government when inquiring about its terms of peace that they would not transmit them if unacceptable to Turkey."

There can thus be no doubt that the attempt at mediation undertaken by the Powers has collapsed even before it has been carried out in its entirety. Bearing in mind that it was set on foot by Russia who is already responsible for two previous equally unsuccessful attempts, and that it certainly responded to the wishes of, if it was not actually suggested by, the Russian Foreign Office it is scarcely surprising to find that the Porte is awaiting further developments with anxiety, and attaches considerable credence to the rumours that Italy will now try to carry out a coup de force in the Dardanelles, and that Russia will assist her in this. The Constantinople correspondent of the Stèle says in fact:—"In view of the collapse of mediation everyone is expecting some decisive action on the part of Italy—more particularly an attack on the Dardanelles. On the other hand it is asserted that Russia on her part is contemplating the possibility of taking advantage of the situation, and that to an attack on the Straits by Italy will correspond a bombardment of the Bosphorus by the Russian navy, which at present is cruising in the Black Sea close to the entrance of the Straits. The sudden recall of M. Tcharykoff, the appointment to Constantinople of M. de Giers, who is a brother of the Russian Ambassador at Vienna, and the audience which the latter has just had with the Emperor Francis Joseph—all these facts lead one to believe in the existence of an entente between Russia and Austria—an entente which will permit M. Sazonoff to realise his schemes."

The Porte having through its Ambassadors notified the Great Powers that the Italian terms of peace would not be acceptable to it, the British, French and German Ambassadors at Constantinople have, according to the reliable information of the Constantinople correspondent of the Stèle called individually at the Porte, assuring the Turkish Cabinet that the Governments which they represent are more than ever determined to observe strict neutrality in the conflict between Turkey and Italy. The correspondent of the Paris Journal concludes from this that if Russia were now to approach the Porte with the terms of the Italian Government her action could not assume the form of diplomatic pressure, and would in any case be futile. "This," he observes, "is the epilogue of the attempt at mediation."

M. Tcharykoff.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Constantinople, March 16.

The war in Tripoli, the possibility of Italian attacks on the islands and perhaps even on the Dardanelles, the state of Macedonia, and perhaps even the elections, have been placed in the background as subjects of conversation by the recall of M. Tcharykoff, the able and energetic Russian Ambassador at Constantinople, by his Government. In the words of the Times correspondent at St. Petersburg, M. Tcharykoff's recall and appointment to the Senate is "something in the nature of a disgrace." Its causes are being discussed with the utmost animation, and a variety of theories have been propounded, which may be set before the reader, less on account of their intrinsic probability than for the light they throw on the diplomatic situation in the Near East.

According to the first of these theories, Austrian and, in a less degree, German influences, combined with the Russian partisans of a forward policy in the Near East and the Court elements which distrusted M. Tcharykoff's supposed Liberalism to oust the Ambassador. Those who propound this theory aver that the growth of good or, at least, of more correct relations between Austria-Hungary and Russia may lead to a new Murzsteg agreement for common action in the Balkan Peninsula. M. Tcharykoff was believed in Austro-German circles to have worked in favour of an alliance, or at least of a close political understanding, between the Balkan States and the Ottoman Empire. Such an understanding would not only bring Turkey into friendlier relations with her old enemy, Russia, but would bar the dreaded advance on Salonika, of which Austrian military men have so often spoken in Danzer's Armee Zeitung and other professional organs. It would also cut the ground from under the feet of those Turks who, believing that Bulgaria and Russia are the inevitable opponents of a reformed Turkey, hold that an understanding with the Central Powers is necessary. "Austria," they say, "may have designs on Macedonia. That is a danger, but if we can promise certain concessions to Germany she becomes our advocate with her ally, while the Dual Monarchy, if won by these means, will keep the Bulgar and help to keep the Russian off our backs." This is the basic idea which underlies and explains the pro-German policy of the Young Turks, who, one must admit, are justified in their belief that it is extremely improbable that either France or England would expend a single Chasseur or Highlander to keep the Crescent flying over the fortress of Scutari in Albania or over the capitals of the Macedonian provinces. A Balkan understanding which included the Ottoman Empire would have turned the flank of the pro-German party, the more so as Austria, however capable she may be of driving the Turk from Plevna to Salonika, would hardly dare an offensive against the combined forces of Turkey, Bulgaria, and Serbia.

Another explanation of M. Tcharykoff's recall may contain at least as much truth as the last. It is believed that the Ambassador, who lost no chance of proving his sympathy with the new régime by petits soins—instructions to his consular staff to abstain from creating incidents and to interpret the Capitulations whenever possible in a pro-Turkish sense, frequent expressions of confidence in the ultimate triumph of the Committee, generous entertainments, and it is whispered, a somewhat anti-Italian attitude—counted too much on the influence wielded by that group of Young Turks with whom he and his first dragoman, M. Mandelstamm, were most in touch. In other words, M. Tcharykoff believed that the influence of Djavid and Djavid Reys and their followers, as of one or two of their foreign friends, would be successfully exerted on behalf of a Russo-Turkish understanding based upon the opening of the Dardanelles and Bosphorus under certain limitations to Russian men-of-war. Events proved that he or his advisers were wrong on this point. In spite of the pro-Russian leading articles of the Tanin, the Committee of Union and Progress supported Said Pasha and Assim Bey in their non-pro-venimus attitude with regard to the opening of the Straits and the great bulk of the Turkish Press, apparently inspired by the Government, subjected to the severest criticism, not M. Tcharykoff's actual proposals, the tenor of which is unknown save to a few highly placed officials, but the suggestion that an entente between Russia and Turkey might be reached on the above mentioned basis. It is certainly possible that this version of the immediate cause of the Ambassador's disgrace is the correct one, the more so as it is currently reported that M. Mandelstamm will not return to Constantinople.

Other explanations of M. Tcharykoff's recall—"Court intrigues," etc.—explain little or nothing. Meantime the Russian Government has informed Turkhan Pasha that its policy in Turkey will undergo no change, and the news, which, if not official, comes at all events from well-informed sources, that it is M. de Giers, and not M. von Hartwig, who will be appointed to the Constantinople Embassy has to some extent calmed the uneasiness of the Young Turks who had followed events in Teheran. But it would be idle to pretend that the Young Turk leaders are not perturbed or that the Porte is entirely free from anxiety as to what Russia may intend. As for the Tanin group, they are, to judge from a leading article in that journal, much distressed by the departure of a friend of Turkey, but it was surely unnecessary for the Tanin to expatiate so much on M. Tcharykoff's services to the new régime as to give the Russian Chauvinist an excuse for describing him as an excessively pro-Turk Ambassador. Another instance of "Save me from my friends!"

The Turco-Arab Forces in Tripoli.

A BELATED but still interesting letter, dated the end of February, is published by the Vossische Zeitung from its correspondent with the Turkish Forces at Azizia (30 miles south of Tripoli). The writer explicitly admits that he cannot give any particulars of the state, the number, or the disposition of the Turco-Arab troops but his description of the general spirit pervading the Turkish head-quarters leads us to infer that the Turks see no reason as yet to despair or even to feel downhearted. Fethi Bey, the chief of the general staff, said to the correspondent "The enemy has 50,000 regular troops, excellently armed and drilled in accordance with modern ideas, powerful artillery, provisions and supplies in abundance, fourteen generals, aeroplanes, balloons—and we? What have we got? No artillery, a colonel as commander-in-chief, few troops, old rifles, no reinforcements, no technical appliances. How is it, then, that the enemy, who has everything, is besieged, held in check by us who have nothing?"

The correspondent proceeds to speak of an old artillery captain, with a long, snow-white beard, Ahmed Shukri, who was introduced to him on his arrival at the camp. "For 52 days he shelled the Italian positions with his artillery, and only one gun was rendered useless by the combined fire of the naval field guns of the enemy directed from a balloon. 'I had only,' he told me, 'three cannon, and mountains of exploded shells were heaped up round me yet they did not succeed in driving me away, and I only withdrew after having fired my last shell. Against these three old-fashioned guns no fewer than three quick-firers and four heavy naval guns, had been hurling shells and shrapnel for weeks and months together.'"

The correspondent adds "A more primitive field army than these Turco-Arab troops can scarcely be imagined. But they are animated by an excellent spirit, and their leaders are unshakably convinced of their ultimate triumph.—(Manchester Guardian.)"

Italy's Deadly Foe.

A CONSTANTINOPLE Correspondent sends an interesting account of the famous Sheikh who has been honoured by the Sultan and of the tribe over which he holds sway.

What causes General Canova, the Chief Commander of the Italian forces in Tripoli, the greatest perplexity and anxiety, and what seriously embarrasses his military operations (says the Correspondent) is the mysterious tribe of the Senussi. They are gathering now in thousands from their far-off centre on the oasis of Kufra, in the Libyan Desert, from many another distant oasis of North Africa, from the Sudan, from Arabia and from Egypt to wage the Holy War against the detestable "Macaroni," polluting with their unholy boot-clad feet the sacred territory of the Mahdis. And of all the innumerable Moslem sects and tribes, none can wage this Holy War with more passionate self-abnegation, with more terrible fanaticism and ferocity than the Senussi.

Many are the stories concerning this most extraordinary of Islamic brotherhoods. Some assert that they are Freemasons with a constitution and the rites very much resembling European masonic fraternities.

One thing seems to be perfectly certain. The Senussi symbolism of the "Rose," the secret password of the Mahdi's emissaries, has worked a veritable miracle. By means of it alone, the present Sheikh of the tribe, Sidi Ahmed El Mahdi, the grandson of the founder of the sect, was able, in a very short space of time, to gather, from distant parts, a formidable army of fanatical warriors ready to face General Canova's forces with all the crushing resolution of religious frenzy fighting for Allah and Islam.

From an excellent source I gather that the number of these warriors amounts at present to about 100,000 men. All of them are exceedingly well-armed. Their ammunition is of a most modern type. Their leaders or sheikhs possess about £2,000,000 sterling. It is the name of the "Rose" that keeps them together and infuses them with unswerving enthusiasm. It is the "Rose" that is influencing the whole of Tripoli. And it will be the "Rose," it is asserted by those who know, that will finally carry victory over the invading infidels.

That remarkable Sudanese woman, herself a member of the Senussi sect, styled by the enthusiastic and grateful warriors "The Jeanne d'Arc of the Desert," with a lacerated left arm waving high in the air and with fierce outcries of religious fanaticism fired, the other day, the men of her tribe to an assault upon the strong entrenchments of the Italians. She accomplished the defeat of the numerically stronger enemy, in spite of the thunder of their cannon, only through the miracle working mystery of the password of the "Rose."

The political significance of the Senussi came into prominence when they began to fight against the corrupt system of the old bureaucratic administration. This is one of the chief reasons why they were disliked by the former Sultan and could never obtain during his régime a firm footing in Constantinople itself. They are most enthusiastic champions in the cause of freedom and of enfranchisement from every form of despotism.

The present Chief Sidi Ahmed El-Mahdi (Mahdi means "He who is led by Allah") is described as a very pious man, full of strength and courage. He has already fought, and very successfully too, in many a difficult campaign. The fight in Tripoli will be hot and long, and the Italians will perhaps arrive at the melancholy conviction that between the proclamation of the annexation and the actual possession of Tripoli is a wide and insurmountable gulf. (Englishman.)

Morocco and Tripoli.

AN ARTICLE of considerable importance has been published by the semi-official Tribuna of Rome in reply to a section of the French press which has denied that France owes anything to Italy in the matter of her African adventures. The Tribuna emphatically asserts that the secret Agreement of 1902, so far from being confined to mere declarations of disintéressement in Tripoli and Morocco, contains an explicit undertaking on the part of France to render positive assistance to Italy in Tripoli in return for similar assistance on the part of Italy to France in Morocco. The Roman journal points out how loyally Italy discharged her obligations at Algerias, where she supported the French claims against those of her own ally. It then charges the French Government with a desire to evade the corresponding obligations on France's part, and concludes by pointing out that there are still some outstanding questions connected with a French protectorate over Morocco, such as the abolition of the capitulations, with regard to which the co-operation or at least the consent of Italy would be indispensable. "Italy could only maintain towards France in Morocco the same attitude which France is maintaining towards her in Tripoli." These are ominous words on the eve of the meeting of the Kaiser with King Victor Emmanuel at Venice.—(Manchester Guardian.)

Egypt.

LORD KITCHENER, contrary to all precedent and in defiance of the Constitution, such as it is, took upon himself to impose his presence on the Council of Ministers, and to preside, in conjunction with the Khedive, at an important meeting of the Council held two months ago at Kubbah Palace. This is resented, and is certainly quite outside the functions of the British Consul-General. Neither Lord Cromer nor Sir Eldon Gorst ever attempted such an irregularity.

Another pretension put forward by Lord Kitchener has been that of taking precedence over the diplomatic representatives of other European Powers at Cairo on the occasion of levées and official receptions. Accepted diplomatic etiquette universally gives precedence according to the date of appointment, not according to the importance of the Government represented. Lord Kitchener as junior of the diplomatic body at Cairo has no conceivable right to any but the lowest place. He insisted on taking the highest. This has caused friction and, we understand, protests; and we are informed that the difficulty was only solved by the Khedive's avoidance of the usual reception on the anniversary of his succession when instead of holding it, he took train for Saloum.

A late report speaks of negotiations having been opened between Constantinople and Cairo for solving the difficulty in Tripoli through a suggested cession by the Sultan of the Cyrenaica to Egypt, that district being added to the Khedivate in return for an increase of the tribute payable to the Sultan. We give this report under all reserves. It has a certain appearance of probability, and would doubtless serve the ends of British diplomacy, while it becomes more and more certain that the Italians will be unable to hold the Cyrenaica against the united efforts of the Senoussia and Enver Bey.

It is remarkable that in Lord Kitchener's speech recently delivered at Khartoum no mention whatever was made of the Khedive's name. This is an innovation typical of the new Consul-General, who outgoes Lord Cromer in the desire he manifests of monopolising the limelight on public occasions. The great object at the British Agency now is to show itself as the fount of authority and initiator of all things, whether good or evil.—(Egypt.)

Italians and the War.

(FROM A "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN" CORRESPONDENT IN ITALY.)

THE passaggiata of a week has lasted nearly five months, and there are few victories to keep enthusiasm at the desired pitch; indeed, it would seem now to be mainly nourished on soldiers' letters, which are published in great numbers, and experience inclines one to think that these are carefully edited.

The hope that Professor Salvemini's paper L'Unita would form a strong centre for the protesting party has hardly been justified. Salvemini is a man who commands universal sympathy and respect. He suffered the loss of his entire family in the earthquake at Messina, and though thus cruelly stricken he devotes himself unweariedly to the work of the country at large and the interests of the South in particular. He has long opposed Protection and striven for electoral reform. The general trend of L'Unita is now plain. It launched a strong reproach against the Socialists for failing to make a better organised opposition to the war during the months preceding the ultimatum, and it sternly condemns the policy which led to it, but since the war is now a fact L'Unita holds that it is useless to do other than join in the effort to carry it through as well and as thoroughly as possible.

The interest of the first issues lay in the exposure of some of the falsities which in September last helped to prepare the public mind of Italy for hostile action. Six documents were published called the "Rohlf's Report," consisting of a correspondence purporting to have passed between Rohlf, a celebrated German traveller Crispi, and Camperio in 1894. The most important of these was the Rohlf's Report on the social, economic, and political condition of Tripoli and Cyrenaica, and a letter from Crispi, dated 16th August 1894, dealing with the future of North Africa and the duty of Italy to go to Tripoli. Salvemini from the first doubted these documents, and has been able, with the aid of experts, to prove clearly that they are forgeries. The false documents did their work: they nullified the influence of certain carefully reasoned articles just then published by one of the most profound writers on political subjects in Italy, Gaetano Mosca, Professor of Constitutional Law in the University of Turin, and they drove forward the already excited people to battle pitch.

L'Unita is wise in urging upon the Italians greater calmness and dignity, whether facing victory, defeat, or calumny. It protests against the more than regal reception given to Jean Carrere, the French war correspondent, who denied the barbarities described by his colleagues. The whole peninsula received him as a conqueror, deliriously throwing themselves at his feet. It bravely protests also against what is described as "the not less than savage language of multitudes of the people" reflected in the average newspapers, by which they show themselves no better, intellectually or morally, than the Arabs of whom they speak.

Salvemini's journal can do nothing to stop the war. It can and does do something to hold before the eyes of Italy a loftier line of conduct.

The Turkish Tommy.

By Alan Ostler.

("Express" Special Correspondent with the Turkish Forces in Tripoli)

Gharian, February 13

It was not to be believed what historians, military critics, war correspondents, and similarly qualified observers have left on record, the soldier of every nation has his distinctive quality. So we come to recognise the British Tommy by his pluck, the French soldier by a certain fearless gaiety, the German by strict adherence to the letter of military discipline, the Russian by sullen pertinacity, the Japanese by sublime indifference to death, and so on and so forth.

Well, I am at a loss how to label the common Turkish soldier. Plucky is not precisely the word for him, since pluck implies bravery, coupled with a certain dash and alertness. Brave the Turk certainly is, but not so much, I think, because he disdains danger as because he never seems to realise its presence. Dashing and alert he certainly is not.

He has all the fearlessness of the French pious-piou, with none of his gaiety.

He has the pertinacity of the Russian, but he is not sullen. And his obedience would put the best drilled German to the blush.

He is quite as indifferent to death as the Japanese, but he has none of the fervour with which the sons of Japan courted it at the mouths of Russian cannon for their country's sake.

Altogether, the Turkish soldier is an enigma. To describe him adequately, one must speak of two qualities which he possesses to a superlative degree—extraordinary endurance; and superhuman stupidity.

His endurance is a thing to make one gasp. Ill-clad, ill-fed and particularly ill-paid, he will fight all day on a handful of flour and a cupful of dirty water, sleep as best he can, unsheltered from rain, dew or sandstorm, walk ten miles to hospital with a wound that would kill any other human being; lie-in-a-dirty, crowded hospital, whose doctors cannot treat him because they have no drugs and no instruments; recover, if it please Heaven, and go about his duties once again, and if not, die quietly; and all without a word of complaint.

The Turkish soldier never complains, and never wilfully fails to carry out an order, however harsh or tedious. I know quite well that if one of the soldiers here were told to go alone into the Italian camp and kill the general, he would salute and trudge off without a word. I have seen him, after two days of semi-starvation, clumsily prepare some poor meal for himself, light his fire with infinite pains from wet and scanty fuel, sit patiently watching his pot till the mess was cooked, and then, just as he was about to fall to, rise and leave all, to carry out some trivial, perhaps needless, order, without so much as a sign of discontent.

A few evenings ago a soldier brought me a great coat which I had left behind at one of the outpost camps. He walked eleven miles through the sand to bring it, would on no account accept any reward whatever, and as soon as he had delivered it, tramped eleven miles back to his station. He had been on duty, of course, all day since sunrise, and must have been tired out when he set off on his errand.

The Turkish trooper, or private, lives the life of a dog. Indeed many a dog is better fed and better kept than he. Until quite recently, he was inhumanly treated by his superiors. Yet I never heard of a Turkish soldier who complained, and if one did, his mates would most certainly treat him as an outcast. Uncomplaining obedience, a pathetic, ox-like endurance of hardship and misery, are qualities which the Turkish soldier possesses beyond all belief.

As for his stupidity, that, too, passes all understanding. He knows it, apparently, and does not in the least resent comment upon it. There were two orderlies, Emin and Ahmed, whose duty was to wait upon the staff in the barracks at Azizia, and to make the beds and generally keep the room tidy. One morning Ahmed was sweeping the room with a stolid thoroughness that raised choking clouds of dust, against which I protested, suggesting that he might go to work a little more gently.

Ahmed stolidly ceased from sweeping, and awaited further orders.

I told him to sweep, but not in such a manner as to raise the dust. He fell to work as before.

While I was in the midst of trying to explain to him that it was possible to sweep efficiently and yet gently, Emin, the other orderly, arrived.

In less than twenty minutes Emin had grasped what I meant. Then he explained to me that Ahmed was dull of understanding.

"Ahmed," said he, "is quite like a beast in his mind—very stupid. Are you not, Ahmed?"

Ahmed admitted it without the least rancour.

"Even Lutfi" (a most notorious thickhead and butt of the camp) "calls me a fool," said he.

For several days after this the intelligent Emin, whenever occasion offered, reminded me that he had grasped my meaning "almost at once," whereas the stupid Ahmed "had a mind quite like a beast."

Yet even the brilliant intellect of Emin moves somewhat ponderously. The other day I saw him set about grooming a vicious horse. As soon as he came within reach, the horse bit him. Emin withdrew, but without haste, to a safer distance, and stood for some minutes looking alternately at his bitten hand and at the horse.

Presently he approached, slowly, and kicked the horse in the stomach. Having thus appeased the creature, he set about grooming it, and was within an ace of being bitten again.

Again he withdrew, and stood obviously meditating on the unreasonableness of the brute. He attempted to plant another conciliatory kick in its ribs, but the horse anticipated his move, and countered so quickly that Emin's wonderful headpiece escaped fracture by a miracle.

Emin walked away and sat down on a manure-heap, to evolve a new plan of campaign. After much thought he once more approached the horse, and almost briskly, thrust a nose-bag over its head. Then he slipped a hobble over one of its hind feet, and after regarding his work complacently for full five minutes, set about his original task of grooming the horse.

He had half finished, when an idea struck him. He stopped, meditated for a while and then, with the air of one inspired, seized a stick and gave the horse two resounding thwacks with it.

Then he tranquilly finished grooming.

Stupid, honest, kind to children, albeit somewhat callous to the sufferings of animals, brave, and, above all, silently enduring, the Turkish peasant-soldier is a man for whom one cannot help feeling a strong sympathy in all his miseries. And see him in such a campaign as this, see how he responds to the smallest kindness (provided you can get him to accept it at all) see how cheerfully, and with what simple humour he makes light of his hardships, and then your pity will become a stronger feeling still.

The Week.

China.

REUTERS wires from Shanghai on the 13th.—A mutiny broke out among the troops at Nankin. Houses and shops were looted and buildings burned. The Cantonese regulars surrounded the mutineers and re-captured most of the loot. It is reported that fifty were killed in the fight.

Northern soldiers are giving evidence of growing dissatisfaction with the Republic, and it is possible that if a leader were forthcoming, the North would restore the Monarchy.

Reuters wires from Peking on the 13th.—The Belgian Syndicate has signed at Shanghai a further preliminary loan of two millions sterling. This, like the first loan, will be considered as an advance on the proposed big loan. The Russo-Asiatic bank is not participating, pending a settlement as to Russia's entry into the international group.

Reuter wires from Washington on the 13th.—The Senate has passed a resolution congratulating the Chinese people on the assumption by them of the powers, duties and responsibilities of self-government.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 14th.—It has been decided that pending the pacification of troops in the South, the Military Commander at Nanking will continue under the direction of the President to exercise certain control under which will come the civil, military and diplomatic affairs at Nanking. This decision is considered most important as emphasising Yuan-Shi-Kai's determination to avoid a rupture with the South and a tacit acknowledgment that the South is not yet prepared to dissolve its military organisation.

Reuter wires from Paris on the 14th.—France and Russia are completely agreed with regard to the participation of the latter country in the Chinese loan.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 15th.—The Government replying to the protest of the four nation group against the Belgian loan states that it appears probable that the Belgians will join the international group in order that the political deadlock may be overcome. The imperative need of funds is again causing the Government extreme anxiety.

Afghanistan.

The Pioneer reports that a serious revolt against the Amir's authority has occurred in Khost, an Afghan district.

It appears that the Governor of Shahgashi, Mohamed Akbar Khan, ruled in such an oppressive manner that the Khostwals petitioned against him. He was summoned to Kabul last year but was able to make out such a good case for himself that he returned with greater powers than he had enjoyed before. The Jagis were the first to resent his enlarged authority and fresh representations were made to the Amir. The relation between the Afghan garrison of Khost and the local tribesmen became strained and matters were complicated by the demands made upon the Khostwals generally for forced labour to build a new road, which the Kabul Government had ordered to be constructed. The Mangals, a powerful and warlike clan, were the first to move and they combined with their hereditary enemies, the Jadrans, in the scheme of revolt, some sections of Jagis also giving assistance.

Last month concerted attacks were made upon the Afghan garrison. Post after post fell and the fugitive soldiers began to arrive in Kurram. The revolt spread with amazing rapidity and there was little quarter given to Afghan soldiers though the Jagis kept some as prisoners with a view probably to using them as hostages.

The latest reports are that the Governor with the remainder of his troops is besieged in Matun, the capital of Khost, a town which lies in the open plain and that the Mangals and Jadrans are masters of the position. The present revolt certainly seems by far the most serious one that has ever occurred in Khost and the Amir has issued orders for four brigades to move into the country. Their first objective will be Matun, which must be relieved before any punitive operations in the hills can be undertaken. The campaign seems likely to last some months. At least fugitive Afghan soldiers who have appeared in the Kurram are being sent to the Afghan outpost on Peiwar Kotail which is always strongly held.

Moslem University.

The Nizam's donation of five lakhs to the Moslem University has now been paid in. His Highness has also raised his annual grant to thirty-six thousand rupees. Salar Jung III has given a donation of a lakh on coming into his estate in Hyderabad State, and Nawab Muhayyuddin Khan, son of the late Sir Asman Jah, has given one and a half lakhs. Total cash in hand for the Moslem University is now twenty-six lakhs, leaving only one lakh more to be collected to bring the total to the minimum required.

Home Rule Bill.

IN INTRODUCING the Home Rule Bill, Mr. Asquith said it was 19 years since Mr. Gladstone introduced the last of his measures to provide for the better government of Ireland. That speech contained a perfect exposition of the historic case as between Great Britain and Ireland. He would not pretend to cover that ground, but before he entered upon an explanation of the provisions of the Bill, he would take up the narrative at the point at which Mr. Gladstone left off, and would ask the House how far the case for and against Home Rule had been effected, one way or another, by the course of events since 1893.

First dealing with the question from the Irish standpoint, Mr. Asquith said that since the extension of the franchise in 1884, there had been eight General Elections. The fortunes of parties had ebbed and flowed. Governments had come and gone. They had had peace and war, shifting issues and changing policies, but throughout the welter and confusion, one thing had remained constant, namely, the insistence and the persistence of the Irish demand.

Mr. Asquith emphasised the preponderant character of the vote given in favour of Home Rule in Ireland. Look at Ulster (Opposition cheers.) Seventeen Unionists and sixteen Home Rulers had been returned for Ulster (Ministerialist cheers.) These figures were quite sufficient to show the misleading character of the picture that Ulster would die rather than assent to Home Rule (Ministerialist cheers.) He had never under-estimated the strength and determination of resistance to Home Rule in Ulster. It was a factor which a sane and prudent statesman could not leave out of account. He hoped presently to show that they had not ignored it in framing the Bill. They could not, however, admit the right of a relatively small minority, especially when care had been taken to safeguard their special interests, to veto the verdict of the vast majority of their fellow-countrymen.

Mr. Asquith reviewed the progress of Ireland since 1893. He pointed out that that had deprived Unionists of many of their arguments. Every year had emphasised the imperative need of emancipating the Imperial Parliament from local cares. They would never get the separate concerns of the different parts of the United Kingdom treated with adequate time, knowledge and sympathy, until they had the courage and wisdom to hand them over to their special representatives.

Mr. Asquith laid stress on the congestion of business in the House of Commons under the existing system and asked how they were meanwhile discharging their duty to the Empire at large. He referred to the creation of the Commonwealth of Australia and the grant of self government to the Transvaal and to the Union of South Africa. The case of the Transvaal, he said, was strictly analogous with that of Ireland, and he would be a bold man who would assert that the case of Ulster presented more difficulty than that offered by Boer and Briton living side by side in territory just recovered from an internecine war.

Then he came to the Bill itself. It was expressly stipulated in the first clause that the supreme authority of the Imperial Parliament remained unimpaired. An Irish Parliament was to be established consisting of a Senate and a House of Commons. This Parliament would have power to pass laws for the peace, order and good government of Ireland. It would only have power to make laws respecting matters exclusively relating to Ireland.

The list of excluded matters with which Parliament was not able to deal in the last Home Rule Bill was maintained with certain additions, including Land Purchase, Old Age Pensions Insurance, Constabulary, and the Post Office Savings Act.

The Constabulary, however, was to be automatically transferred after six years. With regard to Old Age Pensions and Insurance, power was given to the Irish Parliament to demand the transfer of these services after a year's notice. The Irish Parliament could not alter the Home Rule Bill itself or alter the power of appeal to the Privy Council.

There were special provisions for the protection of religious equality, while the third clause stipulated that, in the exercise of its powers, the Irish Parliament should not make laws to either directly or indirectly establish or endow any religion or prohibit the free exercise thereof, or give preference or privilege to any religion or make any religious ceremony a condition of validity of any marriage.

The Lord Lieutenant had power to veto or suspend a Bill on the instruction of the Imperial Executive. Any question of the interpretation of the Home Rule Act and its application was to be settled by appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The Senate would consist of forty members and the House of Commons of 164 members of which number Ulster would have 59 and the Universities two.

The Senate was to be a nominated body, in view of the special circumstances prevailing in the case of Ireland. It was very desirable, continued Mr. Asquith, to get into the Senate the representatives of the minority. The Senate would be nominated in the first instance by the Imperial Executive for a fixed term, but as they retired in rotation, the vacancies would be filled on the nomination of the Irish Executive. Where there was disagreement between the two Houses they had followed the South African precedent, and the two Houses would sit and vote together as at present, but there would be no religious bar and the Lord Lieutenant would hold office for a fixed term. The authority of the Executive would be co-extensive with the authority of the Irish Parliament.

Turning to finance, Mr. Asquith said the Government were unable to adopt the scheme suggested by the special committee appointed to investigate the financial relations of the two countries, but that they had derived great benefit from that report. He emphasised that, under the existing system, it was in nobody's interest in Ireland to economise. During the next year there would be a deficit of a million and half on Irish administration, and if the present system continued, the deficit would be added to year by year. The Bill anticipated a future when Irish income and expenditure would balance, and provision was made for that state of affairs, and meanwhile collection of all taxes would remain an Imperial service and would be paid into the Imperial exchequer. It was provided that there should be transferred from the Imperial to the Irish exchequer a sum called "the transferred sum," representing the cost as determined by a Board called "The Joint Exchequer Board" to the Imperial exchequer of the Irish services at the time of the passing of the Act. There would further be paid over to Ireland half a million sterling in the first year, diminishing by £50,000 yearly to £200,000. The postal service would be made an Irish service, and Ireland would get the benefit of all economies made by her administration. The Irish Parliament would have power to reduce or discontinue Imperial taxation, subject to certain reservations, these including income-tax stamps, and estate duties, but there would be a corresponding reduction in "the transferred sum."

The Irish Parliament would have full powers to devise new taxes and to increase, reduce or discontinue Imperial taxes subject to the following restrictions:—

Firstly—As regards income tax, estate duties and customs, other than customs duties on beers and spirits, it would be unable to add more than will produce 10 per cent increase in yield. As regards excise its hands would be free.

Secondly—It could not impose customs duty except on articles dutiable in the United Kingdom.

Thirdly—There were certain stamp duties which ought to be uniform throughout the United Kingdom.

Fourthly—Any reduction or increase in Imperial taxes would be subject to reduction or increase in "the transferred sum" corresponding to the diminished or increased yield thus caused.

The Irish representation at Westminster would be reduced to 42, namely, one member for every 100,000 of the population. The Irish Universities would cease to be represented in the Imperial Parliament. The Commons must continue to be the Commons of the United Kingdom and the Irish members would have unfettered right to vote.

Sir Edward Carson speaking for the Opposition denounced the proposals contained in the Bill as ridiculous and fantastic. The safeguards, he said, were delusions. Was Mr. Asquith going to submit the Bill to the country? Would he assert that the Bill had been before the country? Sir Edward Carson ridiculed the supposed safeguard of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament as a mere palliative for members with some conscience left. He vigorously attacked Government for introducing the measure while the Constitution was suspended and the preamble to the Parliament Act was still in abeyance. "So long," he said, "as Government had had a majority independently of the Irish, nothing had been heard of Home Rule. Our plain duty was to oppose the Bill with all the energy we could. He believed it to be an unnecessary Bill, fatal to both countries, and he regarded it as the outcome of the greatest series of dishonourable transactions which ever disgraced a country."

Mr. Redmond, on behalf of the Nationalists, heartily approved the measure. He said it was idle to tell the House that the safeguards were useless. From the financial standpoint alone the Bill ought to commend itself to Englishmen. Speaking also for his colleagues, he declared, "This is a great measure—one adequate to carry out the objects of its promoters and we welcome it." The Bill, he added, would be submitted to the Irish National Convention and he would unhesitatingly urge the Convention to accept it.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald for the Labour party approved the Bill.

Mr. O'Brien, while reserving judgment as to details, approved of the Bill generally and appealed to Ulster Unionists to accept it as an honourable settlement of the Irish question.

April, 15.

Mr. Balfour, in resuming the debate, ridiculed the safeguards outlined by Mr. Asquith and declared that the alleged supremacy of the Imperial Government was comparable with the ancient claims of British Sovereigns to be Kings of France. Mr. Asquith's initial experiment with Federation, he said, was lopsided and botched and utterly unworthy of British statesmanship. He severely criticized the financial provisions of the Bill pointing out that the position of the constabulary was absolutely impossible.

The scheme also involved the setting up of a Customs barrier between England and Ireland. He did not believe that English and Scottish members would support the insane suggestion of a future federal system divided by Customs barriers. If Ireland could use the Customs against foreigners, declared Mr. Balfour, then Government would be involved in appalling difficulties which would arise from the folly of trying to reverse the true policy of national development.

All nations looked to the future with anxiety and misgiving, and great social communities felt they must maintain their place by integration, not disintegration. Alluding to the union of South Africa, he said, South Africa was a great dominion conscious not only of her place in the Empire but of her special difficulties and dangers. South African statesmen realised when they rejected the schemes of Home Rule and Federation but adopted closer union that a country so constituted could alone do its best rapidly, conclusively and decisively against some imminent danger.

What was the position of Great Britain in times of danger with this lopsided federation? It was only a fair-weather constitution. He asked whether they thought the absurd scheme would last a decade. If Nationalists really believed Ireland to be a nation they would not and ought not to be content with such a makeshift. He desired to see the Irish as free as the English and Scotch and co-operate in the great work of Empire. He maintained they had such freedom under the present system.

Mr. Herbert Samuel replying on behalf of the Government said Mr. Balfour's arguments against the Bill might equally and justly be advanced against any scheme of Colonial Self-Government. He pointed out that six years ago Mr. Balfour had described the grant of Self-Government to South Africa as a "reckless experiment." The experiences of hundred and fifty years, he said, proved that it was the denial, not the grant of Home Rule, that had led to separatist tendencies. Colonial autonomy was not only not inconsistent with but essential to imperial unity. Appeals were continually being received from all parts of the Empire urging Home Rule for Ireland, not only from statesmen of the Irish race but from such men as Mr. Botha and Sir Joseph Ward, while Mr. Cecil Rhodes, an Empire-builder if ever there was one, spoke from his grave in favour of it.

Dealing with finance, Mr. Samuel said it would be unjust in the first instance to burden Ireland with the whole deficit. The state of her finances was not her fault but the result of English financial administration. Her revenue was paid on the Irish scale, while her expenditure was on the English scale. Therefore, it was obviously indefeasible, after accustoming the Irish to this scale of expenditure, to impose on them the burden of finding the whole of the expenditure. If they did not assist, the new Irish Parliament would be faced in the first year with a deficit exceeding one-fifth of the whole revenue, which would mean a 15 to 20 per cent. increase in taxation. At the same time it was unjust that the deficit should be permanently borne by the British taxpayer.

He was convinced that when Ireland was prosperous she would be willing to assume her just share in the burden of Empire. The Government's scheme provided that the finances of the one country would not be appreciably disturbed by a change in the finances of the other. If the Irish Government were able to effect economies, they would be free to reduce any taxes they liked, such as those which pressed the heaviest on the poorer classes, namely, Customs duties especially those on tea and sugar. It was impossible, however, to give unfettered control of Customs, as such action would be inconsistent with the general policy of Government.

Financial experts who had enquired into the Anglo-Irish finance prior to the drafting of the Home Rule Bill had found the situation so utterly unsound that they had actually recommended complete fiscal autonomy for Ireland and an annual subvention of £900,000, but the Government was unable to accept the recommendations for various substantial reasons. The whole of the Irish revenue would continue to be paid into the Exchequer so long as the deficit lasted. The total sum transferred annually from the Exchequer would be about six million sterling, but this was not a grant from the British taxpayer, as it would be derived from Irish taxes. The total cost of the reserved services would be about five million sterling. The loss thereon at the outside would be about two million sterling, but if the present rate of progress continued, this would gradually diminish and disappear in ten years. The Irish Government would be authorised, if they so desired, to borrow money for the purpose of national development. The Irish Exchequer Board would have power to issue loans and make provision for payment of interest on the sinking fund from the "transferred sum."

April 16.

Mr. Long said it was a mere pretence to suppose that a Bill propitiating the enemies of British Rule and humiliating those loyal to the British flag could bring peace and harmony to Ireland. There was no analogy with the case of the Dominions. In South Africa, there had been a great process of unification affording no precedent for the Government's proposals. Criticising the details of the Bill, Mr. Long said that the nominated Senate was still-born and was without a friend anywhere. The land legislation provisions would throw a great scheme into hopeless confusion.

Mr. Timothy Healy made a strong appeal to the Unionists for appeasement. He suggested that half of the Senate should be nominated by Protestant bodies and that the Senate should be empowered to veto appointments worth over £500. While criticising details, he warmly supported the Bill generally and apologised to Mr. Asquith for ever expressing doubts as to his sincerity.

Mr. Bonar Law said it was impossible to regard the Bill as a final settlement, because it gave a Constitution to which none of the self-governing Colonies would submit for a week. If it were necessary or possible, he would give Ireland the same powers as Canada, because there would then be a chance of a friendly Ireland. Under this Bill, whenever things went wrong, all the blame would be placed on the restrictions of the Imperial executive, and the grant of the Irish Parliament would give the agitation a leverage, making it infinitely more dangerous than at present.

Concluding, Mr. Bonar Law said Ulster's opposition had made Home Rule impossible. Ulstermen were ready to lay down their lives, and how could their resistance be overcome? He reiterated that Government were introducing the Bill against their convictions, because they were dependent on Irish votes. Mr. Asquith's debt of honour regarding the reform of the Lords must wait till the debt of shame had been paid to Mr. Redmond. Finally he declared, "the Bill cannot be carried without submission to the people."

Mr. Birrell said the speech of Mr. Bonar Law was violent and impudent. The Liberals were content with their Premier, and did not envy the Opposition their new leader.

The first reading of the Bill was subsequently carried by 360 votes to 266.

April 17.

The Home Rule Bill has been issued. It enacts that the term of office of Senators shall be eight years and the duration of the House of Commons five years. The Irish Parliament will be summoned on the first Tuesday in September 1913, upon which day Irish members at Westminster will vacate their seats.

Verse.

In Praise of Gul Mohurs.

What can rival your lovely hue
O gorgeous boon of the spring?
The glimmering red of a bridal robe,
Rich red of a wild bird's wing?
Or the mystic blaze of the gem that burns
On the brow of a serpent king?

What can rival the valiant joy
Of your dazzling, fugitive sheen?
The limpid clouds of the lustrous dawn
That colours the ocean's mien?
Or the blood that poured from a thousand breasts
To succour a Rajput Queen?

What can rival the radiant pride
Of your frail victorious fire?
The flame of hope or the flame of hate,
Quick flame of my heart's desire?
Or the rapturous light that leaps to heaven
From a true wife's funeral pyre?

SAROJINI NAIDU.

TETE À TETE

THE news that His Highness the Nizam has raised the annual State grant to the Aligarh College to Rs. 36,000 has been received throughout Moslem India with feelings of peculiar pleasure and gratitude. The creation of a University is by far the most important effort that the Indian Mussalmans have made in modern times and it is peculiarly gratifying to note that all classes of the community from the highest to the lowest have participated in the great communal undertaking with equal degree of zeal and devotion. The consciousness of having laboured unitedly for the fruition of a noble ideal will remain a great moral asset of the community. To us a matter of supreme gratification is the liberal help that has been given to the University movement by all the Mussalman Ruling Chiefs in the country as the telegram we publish elsewhere clearly indicates. We are glad to feel that the natural leaders of the community, enjoying great powers for good or evil, have become alive to the needs of the times. The liberality of Her Highness the Begum Sahiba of Bhopal has been unstinted indeed. The Moslem public had cherished high hopes of the Nizam and we are happy to think that they have been realised. The increase of the annual grant by Rs. 12,000, though below public expectation, constitutes a generous measure of help, while the donation of 5 lakhs to the University Fund was well worthy of the traditions of Hyderabad. But we regard these merely in the light of a renewal by the successor of the late Nizam of those intimate relations that have always existed between the premier Moslem State and nerve centre of 70 millions Mussalmans. His Highness is an enlightened Prince and he could not have failed to note that although Hyderabad has given much in charity no gift has been as productive as the State grant to Aligarh. We are now informed by the Honorary Secretary of the Aligarh College that His Highness the Nizam's donation has been paid into the Bank of Bengal. The Honorary Secretary also hopes to be able to announce ere long "very encouraging news about the progress of the University Fund in Native States." In the meantime he requests the public "to rise to the occasion and pay up their promises at once and help in the realisation of subscriptions from friends to enable the Central Committee to apply to the Government to introduce the Moslem University Bill during the next session of the Imperial Council at Simla." We fully associate ourselves with the request of the Honorary Secretary. It may also be noted here that two of the greatest nobles of Hyderabad, Salar Jung III and Nawab Mohayy-ud Din Khan, grandson of the late Sir Asman Jah, have promised to give Rs. 1,00,000 and Rs. 1,50,000 respectively to the University Fund. The required minimum for the purposes of the Bill requires a lakh more to be complete. Even a little systematic effort ought to suffice to bring about the wished for consummation.

THE enormous difficulties that confront China in her political reconstruction have aroused great sympathy for her throughout the world. Unfortunately, however, the temptation to fish in troubled waters was never so strong a force in European diplomacy as it is to-day, and it is on this account that the dangers lying across the path of the Chinese statesmen have grown immensely formidable. The self-restraint so far exercised by some of the European Powers is no doubt creditable. It must also be remembered that the revolutionary leaders of China have behaved throughout the period of civil anarchy and commotion with marvellous tact, foresight and wisdom, and have not given the slightest provocation to foreign vested interests that could have led to foreign interference. The only hint of an aggressive nature has so far come from Russia, and more recently from Japan. The development of Muscovite designs in the region of Mongolia need not surprise any one acquainted with the bellicose character of Muscovite diplomacy. What has, however, surprised us most is the attitude of Japan in her dealings with a peaceful and neighbourly people who are earnestly engaged in setting their affairs in order. The Republican Government of China stands in need of money and a big international loan is being negotiated for the purpose. All the great European Powers as well as Japan have agreed to participate in the loan on equal terms. The resources of China are immense; she can offer a good security; and in the ordinary course there ought to be no difficulty for her in raising the money that she needs. But Russia and Japan, it would seem, are bent on forcing her to surrender some of her sovereign rights as a price of the financial assistance they have promised. Russia wants to include Mongolia in her sphere of influence, while Japan desires that her special interests in Manchuria should be formally recognised. We confess our respect and admiration for Japan would be hardly increased by the manner in which she has begun to exercise her newly acquired strength. We admire her for the sustained efforts and devotion with which she has built up the fabric of her national greatness. We respect the resourcefulness and courage with which she bore herself through the crisis in which her honour, and perhaps life were involved. But we scarcely thought that she, too, would begin to imitate the worst features of the European Powers into whose comity she entered after demonstrating her military efficiency. It was only a few years ago that she behaved in a peculiarly unfortunate manner when an effort was made to establish diplomatic relations between Turkey and herself. She, too, wanted to enjoy like the European Powers the privilege of iniquitous capitulations. The suggestion was of course rejected with scorn and thus the effort proved abortive. It is not by blindly walking in the footsteps of Europe that Japan will retain the admiration and regard of Asia. She must indeed thank her stars that the change in her condition came a little before Europe developed the appetite of the giant for more earth. It is in fact her history itself that has helped this earth-hunger.

THE constitutional crisis in China has given birth to a widespread unrest which has been felt to the uttermost confines of the Empire. In Manchuria, Mongolia and Tibet, the three outlying provinces, the loosening of the bonds of authority have led to chaos and civil strife. Manchuria has been for a considerable time past the theatre of international rivalries and its affairs have never, in consequence, been in a tranquil condition. Mongolia has been within the Russian sphere of aspiration ever since the Muscovite ambitions in Korea and Manchuria were shattered on the plain of Mukden. Tibetan aspiration has now naturally materialised into "interest." Tibetan affairs have stood on a somewhat different footing. The country, though a Chinese province and owing allegiance to the Central Government at Peking, has for centuries past remained in a state of splendid isolation. The Russian intrigues and the Younghusband Mission to Lhasa, which was their direct outcome, roused the Chinese to establish more direct and stricter control over Tibetan affairs. The Chinese Amban became the virtual ruler of the country, and the Dalai Lama, after a series of adventures and escapades, took refuge in India as the guest of the Government. He is still at Kalimpong near the Tibetan frontier awaiting developments. The overthrow of the Manchus and the establishment of the Republic has inevitably led to the relaxation of the Central authority. Some untoward incidents have roused the Tibetans to revolt and a number of serious conflicts have occurred between them and the Chinese troops. The country is for the time being in a state of insurrection, a large part of the Chinese garrison appeared to have perished in the conflict or fled away and the Amban had been obliged, according to a report, to take sanctuary in a monastery. To-day's telegrams, however, show that the Chinese are not in such a bad plight as all that, and it is very probable that it is the Tibetans themselves that are now hard pressed. The hands of the Republican Government are full, but they will, we may be sure, lose no time in re-establishing their authority. In the meantime the Indian Government is watching the course of events in Tibet. The presence of the Dalai Lama, intent to return at the first favourable moment, has created some sort of responsibility for the Government. We hope, however, that no aggressive part will be taken by us in the settlement of the Tibetan affairs. The Englishman has in sheer commiseration of the plight of the Tibetans invoked "some stronger Power" to come to their rescue, and eagerly asks if Britain would have the courage to imitate Russia. We wish that in thus aiding and abetting political crime, the Englishman had found Britain a bad tool.

THE terrible catastrophe that has overtaken the Titanic, one of the world's largest and most luxuriously appointed liners, on her maiden voyage across the Atlantic is one of those events that stagger humanity. The ship was built on a huge scale and equipped with the latest appliances that science has devised for the safety or luxury of man. She had 45,000 tons displacement and was the second of the White Star line's leviathans that ply between America and England. The Titanic started from Liverpool with a complement of upwards of 2,300 men; and while going at full speed of 21 $\frac{1}{4}$ knots in mid-ocean she struck an iceberg, and after a few hours became a total wreck. In spite of her scientific build and watertight compartments and turbine engines, nothing could avail to save her against the awful and remorseless perils of the deep. It is disasters like this that shake one out of the overweening sense of human knowledge and power and give him a glimpse of the terrible natural forces before which the most gigantic human creations rock and perish like a reed. The Titanic sent all round signals of distress, and some of the liners who picked up the messages hastened to her aid. The Carpathia seems to have first arrived at the scene of disaster and took over about 745 persons, mostly women and children, on board. The rest, about 1,595, seem to have perished. There were several distinguished men on board the Titanic, one of them being Mr W. T. Stead, the famous Editor of the Review of Reviews. Nothing about his fate is known with certainty. He is amongst the missing. If he too has found the watery grave along with hundreds of others, the appalling death roll will include one of the most brilliant journalists of the world. Let us, however, hope for the best, though the details yet to hand give very little to hope for.

It seems that the long-drawn historic struggle of Ireland for Home Rule is at last to be crowned with success.

Home Rule

A Bill embodying a large measure of local self-government with an Irish executive responsible to a purely Irish Parliament has been introduced in the House of Commons. This is the third time that a Liberal Ministry has sought to meet the persistent demand of the Irish people to manage their own affairs. The two previous efforts with which the name of Gladstone is associated to his everlasting glory and fame were wrecked through fierce Tory opposition that had succeeded in rousing British electorates to hostility by playing on the worst passions of John Bull. The latest effort, however, appears to have been made under the most favourable and auspicious conditions and there seems to be every chance now for the equitable settlement of the Irish question. The partisan controversies, though still hot and charged with passion, have lost much of their virulence. The general British electorate responds but feebly to the party formulas which in the present state of affairs and in view of the new political and social currents have grown flat, stale and unprofitable. It is only through the abject die-hardism and sterile consistency of a race of politicians who had formed their political faiths a general ago that the dying embers of hate and passion are being fanned into flame. The debate in the House of Commons on the first reading of the Bill has been a comparatively tame affair, and though the old stalwarts of the historic fight in the ranks of the Opposition roared as loudly as caged lions, the note of protest was almost apologetic and lacked its former nerve and assurance. The Bill is sure to emerge successfully through the House of Commons, while that last citadel of Toryism, the House of Lords, has been rendered impotent to destroy or mutilate Liberal legislation. Mr. Asquith, while introducing the Bill, referred to the great congestion of business in the House of Commons in consequence of which purely local matters could not be dealt with adequately for want of time, knowledge and sympathy. He foreshadowed a scheme of devolution that would confer self-government on Scotland and Wales, thus setting free the Imperial Parliament for dealing with Imperial affairs. This is a time of development which if pushed to full logical conclusions will be of great moment to the whole of the British Empire. We need not discuss the details of the Home Rule Bill for Ireland. In some matters the authority of the Imperial Parliament has been reserved. The financial clauses of the Bill are the most important and the most controversial. As a matter of fact, it is mainly, owing to the financial anomaly of the Irish situation that the present measure has been found so imperatively necessary.

WE HAVE received from the Private Secretary to Her Highness the Begum Sahiba of Bhopal a letter conveying her thanks to us for publishing in the Comrade of the 6th April a review of Her Highness' Scheme for establishing a Girls' School at Delhi. We are happy to learn that Her Highness was glad to peruse our candid opinion, in which stress has been laid on the founding of a Normal School at Delhi for the training of women teachers. But in view of the fact that a Normal School for girls already exists at so short a distance as Aligarh, Her Highness thinks that the reduplication of it at Delhi appears unnecessary. Her idea is that all the girls admitted into the proposed School at Delhi should undergo a prescribed course of education the curriculum of which is receiving her careful consideration. Those girls who come out successful at the final examination of this School may, at their option, be encouraged to proceed to the Normal School at Aligarh.

Besides, the girl students at present undergoing the training at Aligarh will have to be provided for, in Her Highness's opinion, before we can think of sending more girls there. In view of these considerations Her Highness is of opinion that at present there is no need for a Normal School at Delhi. With much of this we readily concur, but we have not yet been able to persuade ourselves that girls' boarding schools suit Indian conditions, nor do we feel at all sure that their management is within the capacity of our ladies at present. The fate of the School at Aligarh should be a warning to others. It is our misfortune to disagree with Her Highness, but we fear she judges others according to her own high and, in a way, unique standard, and although it would be a great day for Indian womanhood if there were more Sultan Jahan Begums in India, it must be confessed that they are only too rare, and even then more likely to be found among the pardah ladies educated at the knee of their pardah-loving mothers than among the "advanced" and "emancipated" women, who are only too often aggressively progressive. We are, however, open to conviction and would invite correspondence on this subject. This would, we feel sure, help Her Highness in forming her own judgment, and at the same time keep her most generous Scheme before the public.

THE Annual Reunion of the Old Boys of the Aligarh College was celebrated during the Easter holidays when, as usual, a goodly number of the old students of the College came to revisit their alma mater from different parts of the country. The programme of the anniversary had all its traditional variety and charm, the customary discussions and earnest debates about every matter big or small, the Dinner with its long-drawn speeches which, however, custom has not staled, the nights and even noons of "Compounded Ignorance" and merry frivolity. There was nothing very unusual to record except that Mr. Shaikat Ali was elected Honorary Secretary of the Old Boys' Association for a period of three years. Mr. Shaikat Ali's rôle has hitherto been that of the critic of the Association though he has also done more than any other Old Boy to increase its membership. His frank and loudly-expressed disapproval of the ways in which its affairs had been conducted in the past entitle us to expect that his term of office will be a period of strenuous work to develop the Association to its utmost limit of usefulness. It is by his constructive efforts, his capacity to achieve practical results, that Mr. Shaikat Ali will be judged. We hope he fully realises the nature and scope of his responsibilities and will not disappoint those whose confidence he has hitherto enjoyed. Another feature of the anniversary was the interesting ceremony that was performed when Nawab Vigar-ul-Mulk Bahadur laid the foundation-stone of the Old Boys' Lodge. The building will meet a deeply felt want and will serve as the home of the Old Boys happening to visit the College. Amongst the speeches delivered on the occasion of the Annual Dinner the most interesting was the one in which Mr. Syed Ross Masud responded to the toast of his health. It was a thoughtful utterance and impressed all those who are deeply interested in the future of the grandson of Sir Syed and the son of Syed Mahmood. The Old Boys' Association had this year to elect one of their representatives on the Board of Trustees. Mr. Zaman Mohdi Khan was elected for the second time. We are sorry an Old Boy of Mr. Syed Sanjal Hyder's ability failed to secure election. We trust the Association's representatives will always be men of approved capacity and merit who will fully represent the views and wishes of the Old Boys in the government of the College. We regret that once more Mr. Shaikat Ali's suggestion that it should be possible for one of the Secretaries of the Association to reside outside Aligarh failed to get a two-thirds majority necessary for an amendment of the rules. It is certain to be adopted soon for this year too it secured an absolute majority.

ACCORDING to Reuter's message from Paris the Italians seemed to have screwed up enough courage for an attempt at forcing a passage through the Dardanelles. The Italian fleet, we were told, had entered the Straits and an Italian vessel had been sunk.

Forcing the Dardanelles

But to-day's Constantinople telegram officially states that Italian warships fired projectiles into the forts of the Dardanelles, and that the barracks of Sed-el-bahr, Orhanieh, and Kum Kala were slightly damaged. The Orhanieh fort replied and damaged an Italian vessel which caught fire and drew off. The Italians subsequently put to sea. Rome, of course, denies that an Italian vessel was damaged, but we can understand what it means when we read that it was only a "demonstration" that took place. Even at that, Italy has demonstrated her incapacity excellently well. Prior to their arrival in the Dardanelles, the Italians bombarded Samos—which is as neutral as Crete, or Egypt—Mitylene and Rhodes. The fleet comprised 39 ships. The bombardment was simultaneous with the opening of Parliament, and His Majesty the Sultan's speech is the best answer to this rush and scuttles. He said, "We desire peace, but only on condition that Turkey's sovereign rights are maintained." It must be peace with honour, and may Turkey not survive the surrender of her honour by a single day of ignoble peace.

The Comrade.

The Compulsory Education Debate. *

V

It must be remembered that the estimate of cost furnished by Mr. Gokhale is based on the assumption that compulsory primary education is also to be free and not on the provision of the Bill itself in this behalf. Mr. Gokhale frankly confessed that the proposal to charge fees in all cases except from those whose income was below Rs 10 per month was embodied in the Bill with the intention of conciliating official opinion. So far as Mr. Gokhale's own views are concerned, he said he was always of opinion that where education was made compulsory it should also be made free. Having failed in his object, he did not see why he should allow room for division in the ranks of his supporters by adhering to this provision, and he was glad to go back to his original proposal. We may add here in parenthesis that it is not absolutely necessary that compulsory and free education should go together. In Baroda primary education was made compulsory two years before His Highness the Cackwar made it free on the occasion of the Silver Jubilee of his accession. But it is certain that it removes one ground for objection on the part of a defaulter against compulsion if education is made free, and some years before the thought of compulsory education crossed the mind of people in this country, the Government of India themselves had addressed a circular letter to all Local Governments advocating that fees should be abolished and that free education should be introduced. In the words of Sir Harcourt Butler, the principle of free elementary education has long been accepted in India. In the Frontier Province of Assam, in Baluchistan and in the North-West Frontier Province, elementary education is already entirely free. In the Punjab and in certain districts of the United Provinces all the sons of agriculturists get their education free. In Burma a very large proportion of the children pay no fees. In other Provinces proportions of the school population varying from 20 to 33 per cent and even a higher figure, do not pay any fees in elementary schools. And, finally, in a recent communication to Local Governments in connection with the 50 lakhs recurring grant, the Government of India have expressed themselves in favour of the principle of free elementary education for all those who cannot afford to pay fees. It is, in fact, certain that when compulsion is sanctioned by the Government elementary education would be made entirely free, so that like the police and the magistracy provided for the sake of the person and property of all subjects of His Majesty and for keeping the King's peace, facilities for becoming literate would also be provided as the first duty of the State for which no payment is demanded from the individual, though the community pays for it in general taxes. In view of these facts, the remark of the Government of Bombay that "such a policy would be regarded as a triumph by a few persons who have shown no understanding of educational questions" appears highly grotesque, and we are glad that, while showing his high appreciation of all that H. E. Sir George Clarke has done for education in the Bombay Presidency, Mr. Gokhale rebuked his Government for its extreme sensitiveness to criticism and an impatience and intolerance of adverse opinions.

In the matter of free education Mr. Gokhale has met one of the principal non-official objections to his Bill. But there still remains an official objection, namely the charge that the application of the provisions of the Bill relating to compulsion to advanced areas would result in inequality of treatment, the more backward areas remaining as backward as before while advanced areas are helped in their progress. The Hon. Sir Reginald Craddock, as the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces, had in some mysterious manner arrived at the conclusion that "the one mile distance limit will exempt more than half of the children of the countryside"—an assumption not supported by the experience of Baroda at any rate—and he thought that compulsion "means merely the concentration of funds for the education of the few at the expense of the many." Sir G. R. Chitnavis quoted this with evident approval: Mr. Dadabhai talked of the classes and the masses, and Mr. Shaft also condemned "the comparative advancement of one section of our people within limited areas and their relative backwardness in the rest of this vast continent." Even Sir Harcourt Butler was betrayed into asking, "Are we to stop the expansion of the voluntary system in the backward areas in order to make experiments in compulsion in the more advanced localities?" Mr. Sharp followed suit and attacked Mr. Gokhale's Bill with the horns of a dilemma. He said, "Suppose the Bill were to become law, and suppose it were to take rapid effect.

All our efforts for improvement, I am afraid, will be shelved for years to come," and he went on to ask what would happen to this and what would happen to that. "If on the other hand," he continued, "the Bill takes slow effect, then we shall have compulsion in the more favoured and advanced areas, and then we are sure to have a demand for improvement in these areas; and we shall have to meet that demand for improvement, and meanwhile how are we going to find the money for expansion in the vast tracts which will help to pay the bill and where a single school has now to serve many square miles?"

To deal with the last statement first, we must confess our intellect is not subtle enough to grasp the full import of such intricate reasoning, and we are presumptuous enough to think that many others share our misfortune. But it appears to us that this piece of reasoning was never meant to be understood, and only designed to confound the venturesome layman who would trespass on the domain of the expert. The only way we can answer Mr. Sharp's objection is by turning the horns of the dilemma in his own direction. We believe he accepts the position taken up by the Government that elementary education must become universal some day. This may be done by compulsion or on a voluntary basis, and it may be five years hence, or a century later. All that the Bill proposes is compulsion, while the Government still favours a voluntary basis. How would Mr. Sharp get over the difficulty if Mr. Gokhale dropped his advocacy of compulsion? The dilemma of rapid effect and no improvements, and slow effect and the demand for improvements in advanced areas would still be there, and as we have no fear that Mr. Sharp would prefer to be pierced by one horn rather than the other, we leave it to him to explain how he would avoid both if he was allowed his choice of the voluntary basis. What really surprises us is that so little attention should have been paid to what Mr. Gokhale had said in reply to the argument about inequality in his opening speech by way of anticipation. We are confident it will suffice for all reasonable men if we reproduce that portion of Mr. Gokhale's speech, for he has dealt therein with this objection in the simplest and clearest of ways. He said:

Then it is said that a scheme of this, a permissive scheme which allows areas to come under compulsion one by one, is bound to result in serious material injustice and inequality as regards the assistance received from Government by different localities. Now, my Lord, I need hardly say that this is one of the three great arguments that have been urged against the scheme which we are considering. It is nobody's business as a person of arrangement of the elementary education in certain parts of the country should be on a compulsory basis and in certain others on a voluntary basis, and if the areas that were on a compulsory basis were to get more from Government than the areas that were on a voluntary basis, there would be some force in the contention that different areas would be differently treated. But the arrangement that I propose is clearly, transparently, in the end every part of the country is to be on a compulsory basis and would share equally in the allotment made by Government. In a transitional stage, provided the same terms are equally open to all, I do not see where the injustice or inequality comes in. If a local body feels aggrieved that some other local body gets more than itself from Government, the remedy is in its own hands. All that has got to do is to pay for compulsion itself. Those who object to the proposed scheme on the score that it would lead to material inequality and injustice might object also to the principle of introducing compulsion gradually area by area. For how are we to proceed area by area, unless those areas that introduce compulsion first get about the same time larger assistance from the Government? Moreover, is there absolute equality even at present in all matters? Even now on a voluntary basis the Government, in many parts of the country, has about one third of the cost of primary education, with the result that those areas that spend more get more from the Government, and those that spend less get less. Is that equal? Again, take the question of sanitary grants. Under the existing arrangements, those local bodies that go in for the construction of sanitary projects get a certain grant from the Government. Now, if the local bodies that do not take in hand such projects were to complain of injustice, because others that do are assisted by Government, their complaint would be perfectly ridiculous, and yet, it is the same kind of complaint that is urged against the scheme of the Bill. No one has ever suggested, or can possibly suggest, that any money should be taken out of existing expenditure on primary education for its extension on a compulsory basis. No one can also possibly wish to curtail future increases in the allotments to education on a voluntary basis. The expenditure for introducing compulsion is to come out of additional revenues, partly raised locally and partly raised specially by the Government of India. The Government of India's funds will have necessarily to pass through the Local Governments, since education is a Provincial charge. But that does not mean that Provincial Governments will have to curtail their present or future expenditure on a voluntary basis to finance any scheme of compulsion.

This clear statement was not even distantly referred to by the opponents of the Bill in the debate, and one after another they went on repeating their flimsy objection, believing to be some eternal divine principle what was in effect merely human inanity. Sir Harcourt Butler, at any rate, does not seem to have much faith in this objection, for although he repeated it, he himself brushed it aside in the following sentence when he said: "The resources of the local bodies vary enormously, and so does their financial position. To some of them two-thirds of the cost would be an excessive grant; to others it would be altogether inadequate. Some Boards are rich and others are poor. We cannot possibly have one figure for all." If it is so, what becomes of the fetish of financial equality? In fact, the Bill provides an easily intelligible plan for making the progress of education equitable. This was explained by the Hon. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, who asked on what principle schools were now being created, and himself answered that "it is a principle which exposes the Department in a greater degree to a charge, which has been brought against the Bill before us, of involving injustice to areas where schools are not created." "This," he rightly added, "must happen when you arbitrarily create schools in certain localities and let other localities go without any school." This will be impossible when local contribution is made the basis of Government assistance, as the Bill provides, and every such local area would get schools as would be willing to contribute part of the cost.

There remains only one general objection, and that a non-official one, to deal with, but we shall not waste much space over it. That is the question of popular contribution to the cost of a compulsory extension of elementary education. The Hon. Mr. Dadabhoi, who did not hesitate last year to desire to reduce the revenues of the country by some half a crore a year by doing away with the Excise duty on Cotton, has yet had the courage to claim the meed of patriotism by condemning increased taxation for universal education or the levy of a special education cess. This year he found that many others felt similar patriotic fervour and robbed him of his monopoly. He quoted every such opinion and particularly relished those of certain Local Governments which have, we fear, spoilt the chances of a hard-pressed Finance Member of the future by giving prominence to "the extreme undesirability of enhancing taxation." But if Local Governments recognise "the extreme undesirability of enhancing taxation," we do not fail to do so either, and if Mr. Dadabhoi, Sir G. R. Clunnavis and the Maharaja of Bahadur of Burdwan have objections to be taxed, their poorer countrymen, who have to pay out of the necessities of life and not out of their superfluity, have still greater objections. But can anything be had without paying for it, and is anything certain in life except death and taxes? As Mr. Gokhale said, "if we merely want compulsion but are not prepared to make any sacrifices for the benefits that would accrue from it to the mass of our people, the sooner we give up talking about securing universal education the better." If the Government of Madras and Mr. Dadabhoi found consolation in the fact that of all kingdoms in the world Ireland alone had no education rate, that consolation would now disappear if Home Rule is introduced and Ireland is made to bear her own burden in course of time. It did not occur to Mr. Dadabhoi that if Ireland did not pay the bill, somebody else had to do it just the same, and if he and the Government of Madras can induce England to pay for mass education in India as well as in Ireland, we may be sure Mr. Gokhale will be the first to congratulate Mr. Dadabhoi on so substantial and impersonal a return for his support of Government's views. In the meantime Mr. Mudholkar's test holds the field, that if he "and those that have pronounced their benediction upon free and compulsory education are really serious, if they are really sincere . . . then they must be prepared to put their hands in their pockets." This is a test that has stood the wear and tear of time better than casuistry in debates and indignant protests about sincerity and patriotism. As we had occasion to say last year, it is not yet in the power of leaders of Indian opinion to reject a tax imposed by the Government. But for once we have the option to say whether we shall have an extra tax or not, and is it the height of independence and patriotism to say "No" because the tax is ear-marked for the enlightenment of our own people, while we grin and bear every other tax, imposed by Government without our consent and devoted to objects that can never be mentioned in the same breath with universal elementary education? In Baroda there is no special tax levied for compulsory education, but a third of the resources of local bodies have to be devoted to this purpose. Mr. Gokhale suggests the compulsion of local bodies to provide a third of the cost out of their present resources or a separate cess, and throws the balance of the cost on the general revenues of the country whether in their present condition or enhanced, say, by an addition of 1 per cent. to the Customs. The boon is far greater than the price and we must be content to stand ashamed and humiliated if we are not prepared to pay so little for so much.

The Reform of the Police.

THE general question of Police Administration in this country, in spite of much that has been attempted by the Government in the direction of reform, is still a subject of anxious debate. The elements that constitute the problem are complex in themselves, but their natural complexity is liable to be much more enhanced as they touch the amour propre of men holding different standpoints. There has, however, occurred a marked improvement in the tone of public discussions, notably in the official attitude towards the subject, as would be evident from the debate that took place on the Hon. Mr. Bhupendranath Basu's motion in the Imperial Legislative Council. While there was no lack, on the part of some of the non-official members, of well-informed and even trenchant criticism of the methods and the system of police administration and the abuses to which it gave rise, it was, at the same time, freely recognised that the problem was not a simple one and that it was not entirely the outcome of official obduracy or neglect. The Government, too, on their part admitted that there was still room for improvement in the character of the force, and that the reforms introduced as a result of the inquiries of the Police Commission have not rendered the instrument as efficient as it might be. If the same measure of moderation, care and foresight continues to be exercised in the consideration of the problem, if official bias as well as non-official impatience is not permitted to obscure the real issues, there is no reason why the police administration in this country should not speedily come up to the standards of a civilised society.

How to get the police to become an efficient and incorruptible instrument in the administration of justice is the crux of the problem. A force primarily concerned with the investigation of crime and the preservation of peace and order cannot but be entrusted with certain powers for the adequate discharge of its responsibilities. It is the manner in which these powers are exercised that makes all the difference. The Indian police is the creature of a very complex environment. We have a society in varying stages of progress undergoing a silent revolution in manners, modes of thought and conceptions of social justice. But, while the classes that have most directly come under the Western influences are fast growing up to new standards of life and conduct, the mass of the people are yet, so to speak, in a state of suspended animation. They hear the voice of the spirit that moves on the surface of the waters, but the accents are strange which raise no responsive echoes in their hearts and as yet kindle no secular enthusiasm. Their notions of law and government are what they have picked up from the wreckage of an ancient polity tempered by their experiences of the modern courts of justice. It is from amongst them that the rank and file of the Indian police are drawn. The rules of thumb that are drilled into their consciousness can scarcely expand their mental horizon or alter the character of their psychology. They exercise their powers as they have seen others exercising them, as indeed the traditions of their Service and their own unaided instincts lead them to exercise. No amount of efficient supervision alone can, therefore, effect a radical change in the system and methods of work of the police as long as there is no corresponding improvement in the mentality of the rank and file. Mass education will do more to facilitate reform than any number of Commissions.

There is another aspect of the question which is, sometimes, strangely misunderstood. The Hon. Sir Reginald Cradock complained in the course of his speech during the Council debate, and many other officials have been heard to complain before, that the people do not come forward of their own accord to help the police in the detection of crime. The complaint is true, but the reasons assigned for the general public reluctance are based on a strange misapprehension of facts. It is not because the people lack the necessary moral sense to abhor crime or the ordinary social virtues to assist their neighbour in getting a redress for his wrongs, that they refrain from actively co-operating with the authorities for bringing the criminal to book. They are, as a matter of fact, held back by the methods of the police, its terrorising and summary ways and the wholesale and indiscriminate harassment that often accompanies the investigation of cases. The masses look upon the police as something set up for their annoyance. The idea of the police as a body of public servants charged with the protection of life and property has not yet largely entered into popular conceptions. There can, therefore, be no great hope for the growth of popular co-operation with the police until a fundamental change takes place in the attitude of the people. This, again, reduces the problem to the simple issue of educating the masses with a view to raise their level of intelligence and conceptions of social duty and, above all, to teach them their rights and duties as citizens of the State. Until the man in the street knows exactly what the nature and functions of the institution of police are and realises its direct bearing on the public peace and welfare, matters will not improve much beyond the stage of surface remedies. In this case, too, as in many others, mass education is the key to the situation.

But even apart from these fundamental considerations, much improvement admits of being carried out in the methods of the police and the system of its administration. The law relating to confessions, as it stands, can easily lend itself to abuse and requires drastic amendment. The Hon. the Law Member, while dealing with this aspect of the Hon. Mr. Basu's Resolution, observed that if any of the hon. members thought an amendment of the existing Law was necessary he should embody it in a definite Bill and submit it for the consideration of the Council. He assured the Council that any such Bill when produced would receive sympathetic and careful consideration at the hands of the Government.

We hope the Hon. Mr. Basu will take up the hint and bring forward a measure which, while safeguarding the efficiency of police investigations, will effectually put a stop to the kind of coercion and abuse that are possible under the existing law. All the same, we think it would have materially assisted the framer of such a Bill if the abuses of the present laws had been fully inquired into by a Committee of officials and non-officials.

Among the matters that called forth some heated and energetic observations in the course of the Council discussion were the methods of the Criminal Investigation Department. It was strongly protested by some of the hon. members, who had learnt it through sad personal experience, that the instruments employed by the Department for its occult purposes were often clumsy, dishonest and insolently irritating. They had created more unrest than the one the causes of which they were set to investigate. Even if they were a necessary evil, they had to a great extent outgrown their use, now that the general situation in the country had admittedly grown more settled and calm. The Hon. the Home Member, however, in spite of his mild efforts at playfulness, could not effectively apologise for their methods. Surely, it is hardly the right way to dispose of the grievance by asking the public to put up with the existing instruments of the C.I.D. because better ones cannot be had. If the nature of the work cannot attract a better type of men, that is no reason for letting loose an army of inefficient and, in many cases, unscrupulous men who go about harassing inoffensive and peaceful citizens and fabricating cock-and-bull stories in order to justify their existence. It is better to have no intelligence of guilty conspiracies than to have misleading intelligence, and although we have to endure a less efficient ordinary police, because we must have some police, and cannot get the ideal one at once, or afford to pay the cost, even if we can, the same reasoning does not apply to detectives engaged in unravelling the mystery of political crimes. Here the best is only just good enough and the second best is as bad as the worst. Let the Government devise some organisation to keep in touch with political movements, by all means, but, the organisation must be efficient, and should not be allowed to degenerate into a public nuisance with infinite potentialities for causing provocation and mischief. Under the existing conditions the C.I.D. requires thorough overhauling and drastic reform. We hope the Government inquiries into the working of the Department will result in material reductions in its cadre and in the scope of its activities.

The Hon. Mr. Basu called the attention of the Council to some specific instances of the inefficiency, incompetence and even corruption of the police. Those were, however, cases which had through peculiar circumstances come to public notice. Those who have intimate knowledge of the methods of the subordinate police know that there must be hundreds of cases equally gross and repellent which never see the light of day. The statistics dealing with the cases of police ill-treatment which the Hon. the Home Member quoted to the Council do not reveal the actual state of things. The official records show that there have been in all 166 cases of ill-treatment in five years out of which 57 ended in conviction. "Those cases—that ended in conviction—comprised 120 men. It amounts to 24 men a year on a total force which is now just over 170,000." But even the most careful compilation of official records cannot bring to light many instances of torture, cruelty and corruption, which owing to causes not very difficult to understand, pass off unheard, unnoticed and unavenged. The true facts of a single district would supply material enough for 57 convictions in a single year. It is, therefore, doubtful if much consolation can be derived from official figures. But even official figures cannot disguise the fact that the methods of the police are not ideal in an ideally administered system. The strengthening and improvement of the higher grades of the Police Service were carried out with the ostensible object of enforcing stricter supervision over the work of the rank and file. It was also with this object in view that the new post of Deputy Superintendents was created to attract a better class of Indians. We are, however, afraid the experiment has failed to be productive of very good results mainly because the Deputy Superintendents have not been given the powers and responsibilities originally conceived by the authors of the scheme as commensurate with their rank and position. They have no independence or initiative of any kind, in fact, they simply exist as post officers to transmit the orders of the superintendent to subordinate officials or serve as "proper channels" of communication between them. If Indian officers of good training and education can be expected to exercise wholesome influence on the subordinate force, they should be given a freer hand in dealing with police affairs and greater responsibility in order to acquire the necessary discipline of high office. European officers cannot be expected to have sufficient knowledge of the ways of their Indian subordinates to deal effectively with them. Even long experience, free intercourse with all sorts and conditions of Indians, and special gifts of sympathy cannot give them the same intimacy with the ways and habits of the people which an educated Indian claims as his birthright.

The effective reform of the Indian Police may, then, be considered to be possible only if (1) the education of the Indian masses is taken earnestly in hand, (2) the necessary reforms are introduced in methods of police investigation, (3) the defects in the existing law relating to confessions are removed by legislative action, (4) the police force is instructed fully in its duties as public servant, and (5) educated Indians are freely admitted into the higher grades of the Service and given powers commensurate with their rank. There are several other matters, of no slight consequence in themselves, which should be dealt with as soon as possible by the Government. We believe with the Hon. the Home Member that the police administration has been gradually improving and will continue to improve as time goes on. It is, however, the duty of the Government as well as the public not to leave a branch of the administration, so vitally affecting the welfare of the people to accidents of time but to earnestly and wholeheartedly take counsel together and put it on an efficient basis.

Anecdote.

AN actor told the following story of the late Kyrle Bellew at the Players' Club, in New York.

"Poor Bellew hated a bore. I'll tell you how he once squelched a bore on the way from New York to Chicago."

"Bellew was reading in the smoker. The bore flopped down beside him and opened up with:—

"Well, who are they going to nominate—Taft or Roosevelt?"

"Bellew looked at the bore with a puzzled frown.

"Taft or Roosevelt?" he said. "Who the deuce are they?"

"Why, man," exclaimed the bore, "you don't mean to say you never heard of Bill Taft and Teddy Roosevelt?"

"Never," said Bellew, calmly, and he buried himself in his book again.

"The bore smoked in silence a long while. He kept glancing at Bellew uneasily out of the corner of his eye. At last he said:—

"I wonder how John D. likes all this trustbustin'?"

"John D.?" said Bellew. "John D.?"

"John D. Rockefeller! Richest man on earth. Certainly you've heard of him!" roared the bore.

"No," said Bellew. "No, he's a stranger to me."

"Holy jumpin' Jonah!"

"The bore's contempt was beyond words. He glared at Bellew steadily for nearly half an hour. Then he snorted:—

"Say, ye fool, did ye ever hear of Adam?"

"Bellew looked up from his novel, yawned, and murmured:—

"Adam who? What's his last name?"

In 1874 Mr. Edmund Yates founded the World. Mr. Labouchere became associated with the new paper and was understood to be responsible for its startling and stinging articles on financial affairs. But after a couple of years differences arose and Mr. Labouchere, parting company with the World, established Truth on somewhat similar lines at first. Some one asked him what Truth was going to be, and Labby, undoubtedly one of the most brilliant conversationalists, promptly answered, "Truth is to be another and a better World."

In 1854 Mr. Labouchere had entered the diplomatic service, and during his diplomatic career when he was once ordered to Russia, he arrived after a delay of six weeks. When asked to explain this, he said that as the Government did not pay railway fares, he had had to walk all the way across Europe!

One of Dean Pignon's stories of his college days deals with an encounter between Dr. Whately, when the learned Primate was Archbishop of Dublin, and a young aide-de-camp. At dinner the latter propounded this singular conundrum:—"Does your Grace know the difference between an archbishop and an ass?" "Sir, I do not," answered Dr. Whately. "One wears the cross on his mitre, and the other wears it on his back," explained the tactless officer. "Do you know the difference between an aide-de-camp and an ass?" asked the archbishop, calmly, in return. "No, your Grace I do not," was the reply. "Neither do I," said the grace.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL, when practising at the Bar, was a noted cross-examiner, and it was a shrewd witness who could circumvent him. On one occasion, at least, however, the laugh was turned on him by an innocently intended answer. He was cross-examining a witness in regard to certain hoof-prints left by a horse on sandy soil.

"How large were the prints?" asked Sir Charles. "Were they as large as my hand?" holding up his hand for the witness to see it.

"Oh, no," replied the man in the box: "they were just ordinary-sized hoofs, sir."

The Council.

By THE HON. MR GUY.

"As large a charter as the wind to blow on whom I please"

—As you like it

February 28th.

SIR GUY once more in the Chair. Explained how his too exclusive attention to hon colleague, the MOSLEM DOWATER, had led him on the previous day to conclude that he had concluded his remarks, whereas he had only sat down as the BOMBAY DUCK had bobbed up to the surface of the waters.

SANDOW III presented Lunacy report. As a new feature appeared a provision enabling the wise man who diagnosed his own lunacy to enter the lunatic asylum as a voluntary boarder. Alas, how rare is such introspective wisdom? Had it not been so scarce half the Council would have marched off to the asylums as voluntary boarders.

Following in the footsteps of his Chief, DASHING BOY distinguished himself by taking up the sister service of jails and recommending better treatment of another class of wise men, the jail birds. Talked a lot of gibberish about penologists and recidivism which made the Councillors scratch bald pates for a better understanding of the ununderstandable, and giving unsolicited testimonial to Government for doing all they could for the poor dears incarcerated in prisons, asked for more. Contrasted the efforts of other countries for the discharged prisoner with the nothing done in India and said that his proposal to give them a portion of the income derived from sale of jail products would not cost much. With full assurance faced SIR GUY and said that even if it did, "the money should be found." SIR GUY meanwhile cogitating whether Andamanians would suit the DASHING BOY better or Mandalay.

The resolution of DASHING BOY evidently a C.P. concern altogether. For no one caring to speak, CHERRY CHITNIS rose to support. Found this a fitting opportunity of putting in a good word for Inspector-General LANK of C.P. A useful procedure, for to day many a strange road and unknown by Lane leads to the Burni Ghar, and who knows who may need the favour of the patron saint of the jail birds to reduce his measure of the daily grind?

SANDOW III rose to put the coup de grace to C.P.'s put up job and began with a humble apology for the feats of strength of the previous day. "It has rather been an unkind fate that, during the first very few days that I have had the honour of holding the appointment of the Salar Aga, the Chief of the Seraglio, otherwise known as the Home Department, it has fallen upon me to oppose proposals of the honourable occupants of the Harem. It is more pleasing to agree than to disagree." But even a Strong Man has his limitations and SANDOW III could not accept each and every proposal. But how could he be churlish to DASHING BOY? He would make amends to him for having rudely opposed the MILD HINDU on the previous day. All the same, prisons must not be made too like paradise. Already to the "habituals" jails were known as Sisra, the house of the father-in-law, a place where they receive a certain amount of honour and, what is more than honour, a dashed good looking after. You couldn't indefinitely increase the number of Dartmoor Shepherds in India even to outlive WINSTON. Here not so difficult for a discharged prisoner to return to society on honourable terms. Imprisonment regarded in the East as a form of Pryaschit, the offence being expiated when the sentence has been undergone. "A great number of prisoners return at once without any difficulty to the place in society which they formerly occupied." MUN HOLKAR learnt now for the first time what had prevented the inclusion of the release of TILAK MAHARAJ in the list of Durbar boons. Concluded his remarks by stating that DASHING BOY's proposal was merely one of increasing total jail expenditure, and with the large demands that there were now needed for the requirements of the free population—alas! too free and only technically non criminal—Government would hesitate to add any substantial sum to the allotment already made for the comfort of the poor darlings in the jails.

While SANDOW III was speaking, there floated before the Council visions of SIR ALI BABA, K. C. B.'s jails, those large and comfortable retreats where the Civil Surgeon plays with infinite success the part of Maitre d'Hotel to some eight or nine hundred murderers, robbers, and inferior delinquents, those quiet refuges for world-weary men and sanctuaries undisturbed by the fears of the weak or the passions of the strong, where all reasonable wants are gratified and nothing is hoped for any more, where the poor burglar burdened with the reproaches of a venal world sorrowfully seeks an asylum, and bringing nothing in his hand, seeks nothing but rest. "Look at this prisoner slumbering peacefully besides his hugga under the suggestive bottle tree. . . You can see that he has been softly nurtured. What a sleek and sturdy fellow he is! He is a covenanted servant here, having passed an examination in gang robbery accompanied by violence and prevarication. He cannot be discharged under a long term of years. Uncovenanted pilferers, in for a week, regard him with respect and envy. And certainly his lot is enviable; he has no cares no anxieties. Famine and the depreciation of silver are nothing to him. Rain or sunshine, he lives in plenty. His days are spent in an innocent round of duties, relieved by sleep and contemplation of roo. In the long heats of summer he whiles away his time with carpet making, between the showers of autumn he digs, like our first parents, in the Doctor's garden, and in winter, as there is no billiard-table, he takes a turn on the treadmill with his mates. . . Yet sometimes a murmur rises like a summer zephyr even from the soft lap of luxury and ease. Even the hardened criminal, dandled on the knee of a patriarchal Government, will sometimes complain and try to give the Doctor trouble. But the Doctor has a specific—a brief incantation that allays every species of inflammatory discontent. 'Look here, my man! If I hear any more of this infernal nonsense, I'll turn you out of the jail neck and crop'. This is the threat that never fails to produce the desired effect. To be expelled from jail and driven, like Cain, into the rude and wicked world, a wanderer, an outcast—this would indeed be a cruel ban. Before such a presentiment the well-ordered mind of the criminal recoils with horror."

What could DASHING BOY do but withdraw his resolution. It had given him and CHERRY CHITNIS one more opportunity of adorning in public a patriarchal Government, and SANDOW III an occasion to show his suaviter in modo aspect as he had shown the fortiter in re side on the day before.

The next item on the programme was the resolution of BHUPEN BABU for the appointment of a Committee to enquire into Police polmal and the necessity of amending the law relating to confessions. BHUPEN BABU commenced his speech with the hope that he at least would not place SANDOW III in the confessedly awkward position of having to oppose a resolution "It seeks to confer a positive boon upon humanity in India." Knowing full well that he would one day have to make a fairly large draft of the patience of the police, the wily Solicitor-Politician had built up a good credit at the Bank by mildly exhorting friends and followers at the Faridpur Conference to take care and not paint the police blacker than pitch. So today reminded the banker that if he was going to have a run on the Bank, it was after all what any shrewd banker should have expected. After referring to the pre-Police Commission days, and the confessions of police corruption and incompetence extorted from officials, mentioned the "reforms" effected since then "We have now an Imperial Criminal Investigation Department with a Director at its head. We have got Inspectors-General of Police in all Provinces with an adequate staff under them. We have got Deputy Inspectors-General recruited from England." And yet—"Confessions disregarded in Courts of Justice throw a lurid light into those dark corners where unhappy victims are put on the rack." The ladies in the Visitors' Gallery looked nervously at each other and then at the aged Councillors, fearing a fierce light heating upon their Kala Juggahs. But they were reassured when BHUPEN BABU referred to the bootlegging of the police in October 1907 when the Rai Bahadur of Sular Samachar fame—"that ill-advised and ill-starred venture, a subsidised newspaper for Bengal"—constituted himself into Police Commissioner, Presidency Magistrate, High Court and all. Then came a reference to "an unparalleled midnight raid" on Mymensingh, which read like a romance but was silly enough to be a fact. Once more a People's Commission sat and recorded evidence, but the report submitted to the Ebasam Government—now on its death bed—sought the contemptuous oblivion which its author, BHUPEN BABU himself, would shun like plague. SIR BASPINDER FULTER, whom irony of fate had once more brought out to India, heard all this with evident animation from Visitors' Gallery. Then, again, there was the GUJAN BANO case in the Punjab which could only be described with any show of decency in a book on Medical Jurisprudence. The Chief Court ordered an inquiry, but the sturdy DANK snapped his fingers at Ye Men of Law and when they said they were not satisfied with this mark of courtesy, the great DANK politely told them they could go to a place where the coal strike could not affect the supply of fuel. What was the reply of the MASTER OF EMBANK to these disclosures? Nothing but that the police force was "drawn from an Oriental population."

Nearer home, there were the Midnapur, the Howrah Gang and the Barrali Dacoity cases, and the Punjab once more supplied an equally sensational case, the one of Rawalpindi. But the statistics of torture cases were unreliable. "They were like small boats indicating an immense wreck swallowed by the silent waters of the sea." Why don't people report more torture cases? The answer to this was the Indian proverb Irishised, "If you live in a sea of allegations, do not quarrel with the alligators." It is seldom that the police follow Absalom and commit offences on the housetops of Jerusalem. Then quoted at great length the Statesman—"until the recent announcement regarding the change of Capital, one of the greatest exponents and most capable supporter of existing institutions." Regardless of the fugitive tendencies of the time allotted to each speaker in the Council, BHUPEN BABU spread himself and leisurely read out the leader of the Statesman. But SIR GUY, who had to condense the wisdom of many into a tabloid debate, silently looked "Shears" at BHUPEN. So promised that he was coming to the end of his speech, but on second thoughts added "nearly" to keep the door open.

After this described the many virtues of the C. I. D., chief among them being "generally the creation of unrest." "The thing called 'unrest' was declared to be a bye-product of the armoury of repression. It was indeed a unique concession to the police that 'unrest' was characterised by BHUPEN BABU as a "thing" and not a fiction. Wanted the policeman to be the friend of the people, and not a dangerous individual, hoping that some day Constable X3175 would be invited to their houses by the cook to taste a tureenful of soup and escort the affectionate Commissariat on "the night out." Gladdened the heart of SANDOW III. by saying that those who accuse the Government "as such" of desiring to shield the iniquity of the police were guilty of the grossest calumny. But this thing of beauty was not a joy for ever. Brought down the temperature below normal by qualifying this criticism of the calumniators with the remark that it was difficult to separate the instrument from the hand that wields it and the tree from the fruit. If the machinery is defective the manufacturer cannot escape responsibility. To this was added the parting shot that in ancient India even calamities like famine and pestilence were ascribed to the sins of the rulers and the same feeling must be exceptionally strong in the paternal form of Government which prevails to-day and is the pride of the Anglo-Indian official of the Mai-Bab School. But before BHUPEN BABU could discuss the law relating to confessions, SIR GUY, inexorable as the dread sisters, cut short the thread of his critical eloquence and fluent sarcasm with the Presidential shears. "I must now ask the hon member to stop." So BHUPEN BABU resumed his seat dolefully after explaining that he wanted to read a quotation from a Government publication.

It is said that the pudda, the smallest bird known in India, sleeps with its legs lifted up. A cautious bird that, for it fears that the heavens may come down during the night and hurt him and the world. Ornithologists trace an affinity between the pudda and MELANCHOLY MADGE. It was therefore necessary that the first to defend the police of India against the onslaughts of BHUPEN BABU should be MADGE. However, the opening sentence of his speech not a defence of the police but an assurance given to suffering humanity "Sir, there can be no doubt whatever that the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty and I should not be worthy of my place in this Council if I withheld my sympathy from the victims of such cruelty, whether they were reported from Siberia or from the hamlets of Bengal." Is it true that MADGE has been canonised in Siberia as ST. MADGE THE SYMPATHETIC? But to continue "We are dealing," said MADGE, "with conditions in this country in which, at least as Englishmen believe, a higher standard of morality has been applied to a lower." But, MADGE, we should like to know not what Englishmen believe, but what the Eurasians think. After referring to "those of us who ponder these deep problems," MADGE confessed that "I stand in a sense between the two classes"—a veritable hyphen between the "Anglo" and the "Indian," the missing link of Indian ethnology—and he thought a great deal of crime would not have been committed if educated and intelligent gentlemen came forward boldly and acted as unpaid policemen. The police cannot be improved "by foreigners passing laws." What if MADGE was the sole legislator? Is he "foreigner" too? And then came that great dictum from MADGE, not of Truth, for which the world had been waiting with expectant ear. "No man can be made an angel by Act of Parliament." You see, he had tried an Act but it failed to make MADGE anything other than the MADGE he is. According to him time and energy have been wasted by Indians on political affairs. It should have been directed to the raising of the moral standard of this country to the high level of MADGE's own native land. (Couldn't say exactly what it was, but "Hyphenia" was nowhere marked on the map.) MADGE had the consciousness of laying himself open to severe criticism, "but that is a sort of criticism to which men accustomed to stand alone do not attach the slightest importance." MADGE from the giddy heights of the moral standard of "Hyphenia" could afford to ignore such impudence.

THE FREE LANCE of the Tiwanas has been cultivating modesty in the company of the KHAN RAHADUR, and asked "May I give in my speech?" SIR GUY's knowledge of Council procedure was a little misty this morning and he looked doubtful and sought the assistance of ST. VINCENT. But the CROSS-BENCHER echoed the sentiment of the whole Council and said "No." SIR GUY took courage and said it would be preferable if such gems were displayed before all rather than locked up in the jewel box of ST. VINCENT. Thereupon the FREE LANCE enlightened the Council with the pregnant remark, "As there is some thing wrong somewhere, people begin to differ in their view." Some accused police, some accused Magistrates, some accused witnesses, some accused the lower standard of morality, and some thought that it was the want of education. But, in the opinion of FREE LANCE it was the Law that was an ass. "I do not think there is very great necessity for enquiring into the police administration after the Police Commission, but I do feel the necessity of a thorough enquiry into the whole administration." And with the courage of the Tiwanas, he boldly declared "I am ready to vote for it, though even the overthrow of the resolution may be a free gone conclusion."

MUD HOLKAR was dull and sensible, but the DASHING BOY rescued the good name of the Orange Free State by his irrational brilliance. "Sir, I came to this Council this morning with an open mind, and if there was any bias it was a bias in favour of BHUPEN BABU. If he could have convinced me that the suggested enquiry would be a panacea for all the evils connected with police administration, I should certainly vote for his Resolution." You see, DASHING BOY never takes a headache cure unless it is warranted to cure leprosy, pneumonia, sciatica, necrosis, nasal catarrh, dysentery, scrotula, rheumatism, phthisis, chilblains, hemorrhage, congenital deafness, dumbness and loss of sight, burns, itching, cuts and abrasions of the skin, diphtheria, nose bleeding, gout, general debility, etc., etc., all at once. Under the circumstances, he could not vote for BHUPEN, but all the same grateful to him for an excellent opportunity to praise the "C.I.D. Department," in the Orange Free State where it had broken "the backbone of sedition under the energetic control of SIR CHARLES CLEVELAND," and of putting in a good word for an ex-Chief Commissioner, ST ANDREW FRASER, who had presided over the Police Commission.

After the description of the Mymensingh police romance, the BRITISH LION was thirsting for revenge on the Bengal tiger, and rising after DASHING BOY added a few more to the tiger's stripes. Ridiculed the People's Commission of two, one of whom, and the magna pars, was BHUPEN himself. It was self-appointed, unless its nomination by a well-known Calcutta newspaper may be held to constitute appointment. It recorded during two or two and a half days only an enormous number of depositions, "and a careful calculation made at the time suggested that they were only able to give from two to three minutes to each witness." Related the story of a shopkeeper of Mymensingh who had rearranged his shop after the loot, but who obligingly stage-managed the disorder once more when the People's Commission came on the scene. Concluded by saying that BHUPEN BABU had not exercised his "customary sobriety" in luccupping out the allegations against the police, but he would not libel BHUPEN's high reputation as lawyer by suggesting that he himself believed that the evidence recorded by him was worth more than the paper upon which it was recorded. That leaves a few ounces of Stephens' blue-black and the wear and tear of the pen still as a dead loss to the People of Bengal.

THE CARR OF JUGGERNAUT almost gave the whole show away by declaring that "no one will deny that very grave abuses do exist." But he advised the Council to wait for an official generation for the full results of the Commission's reforms, and if the increase in the Inspectors-General's salaries did not make KULDEE SINGH and JUMMA KHAN less liable to temptation than before, they could appoint another Commission to report in three years from the date of appointment and add a few hundred more to the salaries of the Inspectors-General. Tried at great length to justify the ways of LAWLESSLY to the benighted Madrassis by reading copious extracts from the latest Gubernatorial Resolution on the police and proved conclusively that although his Government had exchanged Head Constables as station-officers with Sub-Inspectors and reduced the stations to meet the extra cost, they discovered from the spontaneous lamentations of the people that they had kicked out angels unaware. As for the Constables, their pay was raised from Rs. 7 to—Rs. 8. What more do you want? Naturally there was an automatic reduction of one rupee per month per constable in the balai amadani, that cream of the police dairy which drops from above like manna for the deserving policeman.

HOODA has a horror of Commissions, and likes net cash reform. But he rose to point out to MELANCHOLY MADGE that the low standard of Indian morality did not prevent other departments manned by Indians, such as the judiciary, from being honest and incorruptible.

CHEERY CHITNIS said "Sir, I came with an open mind and a closed mouth, but after what has fallen from BHUPEN I think I should oppose this Resolution." A mere coincidence, you know, that both the ideal citizens of the Orange Free State came with open minds, and after hearing what BHUPEN had to say thought they should oppose the resolution. CHEERY associated himself "with everything that has fallen from my friend, DASHING BOY, as regards the operations of the C. I. D. in my province," but failed to add the obvious truth that he also associated himself with everything that would fall later from SANDOW III.

GHAS-DANA GRAHAM read out the Articles of Association joining him with MADGE in an Unlimited Assets Company in which the sole dividends were abuse of Educated Indians, and added on his own account that there was a general feeling in his community that in the criminal cases upset by the High Court "the standard of evidence required in Bengal is one which is very nearly unattainable, and which may almost be called quixotic." For a proof, look at the High Courts of other provinces obediently coming to heel whenever the whistle was blown and the dog whip cracked. One would have thought that with a low standard of morality in the land lives of accused persons should not be at the mercy of every passing perjurer. But logic and commerce do not go together and GHAS-DANA GRAHAM had to justify his knight-hood by such errantry as this. Lucky that SURLY TREMENDOUS and PAUL GOOSE were not there to match this lamentation over Indians not taking upon themselves public duty by a jeremiad on the retriving habits of Anglo India—specially at the approach of knight.

The MILD HINDU, in high spirits to day, began by condemning police administration in Native States and still more so in Poona under the Maharatta Confederacy. But the MILD HINDU is most strong in reality when he is most mild in appearance, and riddled the C. I. D. most effectively with shots from his Automatic Browning pistol. In view of the Under-Secretary of State's statements, had expected legislation this season. "Very probably the MOSLEM DOWAGER is going to take part in this debate. I see he has been taking notes." But the wily DOWAGER held up the writing pad to the expectant gaze of the MILD HINDU and showed that he had been making a new wall pattern for Imperial Delhi. Coming to the C. I. D., revealed a scandalous state of affairs in that ideal Province of Craddocks and Cleveland where even that "ideal citizen," CHEERY CHITNIS, "happy in the consciousness of high official appreciation," who had given such an excellent chit to the C. I. D., had not escaped anxiety on account of its operations. Even he had reason to complain that he was made the subject of an adverse confidential report. CHITNIS lost all his cheeriness, for, alas, even virtue was not its own reward and merited C. I. D. reports. Then the MILD HINDU mentioned the case of VITAL THACKERAY whom the C. I. D. had baptised at Dacca and Chittagong as SIR VITAL DAS THAKUR DAS and pestered with their attentions when sightseeing and commercial curiosity led him to the Far East of India. When such righteous and eminent men were favoured by the C. I. D., how could he escape their friendly interest in his doings and undoings? But he took it as part of the bargain and made no bones about it. If, then, he complained, it was not because he objected to the Department, or its Criminality, but because he was astounded at their want of Intelligence. "I belong," continued the MILD HINDU, "to a society of young men." The Council marked with amusement the youthful spirits of the MILD HINDU and laughter greeted the remark. So he hastened to explain that it was the other members that were young. As for him, alas, his way of life had fallen into the sere, the yellow leaf, and as he sadly confessed this a pair of coal black Bengal eyes in the Visitors' Gallery became moist and a tiny lace handkerchief was used to remove the tell-tale tear. Not desiring to create a storm in the Bay, the MILD HINDU lightly plunged himself into the ridiculous by describing how in SIR JOHN ROUGH-HEW-IT'S dominions a C. I. D. spy worked secretly at finding out what one of the Servants of India was doing by insisting on sitting on the coach box of twice garris engaged by the latter for going about, while another with Falstaffian proportions was given a cyclist detective—because there was no motorist detective available at the time, all having been commandeered to bring the khubber of the seditious tigers whom SIR JOHN was hunting in the teran. The MILD HINDU was himself reported against, a speech of his having been distorted with the skill of a cartoonist. He objected to such tactics of a class of men who go behind the backs of people and report against them. As he uttered this, the figure of the well-seasoned Inspector HANSON, who was in charge of the Government House, was seen gliding like a portly ghost in the Writing Room behind the MILD HINDU.

The Hon LONGFELLOW had exactly hit off the mean between the popular party that thought policemen to be human fiends and beyond the reach of salvation and the Government that thought it an insult to them to compare them to angels. But the mean of LONGFELLOW overtops the highest appreciation of humbler and less Himalayan humanity. According to him, "the morale of the Police has enormously improved. The corruption which existed only a few years ago was almost non-existent." There was a time, he said, when old women used to bless Sessions Judges by praying to God Almighty to make the Judge a Darogha, and the MOSLEM DOWAGER would perhaps oblige him by giving the Council that fascinating lyric of Behar in which a love-sick maiden is entreating the Darogha to tell her why he has arrested her lover, no doubt knowing it all the time, like the true Behar maiden, that the real cause of the arrest was—herself. Council wondered whether Hon LONGFELLOW would next ask the Hon CROSS-BREWER to sing that noble refrain—

Sonnyau bhary Kotwal, au dar kahe ka

(My sweetheart is now the Kotwal, so who fears?) That time is gone now, and the ambitions of Behar maidens have risen from the low levels of Daroghas and Kotwals even to the height of Everest peaks and Councillorships. But for all that, the Governments are not right in exhausting all their time in whitewashing the almost immaculately white Police thanas.

But he had not come to blame the police so much as to bury MELANCHOLY MADGE and GHAS-DANA GRAHAM. They talk of the morality of Indians and attribute the low morals of the police to the low morals of Indians. LONGFELLOW resented this on behalf of his countrymen. MADGE had said the same thing at Simla but had not been thrown down the khud for all that. "The offence has been repeated and I shall not let it pass this time." And thereafter he applied to poor doleful MADGE all the rigours of the law reserved for old offenders. What if the constables were all Indians? Were not a great many Inspectors recruited from the ranks of the Imperial Cousins of whom MADGE was a shining example?

Later, described the process of manufacture of cases to suit the temperature of the Strong Man who must have a conviction for every offence. Truth may be a minor bye-product of some of these cases, but it was not the finished article put on the judicial market for selling Judge and Jury. "Well, there has been one miscalculation in all this on the part of the police; they have entirely overlooked the pestilential class of people who are called lawyers. The result is that in cross-examination the case is smashed up; and then this despised class get the whole blame. The officials think that they should be at once banished and deported to Mandalay." After this exposure of police tactics and the counter tactics of law, turned in the direction of the C.I.D., and was referring to the case of the derailment at Neora "almost within sight of the Moslem Dowager's country-house," when the policeman in charge of the Council crossing held up the traffic by raising his hand, and LONGFELLOW was pulled up before he had passed the country house of the Moslem Dowager.

The BOMBAY DUCK was mildly superior and deprecated racial controversies. He was followed by the NAWAB OF JAUNPUR who had, he said, come to the Council with the intention, if possible, of supporting BHUPEN'S Resolution. Here was something more than an open mind, but, alas and alack, he too followed the primrose path of loyalty after DASHING BOY and CHERRY CHURNS. The "violent attacks" which BHUPEN had made on the police changed his mind and also his arguments, for he thought the police decent enough and Commissions waste of labour and waste of money. Wonder what he would have thought of the police and Commissions if BHUPEN had not attacked the police. He had come with the intention to support the Resolution and it would have been an education in logic as well as psychology if he would have found arguments to support the appointment of a Commission, which is a waste of labour and a waste of money, to enquire into the abuses of a police that was decent enough in all conscience.

The PANDIT announced that the C.I.D. on which the English prided themselves was not a new invention for the invention of facts, but had existed in the Vedic period in India. Another instance of "Hindu Superiority."

The MOSLEM DOWAGER, although he had made no notes, rose to resent that BHUPEN had ignored his Department and wished to hand over its powers and functions to the Council. He promised BHUPEN BABU his best attention when he introduced a Bill to amend the laws relating to confessions and was sure the Select Committee would give it its most serious consideration, —that is if it reached a Select Committee. (Composition: Shall I use 72 point bold Cheltenham to display the 'if', Sir?)

The KHAN BAHADUR showed patriotism by resenting attack on Indian morality and loyalty by opposing the Resolution.

As SANDOW III rose to speak for Government, PRESIDENT CLEVERLAND appeared on the scene to answer the call of the audience for the hero of the C.I.D. plot. SANDOW praised BHUPEN for moderation in taking out the sting after every bite, but reserved the final gratitude till he had seen the sting in the tail which Sir Grey had cut short and till he felt sure that that too would be taken out. He made the most of LONGFELLOW'S praise of the police, but could not understand how a man whose praise was as high as himself could support the Resolution. Little does SANDOW III know the ups and downs of the Hon. LONGFELLOW'S estimates of men and things. He entered into an elaborate psychological study of official and non-official minds when condemning the police and stated that the Police Commission Report was not artistic enough. Had he rather than his predecessor, Sir ANDREW FROSER, been commissioned to paint the portrait, he would have introduced more light and shade into a uniformly dark presentment — purely in the interest of Art, you know. Now the Indian policeman was not half bad a fellow. He made a good husband and father and looked after his family. Only SANDOW III forgot that the public was neither his spouse nor daughter, and did not desire to obtain from him conjugal bliss or parental affection, nor indeed merely the looking after his own family. If the policeman was "just an ordinary man" the sooner extraordinary men were recruited for the service the better. Following the logic of JOSEPH STRAIGHT, reminded the Council that if once suspicions were entertained of the constabulary, he owed it to the honour of his Service to endeavour to outwit the Judge and the Jury. It becomes him to be corrupt and false in compliment to their discernment. It is his conscious innocence that is of the greatest prejudice to him. His conduct is like a person in a plethora, absolutely dying from too much health. He must sin in his own defence and put with his conscience to preserve his reputation. The moment you called him a rogue SANDOW was sure the devil angel, who had every virtue except altruism, would feel in honour bound to become a rogue.

When he referred to the harassment of the MILD HINDU, and hinted that appearances even in the case of Servants of India may be deceptive, MILD HINDU rose to explain that he wanted no special concession. He only complained of the clumsiness of the instrument, not of the dangerous operation. To this SANDOW had a ready answer. "You don't object to the theory, but object to the practice," for he could not help if a delicate lady's troublesome tooth had to be extracted with the help of hammer and tongs by a C. I. Dentist used to ease the toothache of a hippopotamus. As for the report against CHERRY CHURNS, expressed great surprise that any venturesome brute should think of laying a rough hand on his little pet. At this pussy purred gratefully and made a Roman arch of the feline back that had been so gently stroked. Concluded by stating that on behalf of Government the Resolution could not be accepted. This gave boundless joy to DASHING BOY who cheered loudly and long and almost had to be carried out in a pleasant fit of loyal hysteria.

BHUPEN BABU in reply pitched into GHAS-DANA GRAHAM for characterising the rules of evidence as "exotic" when in reality he had called them "quixotic." Six of one and half a dozen of the other, any way, and GRAHAM would have done better if he had acquired more experience before calling the High Court of Bengal names. But GRAHAM'S rush in where Solicitors fear to tread. What is it that turns their Durwans, who are gentlemen in culture and breeding notwithstanding their ignorance, into—er—well, policemen? The same that turns Englishmen into—er—Anglo-Indians, namely, a barbarous environment. Coming to the BRITISH LION, glad to welcome the lost sheep of Israel back to the fold. But had he forgotten in the soft life of the East that he was tackling a rough customer? "It was not two minutes and a half that we gave to each witness, but three days multiplied by two People's Commissioners upon forty-five witnesses." As the MILD HINDU had regaled the Council with comic stories of the C.I.D., BHUPEN had one of his own to relate. A man whose soul is not tuned to music — capable of treason, and a fiddler tested this by fiddling away for very life all the twenty-four hours of the day and night in a house opposite to BHUPEN'S window. He didn't seem to care a fiddle for earning a livelihood. The eternal fiddling was given up only when BHUPEN went to England. Wonder whether there Scotland Yard honoured him with a single violinist or a whole orchestra of detectives. Any way, he faced the music boldly, and himself harped on the one subject of the Parotian till the fiddles of Government were silenced.

Petty Larceny.

The concert was over, and the performers, having had a grand reception by a large audience, were recounting some of their former experiences, certain of which were rather high-coloured.

"I was singing a pretty song once," said one. "It was called 'Row, Brothers Row, the Stream Runs Fast,' and when I was half-way through, the audience were bending backwards and forwards, and pulling for all they were worth."

"That's nothing," said another vocalist. "Why, at my last concert I sang 'The Last Post,' and the whole house began to lick imaginary postage stamps, and rushed out to the first pillar-box so as to be sure not to miss the last collection."

"AHA!" exclaimed Hurluck Sholmes, as he entered the apartment. "There was a mouse in the room."

"Your power of scent, Hurluck," commented Wector Dotson, "is simply marvellous."

"Scent be bothered!" said the great detective. "See the heel marks of a woman's shoe on this chair!"

The Caller. "I think your husband always dresses so nice and quietly."

The Wife. "Oh, does he indeed? You should hear him when he loses a collar stud!"

It is true that a spruce appearance is essential to business success, but I find it is also true that business success is essential to a spruce appearance.

First Volunteer. "You take the noise of this shrapnel and volley hung very coolly."

Second Volunteer. "O, sure! When I'm home, you see, I ride a motor cycle!"

A LADY visitor from up-country was being shown over one of the ships in port the other day by one of the crew. The lady was extremely grateful and told the ord. salt so, and mentioned how sorry she was to see that the rules of the ship forbid tips being given to the crew. "Bless you, mum" blurted the sailor after some hesitation, "so were apples in the Garden of Eden."

HILDA Lessways went to an inn kept by a scornful and supercilious couple. The train had left her, and left her in company with a gentleman who was neither husband, father, nor brother. The host, timid and puritanical, doubted the propriety of giving her shelter for the night, but the wife was more astute. "She's all right," she announced with conviction, "look at them low heels!"

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

REUTER wires from St. Petersburg on the 11th.—An official communiqué states that the Russian police in Persia has only one aim, the earliest possible termination of disturbances which are so unfavourable to Russian economic interests and threaten to lead to further complications.

A blue book on Persian affairs has been issued. It includes the correspondence between Sir Edward Grey, Sir George Barclay, Sir George Buchanan and others and comprises 333 despatches. Sir Edward Grey on 16th November wrote to Sir George Buchanan that he had told the councillor to the Russian Embassy that he was seriously concerned about Persia. If Russia was satisfied that she had grievances demanding redress, she must, of course, formulate her own demands. If Russia thought that no satisfactory settlement could be reached without the dismissal of Mr Shuster, Sir Edward Grey could urge no objection. He did not wish to suggest the dismissal of Mr Shuster, but mentioned it lest there should be an impression at St. Petersburg that Sir Edward Grey was prepossessed in his favour. As a matter of fact, he had given him endless trouble by inconvenient appointments of British subjects.

Sir Edward Grey proceeded to dilate on the possible consequences of the action Russia might take. He deprecated strongly the occupation of Teheran, which was sure to have an effect upon the Mahomedan world and was a most serious thing. He suggested therefore that when Russia had sent troops to Kazvin she should pause and formulate demands. If further pressure proved necessary why should not Russia seize some of the customs or even impound the revenues of Tabriz? The occupation of the capital might react most unfavourably on India, especially if it were thought that Britain was in any way a consenting party.

Sir George Buchanan replied that the Acting Foreign Minister had dismissed the idea of seizure of customs as quite inadequate. He refused to allow Persia further delay after the arrival of troops at Kazvin. Russia would recall the troops on Mr Shuster's dismissal. Sir Edward Grey wrote to Sir George Buchanan on 2nd December. "I spoke most seriously to Count Lencokendroff regarding my anxiety over Persia. I said it was unfortunate in the first instance that the Russian ultimatum was based on the question of the property of Shua-Es-Sultaneh, as that question was of comparatively slight importance, and the Russian case did not seem very strong. I also regretted that Russian troops were not withdrawn when Persia complied with the two demands in connection with the property. Mr. Shuster had rejected the British advice and placed Britain in a most embarrassing position. Some arrangements with Persia respecting her foreign advisers was necessary to prevent Britain from being again placed in such a position."

Sir Edward Grey went on to say that he thought it would have been better if Persia had been asked to promise not to appoint foreign advisers without consultation with the British and Russian legations. He regretted that Russian demand for indemnity British trade had suffered as much as or more than Russian. Indeed Russian trade in the north might even have gained by the stoppage of British trade in the south. He urged that no further far-reaching Russian demands should be made without consultation with Britain. Sir Edward Grey concluded: "At present, we are passing through a most delicate and most difficult time. I am afraid that Government in St. Petersburg has not realised the great issue at stake or what care is needed to prevent our drifting apart."

Russia replying on 5th December intimated that she would not make demands affecting the political future of Persia without consulting Britain. She sincerely desired to see co-operation between the two Governments maintained.

Teheran, March 25.

The agitation at Meshed in favour of the return of the ex-Shah has reached such proportions that the Russian Consul-General has been compelled to proclaim martial law, and Russian troops have accordingly taken possession of the town.

The Persian Government has received the balance of the Anglo-Russian advance of £200,000.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

Reuter's Teheran correspondent telegraphs:—Owing to serious street fighting at Meshed between the partisans of the ex-Shah and the Constitutionalists, the Russian Consul-General has seen fit to proclaim martial law there. There are about 2,000 Russian troops at Meshed.

The account received from St. Petersburg is as follows:— "According to a telegram from Meshed the Persian troops stationed in the citadel there to day (Monday) made a sortie against the town. Street fighting ensuing, General Riedko, commanding the Russian troops in the town, was compelled to take steps to restore order."

Reuter's St. Petersburg correspondent says that a telegram from Meshed gives particulars of the circumstances which led to the proclamation of martial law there by the Russian Consul-General. The message states that as a force of Government police were retiring into the town on Monday, pursued by the adherents of the ex-Shah, who had made a sortie from their sanctuary at the tomb of the Imam Riza, disorders broke out among the populace, who began to pillage houses and attacked several Russians. Matters assumed such a threatening aspect that with the consent of the Persian authorities, who were unable to cope with the situation, the Russian Consul-General proclaimed martial law in the town, and handed over the command to the Commander of the Russian troops. Russian patrols restored order without firing a shot, and the adherents of the ex-Shah withdrew to their refuge, where they remain quiet. It is expected that they will accept the amnesty offered them.

It is added that the inhabitants have expressed their thanks to the Consul-General for the vigorous measures taken by him. The Governor-General of Khorasan, of which province Meshed is the capital, and the Commander of the Persian troops have tendered their resignations.

The Frankfurter Zeitung comments bitterly on the situation created by the acceptance of the Anglo-Russian terms by the Persian Government. "For the mere sandwich of an advance of £200,000 Persia has now bartered away the last remnant of her power and independence. It was over the head of Persia that Russia and England had concluded the Agreement of 31st August 1907, by which they secured to each other 'spheres of influence.' Persia, whose increase was the subject of the bargain, was not asked for permission, and for five years she refused to sign her death warrant. The Persian Government now uses the same pen with which it signs the loan contract in order to inform the British and the Russians that it will bring its policy into harmony with the principles of the Agreement of 1907. This means that Persia has now even officially ceased to exist as an independent State, and that she has placed herself under a Russo-British protectorate."

The journal makes light of the reservation made by the Persian Government under the preamble of the Agreement, and of the hope expressed by it for an early evacuation of the country by the Russian troops. Temps passés, says the Radical organ, and, besides, "loans and evacuation do not well go hand in hand. The more money is accepted the fainter grows the chance that the foreign troops will leave the country."

The journal continues: "Russia has attained her object. What England has achieved is not clear. Throughout the history of the Persian question since 1907 Russia was the moving force, and England was merely the satellite. In the course of a recent debate in the House of Commons Sir Edward Grey was not even in the position to say decisively 'No' in reply to the question whether the strategical position of India had now become worse than before. Even in this question—an all-important one for the British Empire—he is obliged to place himself at the mercy of Russia, for he distinctly declared that the situation on the Indian frontier depended upon the use which Russia might be pleased to make of her position in Northern Persia."

Reuter's Paris correspondent says that the Matin of yesterday announces that in view of the Russian Government's protests Turkey has decided not to send any more troops into Persia.

A Constantinople message says that the first meeting of the Turco-Persian Boundary Commission was held yesterday.

Odessa, March 27.

The editor of the Odesski Listok has had an interview with Staff-Captain Khabaef, the special Russian adjutant attached to the ex-Shah, and the official intermediary between the latter and the Government in business and private matters.

The captain said it was perfectly true that Mohammed Ali Shah had been given the option of choosing a domicile either in Russia or England, but so far he had made no definite choice. Captain Khabaef inclined to the belief that Mohammed Ali would remain in Russia, where, he hinted, it would be easy to keep him under a sort of unobtrusive surveillance.

Teheran, March 24.

Salar-ed-Dowleh, the ex-Shah's brother, has rejected the offer of a pension if he will retire, conveyed to him by the British and Russian Consuls at Kermanshah, and has informed them that he claims sovereignty over Western Persia under the suzerainty of the Shah. The British and Russian Governments will probably now make sterner representations and order him to leave the country. It is desired, if possible, to avoid a Russian expedition to Kermanshah. The Turks show willingness to undertake his expulsion, Kermanshah being within easy reach of the Turkish frontier, but the suggestion meets with little favour.

Disorders are reported at Ispahan and Meshed, where the bazaars are closed.

In Teheran the scarcity of bread causes great distress. Five hundred women made a demonstration to day before the Sipahdar's house. Finally they were dispersed by the police, several being wounded, one possibly mortally.

St. Petersburg, March 27.

Salar-ed-Dowleh's intention of founding a vassal State in Western Persia compels the question whether Russia can reasonably be expected to assume the additional burden of forcibly removing the turbulent Prince. Joint Anglo-Russian representations at Constantinople might solve the difficulty if, as rumoured, Salar-ed-Dowleh is encouraged by hopes of Turkish support.

The Persian Situation.

It will be long, we fear, before the situation in Persia can be described as tolerable, even judged by Oriental standards, but the Government of the Shah have at last taken a first step towards practical reform. They have accepted the small loan of £200,000 offered to them in equal shares by the British and the Russian Governments, and, of course, they have at the same time assented to the conditions on which the offer was made. If they observe those conditions faithfully and continue to act in the spirit of their present declarations, they will be doing their country the truest service in their power. Persia has passed through a trying period of Constitutional experiment. It has left her with a Treasury as empty as when it began and with her old problems unsolved and in many cases sorely aggravated. Her first task is to thrust down the anarchy which is bursting out in so many different parts of her dominions. The bread riots in the capital and the disorders at Ispahan and Meshed of which we hear to-day are but symptoms of the deep-seated disease which afflicts her. She is suffering as Eastern lands do suffer, when there is no hand to enforce those elementary rights on which all society and all civilization depend. The first remedy, and the only remedy which at this stage of her malady can profit her, is to set up an executive of some kind with a strong hand and with the will to use it. A supply of money, as we have again and again observed, is the condition precedent to the creation of such an executive. Without money the Government cannot pay the public force, and unpaid, or irregularly paid, soldiers and gendarmes are a danger, instead of safeguard, to order. The present loan is of course not intended to finance a force to keep order throughout a vast kingdom. It is a first step which will enable the Government to meet the more pressing demands upon them and perhaps to collect some small part of the revenue. The reference to "the next loan" in the Anglo-Russian Note makes it clear that further advances on a larger scale are contemplated at no distant date. If the Government of Teheran show any capacity for effective rule, their efforts are not likely to be balked in future for want of the necessary financial assistance. The conditions on which the loan is made show the directions in which the capacity will be tested. First amongst them is the demand that the Persian Government shall act in conformity with the principles of the Anglo-Russian Convention. It is superfluous to dwell upon the indispensable necessity of compliance with this condition. Omission or neglect to fulfil it must inevitably lead Persia down the path of ruin. As that is the course from which we are sincerely anxious to save her, we welcome with particular pleasure the very clear and comprehensive language in which the Persian Government pledge themselves to fulfil this provision. Another condition requires them to discuss the organization of a small and effective Army of regulars with the two Legations. The formation of such an Army is so manifestly in their own interests for the collection of revenue that we cannot imagine any indisposition upon their part to further it. It cannot, of course, be undertaken without more money, and we note that the Government express their hope that the two Powers will lend their "concours efficace" for the new loan. The other two conditions are of a temporary kind. The one demands an arrangement with the ex-Shah for his departure and pension, and for an amnesty to his followers, and the other the dismissal of all irregulars from the Army so soon as his ex-Majesty and his brother, Salar-ed-Dowleh, have left Persia. Mohammed Ali has gone some weeks ago, after much desperate bargaining. Probably Salar-ed-Dowleh will in time listen to reason and also consent to expatriation upon terms. For the moment he appears to have rejected with scorn the proffer of a pension in lieu of the sovereignty which he claims over Western Persia under the suzerainty of his brother. The pose which he has assumed is dramatic and picturesque, but we doubt whether it will have the desired effect of getting him better terms. However he may choose to maintain it, so long as there is anything left to loot in Kermanshah and there is no one to turn him out. He is said to have given his enemies there a sample of Persian administration of the good old kind with tortures and extensive hangings since he has been in possession. He may feel a natural reluctance to relinquish an authority so strenuously exercised. While there is much in Persia which we cannot even hope to see righted for many years to come, there is at least one good piece of recent English work on her coasts which we can regard with satisfaction and with pride. That work is the suppression of the illicit trade in arms between Muscat and Mekran. Nothing could have been better devised or better carried out than the measures which have been taken to suppress it. Admiral Slade, to whom we owe these measures, is now on his way home with the happy consciousness that he has discharged a difficult and a pressing duty with entire success. The trade is dead and it remains for us to see that it is not surreptitiously revived. Its object, we need hardly say, is to furnish the tribes upon the North-West Frontier of India with modern rifles, which are notoriously bought in the first instance for use against us. The rifles come by way of Muscat, where the trade is protected by a treaty between the Sultan of Oman and the French Government which dates back to the Second Empire. The Sultan, who is on excellent terms with us, is anxious to control the trade, since France has hitherto steadfastly refused to relinquish her treaty right to carry it on. With this object he has now decided that all arms imported into his dominions must be stored in a bonded warehouse. They are not to be released from it save upon production of certificates of destination, and no certificates are to be issued for the Mekran coast. We are grateful to the Sultan for his friendly action, but it needs no great knowledge of Oriental officials and of the ways of some European manufacturers and exporters in dealing with such officials, to see that the supervision of the trade at Muscat may fail to be very thorough. We hope, however, for the best.—(The Times)

THERE are one or two things which must be remembered by those at home who wish to realise the present situation in Persia, and in stating them as axioms I am not afraid of contradiction, though they make difficult, and ever disheartening, the work that lies before us, if we are to carry out our aim successfully. That policy is twofold. Great Britain wishes to safeguard to the full the military and commercial interests of India, and she is at least determined, or should be determined, to have no hand in the extinction of a great Mahomedan sovereignty. Other considerations should, of course, be borne in mind. We have no inducement of any kind to stand in the way of the development of Russian trade and other interests so far as they do not actually militate against the safeguarding of the two chief lines of British policy, and subject, of course, to the same condition, we are, traditionally and temperamentally, sympathetic with the extension to other nations of the prosperity and liberty that we have ourselves enjoyed under our own form of Constitutional government. But it is an error of the first importance to mistake these secondary aims and hopes for the cardinal needs of our Asiatic policy. That policy is now undergoing modifications required by the altered conditions of Central Asia.

In the past we have regarded the maintenance of buffer States between India and other organic Asiatic Powers, as the best possible means of avoiding difficulties with those Powers and thereby the necessity for large military provision along Indian frontiers. The absorption of Tibet by China has deprived us of one useful buffer, the absence of which has at once resulted in an immediate and uneasy activity along the northern and north-eastern borders of India; the chaos in Persia has suddenly warned us of the instability of a second and even more important cushion, interposed this time between Indian interests and the restlessness due to European political expansion.

It is not necessary here to discuss the question whether, as a matter of fact, it is not better to do away with buffer States, and have continuous limits of Sovereignty. Something, perhaps a good deal, might be said as to the convenience of avoiding the intrigue that inevitably goes on in the interposed State; but there is no sign of any alteration of the general policy of the country in this matter. Indeed, the latest agreement affecting the matter, the Anglo-Russian Convention, is wholly based on the assumption that buffer States should, and must, be maintained between the two Empires. Moreover, our second axiom precludes us from even the possibility of considering the complete partition of Persia as a joint act of the Governments of London and Moscow.

We must consider the present helplessness and confusion in Persia from the point of view that tradition, and probably sound commonsense also make necessary. What have been the causes? What is the present state? and what in our own interests is the best remedy for the dangerous anarchy that exists in that country?

The chief causes—upon which it is not necessary to dilate—seem threefold. The unwarlike nature of the Persians has rendered them a prey to outside interference. Their want of homogeneity has hampered common action. Their dangerous assumption of Western constitutional methods before they were ready for it gave the rein to precisely those defects of character which centuries of an iron but happy-go-lucky autocracy had inevitably engendered. Other reasons might, of course, be suggested, but a short examination of these I have enumerated will be sufficient to account for the present nerveless incapacity of Persia to rise to an emergency which has been thrust upon them by the development of European interests and influence in Western Asia.

That the Persian as a whole have failed to carry on the fighting traditions of their ancestors is, unfortunately, a matter beyond question. Certain tribes, indeed, in the mountainous districts of the south-west and others with a strong Turkish, Kurdish, and Caucasian leaven in the north-west, still exhibit some military capacity, but the former, though true Persians, are almost wholly careless and contemptuous of their political unity with Teheran and the latter are only warlike so far as they are almost avowedly of alien extraction.

Probably the fundamental cause of this effeminacy is that the form of Mahomedanism which is peculiar to the country has never developed the grit and self-devotion that in war characterise the followers of "The Tradition." I put it in this way because I cannot think it proved that the beautiful but nebulous tenets of Bahaism have so widely influenced all classes in Persia, as is often asserted. Certainly it is true it would in itself go far to explain the unmilitary predilections of the people, for Bahaism is scarcely a faith that prompts to battle. More probably, a century of practical immunity from external threats, and a standard of living unusually comfortable by Oriental standards, has had its effect.

Whatever be the reason, the fact remains that the dismemberment or even total extinction of Persia is now more likely to be resented in the field of arms by strangers than by those immediately affected. This in itself is a source of material weakness, and when to it is added that Persians are perfectly well aware of their own indisposition for military exertions, their moral helplessness in the face of an emergency is in a fair way to be explained also.

But a want of material capacity would not be sufficient in itself to account for the present utter failure of a nation that is so amazingly gifted by nature with the arts of diplomacy and intrigue as are the Persians. It is the total want of unity of purpose or co-operation in action that suggests the second cause as a deciding factor in the problem of Persian impotence. It is not only that the nation consists of many different and almost invariably hostile tribes, or that those tribes are composed of sects to which the same adjectives might be applied with equal truth. Greatly as this would militate against joint action, there have been no few symptoms from time to time during the past three or four years that private animosities would not improbably be sunk, at any rate for a time, in the face of a national danger and at the bidding of a trusted and capable leader. There lies the trouble. The danger is present in all seriousness—but there is no leader.

It was written of Persia the other day that in it there is no individual in the whole country sufficiently honest to possess the confidence of any other single person. To this sweeping denunciation few will subscribe, but it is lamentably true that this bitter sentence represents not unfairly the attitude that the Persians seem to take up towards each other even in these days of crisis. Names appear and disappear among the nationalists with suspicious rapidity, and of those who bore a prominent part in the establishment of the Constitution in July, 1909, not one is to-day trusted, and the only figures that still remain upon the stage are those of Samsames-Sultaneh and his brother Sardar Assad, neither of whom can for a moment be regarded as a convinced constitutionalist. The Persians are a people suspicious, divided, leaderless.

There was, then, good material for anarchy in Persia, whenever other circumstances provided the opportunity, and the opportunity came when constitutional government was from outside presented to a people that had never made a sacrifice to win what other nations had spent their blood in torrents to secure. That was, in itself, a doubtful advantage to Persia. Nations are like human beings—that for which a man pays a heavy price he values more than that which he picks up for a trifle. The reality of the boon was obscured from the outset. There were no Ironsides in the Mejliss to see to it that the idle and the lukewarm were given no chance of spoiling what had been bought at a great and human price. Words were from the first a sufficient currency in Teheran, and of words there was no lack. Little by little the Parliament dropped in the estimation of Persia till its authority was openly flouted, and the bad old habits that tyranny had fostered were soon as characteristic of the new Government as of that which it had ousted.

It is probable that the authority of the Mejliss was never recognised anywhere except by those whose advantage it was to recognise it. The stouter men of the mountain and the coast continued to ask "Yes, yes, that, no doubt, is what the Mejliss says. What does the Shah say?" There was not really enough difficulty about getting the Constitution to advertise its existence when obtained. But among the higher officials the change meant the loss of the one power that they had used and abused for generations. No question was asked under the autocracy, provided order was maintained and the revenue paid. The methods employed were, of course, deplorable in individual cases, but the Persian understood it, and, on the whole, thrived.

But under the new regime order was not maintained, the revenue was not paid and Persia ceased to thrive to such an extent that a reign of terror has at last set in over a large part of the neutral zone. The power of the sword was taken away, and no power of anything else had any effect upon a weak people, ill at sea under the unfamiliar sense of a nominal liberty. To the Persian constitutional rights were everything, constitutional duties never existed from the start. The first to recover themselves and see the opportunities offered them were the lawless mountain tribes of the South-West. There was nothing now to restrain them, and the people and prosperity of their territories were at their mercy.

Only a strong—perhaps only a somewhat harsh—hand could hold them in, and of strength there was none in any administration from one end of the country to the other. The head and the limbs were equally powerless. In the space of a few months there had been witnessed in this weak and newly enfranchised country a series of outbreaks, half of which would have suspended the Constitution, even in England. Tabriz was in revolt again, the Russians again hurried troops into Azerbaijan and Kazvin, Khorasan even thought of declaring itself independent, Afghans had caused anxiety in Seistan, Bam and Regan had been held to ransom by a Baluchi chief, Bander Abbas and Laristan were "unsafe" for caravans, Bushire had been "held up" by Tangistanis, the trade routes of Shiraz were the scene of organised pillage, Isfahan was forcibly occupied by the Bakhtiaris, the Kurds crossed the frontier. Add to this assassination at Teheran and Shiraz the refusal sooner or later of every province in Persia—except, perhaps, Arabistan—to pay revenue, and the reappearance of the ex-Shah and his lieutenants at four separate points in Persian territory, and some idea can be formed of the hopelessness of the task which confronted the new and already distracted Government, of which the Cabinets changed their constitution from month to month, like the pieces of glass in the turning kaleidoscope.—FECIVAL LONDON in the Daily Telegraph

News of the Week.

REUTER wires from Rome on the 11th.—A fleet of transports, escorted by battleships, have effected landing of troops from Italy, near Zuara, Tripoli, after engaging the enemy by fire of landing men elsewhere.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 12th.—The new point occupied in Tripoli is the Peninsula of Macabez. The troops on the 11th instant occupied Fort Bucheloo. There was no resistance.

With reference to the extension of the Italian blockade on the Yemen coast, announced on the 8th instant, it appears that the imperial Government, in consequence of the apprehensions of Muhammadans in India and elsewhere, inquired of the Italian Government, which stated that it was not intended to interfere with pilgrimage.

General Caneva telegraphs that the occupation of Macabez ensures the possession of a station for torpedo boats with a view to the repression of gun running.

The fort of Bukeminesh, not Bucheloo, which was occupied on the 11th instant, commands the Tunisian caravan routes, and is the key to the frontier of Tunis.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on the 14th.—Though the Ambassadors have not yet taken steps to make any communication to the Porte with regard to the terms on which Turkey will agree to the termination of the war, they have all received the text of an identical communication from their Governments. It is understood that communications will be made separately and not collectively.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on the 16th.—The Ambassadors to-day presented to the Porte a communication with reference to mediation in the war. The communication states that the Powers having ascertained the Italian conditions now desire to know Turkey's.

Assim Bey, Minister for Foreign Affairs, asked for time to reply, which is practically certain to be in the negative, Turkey refusing to negotiate for peace on the basis of the Italian claims.

Turkish Head-quarters, Tripoli,

1st Detachment, March 27

The Commander of the Turkish forces at Benghazi reports to the General Staff here that he has just achieved a great victory over the Italian Army. The enemy's losses were 27 officers and 3,500 men killed and wounded, and the Italian camp and equipment fell into our hands. The Turkish losses amounted to about 150 officers and men killed and wounded.

This great victory follows close upon another engagement which was fought on the 14th instant, when the Italians sustained a severe defeat, one general and 47 officers and 1,700 men being killed and wounded.

On the 13th the Italian Army fell back, and the Turkish troops captured telephone and telegraph apparatus and other camp equipment.

The Turkish losses on the 12th were only 53 officers and men wounded.

H. C. STREPPINGS WRIGHT.

The following statement is issued by the Italian Embassy:—

"No battle has taken place at Benghazi or anywhere in Tripoli or Cyrenaica, since the 12th of March, when the Italian troops were completely victorious and took possession of two oases previously occupied by the Turco-Arab forces. The details of this engagement were given in an official telegram published through Reuter's Agency on the 31st."

Constantinople, March 27

The authorities at Salonika have been notified from Lemnos that the Italian Fleet is steering a course for Chalcedon.

Instructions have been sent to the forts on Cape Karaburnu to be prepared for defensive action.

Reuter's Rome correspondent states that according to a telegram from Tripoli the railway from Tripoli and the Santa Barbara fort to Ain Zara has been working since 19th March and all the stores required at Ain Zara are now sent by train. Work will be begun to-day on the new line to Tajura (on the coast east of Tripoli).

Constantinople, March 23.

According to reports received from Consular sources, five of the contact mines recently laid down in the Dardanelles are missing, and several others—according to some accounts as many as eight—have exploded. The usual rumours concerning the activity of secret agents are current, but there is reason to believe that the mischief was done by a particularly lively school of porpoises, which is hardly likely to have been pressed into the Italian service. The news has caused considerable anxiety in shipping circles here.

Sofia, March 24.

The Turkish Government recently applied for permission to send through Bulgaria eight aeroplanes intended for the Turkish Army. The Bulgarian Government, in order to preserve strict neutrality in the Turco-Italian War, has refused to grant the request.

Constantinople, March 23.

A leading Turkish newspaper publishes an interview with Assim Bey, Minister for Foreign Affairs, who expresses himself as decidedly optimistic regarding the general situation. The Minister is reported to have declared that Turkey's relations with the Balkan States do not inspire any uneasiness, all pending questions are in a fair way of settlement. Alluding to the attitude of the Powers, the Minister said he was confident of their pacific intentions and of their strict observance of neutrality. Speaking particularly of Russia, Assim Bey said he was convinced that Russia did not mean to modify her policy, and added:—

The Powers can hardly recognize the Italian decree of annexation of Tripoli and Cyrenaica. Turkey will enter upon peace negotiations on condition that she is not called upon to recognize a fait accompli. All the threatening preparations of Italy cannot compel us to act differently.

With regard to the Russian concentration of troops in the Caucasus, Assim Bey confirmed the statement that the 41st Division at Kazan had been transferred thither owing to the removal of a portion of the Caucasian garrisons to Persian territory. There was, he added, nothing at present to modify Turco-Russian relations with reference to the Turco-Persian frontier delimitation question. Negotiations for setting up a Turco-Persian Commission to deal with it were proceeding at Constantinople, and, if no agreement were reached, the matter would be submitted to arbitration at The Hague. The assurances given by the Russian Government regarding the movements of troops were satisfactory, and the recall of M. Tcharykoff, the Russian Ambassador, implied no change of attitude.—(Reuter.)

Rome, March 24.

The young but very vigorous National Party are far from satisfied with the progress of Italian arms in Tripoli. Rightly or wrongly they attribute the slowness of advance to the too cautious policy of the Home Government. An almost universal feeling is abroad that new blood is needed in the Cabinet, and that the only safe policy for Italy is a vigorous forward one.

Candia, March 24.

To-day being election day in Greece, elections were held also at Canea. The Assembly elected 69 Deputies, chosen from all the political parties in the island, to represent Crete in the Greek Chamber. No plan or date was settled for the departure of the Deputies to Greece, but the Deputies were ordered to be present in Athens at the opening of the Greek session.

Athens, March 24.

It is expected that 23 Cretan Deputies will present themselves here, but three times that number were elected to-day in view of possible obstacles to their departure. It seems doubtful, however, whether the Powers will take measures to detain them, which, in any case, would hardly be successful. That the Deputies will succeed in entering the Chamber is, however, very problematical, the Greek Government being firmly resolved not to admit them without the consent of the Powers.

Constantinople, March 20.

Nearly a month ago the Minister of the Interior, Hadji Adil Bey, started on a tour in Macedonia and Albania at the head of a Commission of Reforms. It was proposed that they should inquire into the desires and grievances of the inhabitants and execute summary justice wherever possible. The mission appears to have met with a favourable reception in most places, and although it is too early to sum up the results of its labours, the following list of officials and officers punished for abuses or incompetence shows that Hadji Adil Bey has not hesitated to use the extraordinary authority conferred upon him.

In Salonika three officers of gendarmery were degraded for maltreatment of prisoners. The Governor of the prison of Uskub was dismissed for the same nature of offence. The Mutesarrif of Tashbidja and the Kaimakan of Prepol were dismissed, and the latter will be tried for misdemeanour. The judge of Petchovo and the dragoman of the Court of Novibazar have also been relieved of office, while the judges of Mitrovitsa and Vuchitern and the Kaimakams of Radovishta and Kratovo will be transferred elsewhere, having given evidence of incompetence in their present positions.—Manchester Guardian.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST")

As far as can be gathered, the past week has not advanced the war between Italy and Turkey or the prospects of peace. No further steps have been taken collectively by the Powers in regard to mediation. The Italian reply to their joint enquiries has not been officially communicated to the Porte, and it has to be inferred that the idea of friendly overtures to the belligerents at this stage has been abandoned. Italy, however, still hesitates to face the facts of the situation, in the belief that she may yet be extricated from her difficulties by the efforts of others. Full recognition has been paid to the conciliatory nature of the terms that the Italian Government is willing to offer Turkey; indeed, the anxiety to do credit to the spirit of friendliness in which that Government is prepared to meet the Porte on every subject save the annexation caused the fact to be overlooked that in so many words Italy, in her reply, asked the Powers to join her in the payment of the purchase price for Tripoli by surrendering the capitulations. In abandoning their efforts at mediation the Powers endorse the advice that has already reached Italy from many quarters, that the soundest preliminary to securing recognition for an accomplished fact is to accomplish the fact. The hot season in North Africa is rapidly approaching, and the difficulties of a campaign, sufficiently arduous while restricted to a narrow strip of territory along the sea-coast in cool weather, will be immeasurably intensified when an advance has to be undertaken into the interior. Moreover, the prolonged delay of the Italians in making a more strenuous effort in Tripoli detracts from the force of their threats to extend the war to the Turkish littoral in Europe or Asia. The Porte may still have to face the consequences of such a step, but it has possibly had time to convince itself that the risks to which the Italians would simultaneously be exposed offer a strong argument against the step being taken in any serious manner. A week's interval has certainly served to dissipate the fear that Russia and Italy were contemplating in the immediate future some joint effort to compel Turkey to embrace the first opportunity of peace. Such foundation as there may have been for the report is to be sought for, if we are not mistaken, in Paris. By a peculiar coincidence, both the Russian and the Italian Ambassadors to the French capital were formerly the Foreign Ministers of their respective countries. The temptation to invest the Embassy with the functions of a Foreign Office appears to have been too strong both for M. Izvolsky and Signor Tittoni, but they reckoned, at least in one case, without the Governments that they represented. Although M. Sazonoff's exposé of Russian foreign policy has been postponed, there are grounds for supposing that Russia is not yet prepared to abandon her attitude of neutrality in regard to the Turco-Italian War. The situation on the Persian frontier may cause the Tsar's Government to carry on separate negotiations in Constantinople, but the eagerness of the Porte to promise an immediate removal of irregularities justifies the inference that it is satisfied with the correctness of the Russian attitude in other directions.

Smyrna, March 21

The week has been one of alarms and general uneasiness. In the mind of the natives the idea prevails that the Italians are anxious to conclude peace. The Turks, however, appear more determined than ever to continue resistance. The forts guarding the entrance to the bay are strongly held. Batteries are being thrown up on the hills dominating the approaches to the bay. Troops are daily arriving from the Interior. In all directions one sees troops drilling, and the boom of artillery at target practice is constantly heard.

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURC.")

The Neue Freie Presse of Vienna uses menacing language towards Italy and says: "While the Powers are exchanging ideas for making the basis for mediation possible, the bombardment of Smyrna or of Salonica by Italy will put the whole of Europe against her."

Youssuf Chetvan Bey arrived at Constantinople yesterday. He has seen Assun Bey, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Talaat Bey, the officiating Minister of the Interior, and given them an official account of the inexhaustible resources of our African Provinces for continuing the war, of the numbers that are constantly swelling the ranks of Ottoman combatants and of the state of arms and ammunition. Youssuf Chetvan Bey has assured the Ministers that the Turco-Arab combatants are preparing a formidable sudden stroke for driving the Italians out altogether.

The other day we referred to the intention of His Excellency Prince Mohamed Ali, the brother of His Highness the Khedive, to form an association for rendering aid to the orphans of the victims of Beirut bombardment. Our Cairo correspondent now announces to us the formation of this Association under the Presidency of His Excellency Prince Mohamed Ali Pasha. The members of the Association are Their Excellencies Mohamed Chorb Pasha, Mohamed Raza Pasha, Aziz Lizat Pasha, Ismail Sahri Pasha, Hasan Madkour Pasha, Ismail Abaza Pasha, Abdur Rahim Sahri Pasha and several other distinguished men. The Association has already held two meetings at the Savoy Hotel for the discussion of the best possible means for the success of their charitable work.

Major Haider Bey, Commandant of the Gendarmerie post at Taxim, has forwarded to us a letter from General Edham Pasha, Commandant of the Ottoman Forces at Tobruk. Edham Pasha has some very scornful words to say regarding the cowardice of Italians, who dare not show their head out of their fortified positions. He says that he is lost in admiration of the services rendered to the country by Enver Bey and Aziz Bey. The enemy at Tobruk has contented itself by making occasional ascents in aeroplane and dropping down bombs in profusion without any result. It is obstinate in its intention of not putting its foot out of the fortifications of the town. These tactics of the enemy have made Edham Pasha impatient and he has addressed the following letter to the Commandant of the Italian troops.—

Monsieur le General,—In my capacity as the General Commander-in-Chief of Tobruk I have the right to tell you that if you wish to preserve your military honour intact, leave your fortresses and take up the position of a combatant. My brave Arab soldiers are impatient for a fight which they desire every moment. They harass you every day and advance upon your fortifications but I do not want to expose them unprofitably to danger.

If you are bent on the conquest of this country, you should at least come out of your fortress and fight our soldiers.

While waiting for your arrival, my dear General, we will prepare to receive you suitably and well.

EDHAM,

Commandant-General of Tobruk.

This letter from Edham Pasha has produced no effect and the Italians will not move.

The Italians had purchased sixty thousand tons of English coal for the fleet and a private telegram announces that the delivery of this cannot, owing to the strike, be guaranteed till the end of May.

According to the telegram from the Commandant of Tripoli, communicated to the Agence Ottomane, the Turks attacked Ain Zara in the night. They have captured a lot of construction material, telephone and telegraph apparatus, shovels, pickaxes, carts and implements. A number of cattle too which were out in the open were killed by our soldiers.

The Agence Ottomane is authorised to publish the following official information regarding a recent battle at Derna, received by the Minister of War from Enver Bey, Commandant of the region of Benghazi.—

On the 3rd March a detachment of 75 men composed of regulars and volunteers was placed in ambush to waylay two battalions of the enemy who were advancing westwards from the position called "Seid Abdullah." An action took place and the Italian battalions suffering numerous casualties immediately began to retreat. The battle meanwhile commenced on a general scale and lasted till sundown. The two battalions, who had been caught in the ambush, were reinforced by the enemy and quickly opened a violent fire. We sent up in that direction all the regulars and volunteers that we could dispose of, but the Italians worked themselves to the west of our wing. The latter thereupon delivered a charge on the enemy's forces who had to leave their trenches and fall backwards. At this moment six battalions of Infantry, one battery of field artillery, two mountain batteries, three howitzer batteries and all the enemy's reserves advanced up against our left, we immediately moved all the forces on our right with the greatest possible rapidity, so much so that almost the whole of our right wing was deployed westwards. We succeeded in putting the Italians to flight and pursued them till the line of their first fortifications. Their losses are considerable. Many things have fallen into our hands and amongst the dead we found Captain Bocanti and Lieutenant Ercan Orlandi belonging to the 5th Battalion of the 35th Division. A Captain and an Under-Lieutenant of the 26th Battalion are also amongst the dead. The troops who took part in to-day's action belonged to the 26th and 35th Divisions and to the 2nd, 5th and 6th Regiments.

We captured fifty rifles and their cartridge cases, 36 shrapnel and much ammunition. Our losses are 3 wounded amongst regulars and 21 dead and 40 wounded amongst volunteers.

Enver Bey has sent to the President of the Red Crescent Committee and to the Egyptian people the following letter which is full of patriotic sentiment and breathes cheerful confidence. It gives us very great pleasure to publish this letter—

"In the name of the All Merciful God I salute you and send to you and to all the Egyptians the salutations of all my brother officers and the regular and volunteer soldiers. I confess to my inability to express to you my high appreciation of the eminent services that you have rendered to the Empire, to the Nation and to the Mussalman world. The great encouragement which the Moslem lions have received has redoubled their courage in the defence of the national honour and of the soil of their sacred fatherland. Many an evidence of the goodness of the Egyptians has forced itself lately on our attention and how proud the Mussalman world and the Ottoman Empire must feel at having in their 'pale' the Egyptian people—a people so rich in civic virtues and in their devotion and fidelity to the sworn faith. You must certainly have received news from the theatre of war, and if you still want to have the most correct information, I may tell you that all the combatants and myself are by God's grace in the enjoyment of a perfect state of things and we have by our brilliant victories in all the engagements given that chastisement to the enemy which it richly deserves by reason of this act of brigandage. We wish you long life and good health and to the Egyptian nation we wish the realisation of all its desires and aspirations and we pray to God to accord to it all the felicity and grandeur that it desires and to afford to us some day an opportunity of performing our duty to Egypt and the Egyptians.

"In conclusion we beg of you as well as of all the Egyptians individually to pray to the Almighty that we may always continue victorious and that He may help us to drive the enemy from the soil of our Fatherland.

Your Servant,
ENVER."

Vienna, March 22

The meetings between the three Monarchs of the Triple Alliance to-morrow and on Sunday inspire some hope that from them may proceed a co-ordinated attempt to promote a settlement of the Turco-Italian conflict. An authoritative organ of the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Office, the Preser Lloyd, encourages this hope by stating that the war will play an important part in the conversations between the Emperors Francis Joseph and William at Schönbrunn and between King Victor Emmanuel and the German Emperor at Venice, and while finding it hard to believe in a settlement on the basis of the Italian conditions, it concludes—

For the Sultan and for Turkey much, very much, is at stake, and it is at this moment permissible to found earnest hope upon the concluding passage of the Italian proposal, in which Italy declares herself ready to examine any further proposals which the Powers may bring forward "with the object of preserving the self-respect and dignity of Turkey." In the interest of Italy and of European peace, it would appear urgently desirable that the exchange of views between the Emperor William and his two allies should help to pave the way, and perhaps lead to the formulation of these "further proposals."

The hope thus expressed is stated on authority, which should be excellent, to prevail also in the immediate neighbourhood of the German Emperor. It is, however, necessary to add that in very competent diplomatic circles the hope is not entirely shared. The event alone can show whether this less optimistic view is based on prudence or on a more accurate and sober estimate of the circumstances than the German Emperor is in a position to form. The one element which non-Italian statesmen are apt to miscalculate is the determination of the Italian people not to admit any makeshift settlement. The Emperor William's personal charm and energy constitute, doubtless, an important factor in any negotiation he may undertake, but it should not be forgotten that in firmness of character and in passive if not active vigour of temperament King Victor Emmanuel is no whit inferior to his Imperial Ally. The tenacity with which each Sovereign is capable of maintaining his own standpoint in the other's presence was indeed revealed during their last meeting at Venice.

Vienna, March 26.

The remarkable warmth of the reception given to the German Emperor on his arrival at Venice and the display of enthusiasm for the Triple Alliance during his meeting with King Victor Emmanuel are noted here as interesting symptoms of which the precise significance cannot yet be determined. The sense in which the demonstrations were intended was so clearly defined in advance by the Italian Press that the question automatically arises whether the enthusiasm would retain its value should the German Emperor have found himself unable to accede to Italian desires. Italy, said the Italian Press with striking unanimity, understands the difficult position in which Germany has been placed by the war, and asks only that Germany should observe strict neutrality—that is, that German diplomacy should refrain from opposing efforts like those of Russia to bring the war to an end, and should, likewise, refrain from holding a protecting hand over Turkey now that it has become necessary for Italy to strike a telling blow at the enemy. Italy desires, further, that the Triple Alliance should not be perfunctorily renewed, but it should be so extended as to comprise in future, not only the special problems hitherto contemplated, but the whole policy of the Allied States in and beyond Europe.

Semi-official messages from Venice state that the meeting of the two Monarchs revealed the identity of their views and has both clarified the situation and strengthened the Triple Alliance.

Paris, March 25

French interest in the Venice meeting is concentrated upon its international aspects, and in particular upon its possible bearing on the war between Italy and Turkey. The Temps this evening reviews the German efforts after the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austro-Hungary and the invasion of Tripoli by Italy to convince Turkey that, although the Triple Alliance was the chief author of her troubles, the Triple Alliance, and especially Germany, remained her best friend. But Germany has found it more and more difficult to maintain the balance between her duties to her allies and her protestations of friendship to Turkey. What will be her attitude if Italy attempts to strike a decisive blow at Turkey? This, it is thought, is likely to be one of the questions which the Emperor William will ask King Victor Emmanuel to help him to answer. If there is any hopeful sign, it is to be found in the fact that all neutral Powers have a common interest in peace.

Berlin, March 27.

Such little comment as appears on the meeting of the Emperor William with the King of Italy at Venice, is rather to the effect that Germany is unlikely to have adopted any definite attitude with regard to the possibilities of peace. Without suggesting with certain German journals that the question of mediation will not have even been mentioned, it may be said that such indications as were discernible on the eve of the Emperor William's departure from Berlin did not point to a more favourable attitude on the part of Germany towards the Italian wishes. The Cologne Gazette argues that the Emperor William will have served the cause of peace if he has contributed to the removal of the Italian prejudices concerning the attitude of Germany. It is remarked that Germany always regretted the outbreak of the war, but could not make mediation proposals while the temper of both the belligerents was unready for them, and it is added that the temper of the belligerents is not likely to have altered to an extent sufficient to justify Germany in emerging from her reserve. The journal predicts that Germany will be blamed in any case—if there is no peace, for not having put pressure on Turkey in the interests of her Italian ally, and if there is an extension of Italy's military operations, for having encouraged Italy without due regard for Turkey. All this does not amount to much more than saying that Germany is still involved in the dilemma naturally created by her ambiguous relations with Italy and Turkey respectively.

(FROM A "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, March 27.

The Neues Wiener Tagblatt publishes a communication on the meeting between the German Emperor and the King of Italy which gives expression to the views of the Foreign Office here. The journal writes that the views of the foreign Press which treat the interview as the commencement of a new phase of the Triple Alliance are erroneous, and continues:—

Those who now speak of a "new" phase of the Triple Alliance have entertained the absurd idea that the Triple Alliance was about to collapse, and now when they acknowledge its entire consistency they speak at the same time of a renewal of the Alliance. As a matter of fact, no change whatever has occurred in the international grouping of the Powers, and such a change was not at all necessary as the Triple Alliance has always remained steadfast and requires no fresh support. The adherents of Irredentism in Italy are also beginning to grasp the deep significance and great importance of the Triple Alliance policy for Italy, but competent circles in Italy were already such firmly convinced adherents of that policy that no increase of their conviction was possible for them, and the meeting in Venice was not required to satisfy them of the real steadfastness of the Alliance. Thus only the uninitiated can expect that a new phase of the Triple Alliance begins from the Venice meeting.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN")

Italian Hopes.

The meeting at Venice between the Kaiser and the King of Italy gives the Italian press the occasion to break out in the same extravagant expectations which were not so long ago entertained by it with regard to the Triple Entente and especially France. The semi-official Tribuna tries to be "moderate." It recalls the fact that it was William II who first consoled Italy after the disaster at Adowa, and it rejoices that he should be the first to bring his salutations to Italy "now victorious." It does not wish to conjecture what may have been arranged at the Royal meeting, but it has no doubt that the Triple Alliance will emerge from it stronger than ever.

The Corriere della Sera, of Milan, goes much further. In its opinion the Triple Alliance must enlarge its basis in order to acquire a higher and more decisive importance in international politics. It must become the basis of any action by the three States and embrace much more distant contingencies than has been the case hitherto. The journal evidently wishes that the scope of the alliance should be made for all the three Powers so wide as to include every international conflict, and if that should have been the subject of conversation at Venice then the meeting will mark a memorable date in the history of Europe.

The clerical Giornale d'Italia confines itself to the discussion of the practical implications contained in the dreams of its contemporaries. "If," it says, "Germany cannot induce Turkey to renounce her useless and perilous resistance she may at least recognise Italy's right to pursue the war so as to beat down Turkey's obstinacy and as Germany is Italy's ally she cannot reasonably demand that Italy should continue to fight with her hands tied against an enemy who is hiding himself behind the backs of his secondaries. In other words, the basis of the alliance should be so extended as to make it available not only against France (the original objective) but also against Turkey."

It is scarcely likely that this wish will be fulfilled. As the Temps points out, the position of Germany as between her Italian ally and her Turkish friend is such that the Kaiser is obliged to ask King Victor Emmanuel to assist him in solving it—this the more as the German Government had never been informed by Italy of her intention to strike a blow in Tripoli.

No German Help for Italy.

In an obviously inspired note the Kölnische Zeitung administers a cold douche to the extravagant expectations to which the Italian Press has been giving utterance in the course of the last few days in connection with the Venice meeting between the German Emperor and the King of Italy. While expressing the hope that the meeting may result in the removal of certain prejudices existing in both countries and in thus consolidating the basis of the Triple Alliance, the Rhenish organ makes the following significant observation—

The Italian Press, however, seems to go much further, and to expect from the meeting something that would have an immediate bearing upon the war. That Germany would be prepared to facilitate its termination needs no assurance. Germany has deplored the war from its beginning, and would certainly have come forward with mediation proposals long ago had the mood of the two combatants been such as to render an effort of this kind more or less assured of success. Such, however, has not been the case hitherto, and it is scarcely likely that the situation has undergone a sufficient improvement during the meeting at Venice to enable Germany to abandon her policy of expectation. Our doubts are equally strong when a portion of the Italian Press utters the hope that the meeting may prove the starting point of an entirely new policy to be initiated immediately.

This is a sufficiently clear reply to the visions and wishes of the Italian press, which were quoted in yesterday's issue. It is, therefore, scarcely surprising to find the Rome correspondent of the Temps assuring its readers, on what is evidently good authority, that "the Kaiser has in the course of his conversation with King Victor Emmanuel by no means offered himself as an arbiter or mediator in the Italo-Turkish war, but confined himself to urging with extreme reserve counsels of moderation so far as the terms of peace were concerned."

M. Jean Herbet, writing in the Siecle, goes even further, and claims to know from "well-informed" sources a number of details concerning the interview at Venice which cannot but prove unpalatable to the superexcited Italian Press. He says that so far from offering any new formula of peace, "Kaiser William went to Venice with the intention of showing the King of Italy how useless it would be to attempt an attack upon the Dardanelles. Even if this operation should completely succeed," continues M. Herbet, "and if the Italian fleet should appear before Constantinople, Germany and Austria would no more be disposed than England and France to bring pressure upon Turkey with a view to compelling her to cede Tripoli. As for an intervention by Russia, it is no use thinking of it. Germany has dissuaded her from undertaking such a step not less energetically than France and England, and the right about face which Russian diplomacy executed on the receipt of these counsels was the occasion of a rather painful exchange of views between St. Petersburg and Rome."

With special reference to the opening of the Dardanelles, M. Herbet has reason to believe that the Kaiser has pointed out to his ally that even after forcing its entrance into the Sea of Marmora the Italian navy, weakened by the struggle, without being able to find coal or ammunition or provisions, would find its position so exposed to risks that it would have to attempt the forcing of the Dardanelles for a second time in order to escape from the trap.

French Warnings.

It is now abundantly clear that all the recent alarms and excursions of Russian diplomacy, now about to bring pressure upon the Porte to make peace with Italy on the latter's terms, and now mobilising troops in the Caucasus and, it is said, threatening a naval descent upon the Bosphorus, have had for their sole purpose to render Turkey's attitude more pliable on the question of the occupation of the Umma district. Both the Nouveau Presse and the Temps publish statements on "high authority," the former from Rome and the latter from Constantinople, to the effect that there is no secret agreement between Russia and Italy either on the subject of the Dardanelles or indeed, any other subject connected with the Balkans, and that Russia entertains no aggressive designs against Turkey. Or the other hand, the Journal des Debats shrewdly suspects that the Russo-Turkish differences on the Persian frontier in Armenia "may not have been alien to M. Tcharykoff's recall. It is not impossible," it says, "that the reproach levelled against this Ambassador, the friend of Turkey, was that he had failed, notwithstanding the numerous tokens of friendship, in obtaining satisfaction on the subject of the old affair."

However that may be there is reason to believe that abandoned by Russian diplomacy, the Italian Government is once more seriously contemplating the possibility of delivering an attack upon the Dardanelles. It is indeed considered by many as probable that unless the Kaiser succeeded in dissuading the Italian Government from this desperate course at his meeting with King Victor Emmanuel at Venice yesterday, the Italians will at last deliver the long threatened blow. It is another question whether the attempt will be crowned with success, or will command the assent or the acquiescence of Europe. In this respect a renewed warning issued by the Journal des Debats (which is as much in touch with the head of the present French Government as its rival the Temps was with M. Cambou) deserves every attention. After repudiating every obligation on the part of France to assist Italy in her present task and emphasising the homely truth that France cannot by any means disinterest herself in the fate of Constantinople and the Ottoman Empire, the journal says—

Italian influence could have been installed in Tripoli without the declaration of war upon Turkey, without the bombardments on the coasts of Albania and Syria. Italy, however, wanted to do things on a large scale, she chose to burn all the bridges behind her and to proclaim the annexation of Libya. She brushed aside with disdain the less sensational and more prudent methods. This involved a considerable risk. But France no more than Great Britain is pledged to cover or to share those risks. It is therefore, purely in a spirit of friendship that we have expressed hitherto our doubts as to the wisdom and appropriateness of the decisive measures undertaken by our neighbours. It is once more in the same spirit that we ask them seriously to reflect before they launch out into such an adventure as that of the forcing of the Dardanelles, which may cost the Italian navy very dear, and set the Balkans on fire. A success in the Straits will by no means ensure the capitulation of Turkey, while failure may bring immense consequences in its train.

Such utterances on the part of an authoritative organ of French diplomatic opinion like the Debats make one scarcely wonder if organs of lesser official standing, but perhaps on that account more closely in touch with the popular currents of political thought in France, speak in this connection of an entente with Germany. A journal like the Siecle cannot by any means be classed among organs friendly to Germany; yet M. Adrien Bertrand, writing in it on the Italo-Turkish situation, declares his opinion that if Italy, after the failure of the last diplomatic démarche has not yet carried into effect her threat of attacking the Dardanelles "the happy delay may have been due to an entente between France and Germany." Germany, he continues, is interested in the maintenance of the status quo in the Balkans, so is France, and thus "the dinner given to the Kaiser by the French Embassy was marked by an exchange of views between M. Cambon and William II., resulting in an understanding for the preservation of the status quo in the Near East." M. Bertrand further asserts that both Great Britain and France have made energetic representations in St Petersburg against any attempt at pressure at Constantinople, while Germany has specially addressed herself to Italy urging her not to undertake any fresh bombardments until at least the meeting at Venice. The writer expresses the hope that the Kaiser may prevail upon the Italian Sovereign to desist from any desperate means, and to seek to find a basis for peace on totally different conditions from those presented by the Consulta last week.

Mediation in the War

THE latest attempt to mediate between Italy and Turkey has apparently failed and this stagnant war will continue, there are rumours, as there have often been before, that Italy will now do something "decisive," but no one knows what truth, if any, there is in them. The suggested mediation came from Russia, and the Powers asked Italy to outline her terms with the idea of finding out whether Turkey would be willing to discuss them. Unfortunately, Italy has already made one big mistake. She annexed Tripoli immediately after occupying a few coast towns and her Parliament recently confirmed the annexation, although she had obviously not made herself mistress of the province (all but a small fraction of which is still held by the Turco-Arab forces) and is admittedly unable to advance from her coastal bases into the interior with any prospect of success. Whereas, therefore, had she not formally annexed Tripoli, she might have been able to secure the substance of her wishes by giving Turkey monetary compensation, leaving her, perhaps, some vague form of suzerainty and making peace with the Arabs, she found herself faced by the firm and natural resolution on the part of Turkey not to recognise as an accomplished fact what everybody knows is not, in fact, accomplished. In the recent negotiations with the Powers the Italian Government appears to have recognised the difficulty which it had created for itself. It did not ask that Turkey should recognise Italian sovereignty in Tripoli, it asked that the other Powers should take this step, and that Turkey, by agreeing to abandon hostilities, should implicitly admit that the transference of Tripoli to Italy is an accomplished fact. Turkey, of course, has declined to do any such thing, nor will the Powers recognise Italian sovereignty, at the beginning of the war they declared their intention to preserve an absolute neutrality, and formally to declare Italy sovereign in Tripoli in the face of the continued opposition of Turkey and the inability of Italy to make good her claim would be inconsistent with the spirit of neutrality. The position thus remains precisely what it was, and Italy is faced with the alternatives of prolonging a barren but exhausting war on lines that have neither produced nor seem likely to produce success and of attacking Turkey at some point where she is believed to be more vulnerable, with the possibility of stringing up international trouble which may have disagreeable results for Italy herself.

Intervention in the War.

April 4 28.

THE rumours of intervention in the war are revived, and this time it is at Constantinople that inquiries are being made. When Italy's views were sounded, her reply was that the Powers should first recognise the annexation, and it is conceivable that they are now asking Turkey on what terms she would consent. It is not easy to imagine them. The war is costing Turkey very little, and all that she is fighting for is to keep up her reputation as the protectress of the Arabs against Christian aggression. If only Italy had not annexed the country, she might have been bought off. She might have maintained shadowy rights over the country, as over Egypt and over Tunis, while leaving Italy to take her place as the real governing Power. As it is, she cannot take money as the price of peace without incurring the disgrace of betraying the Arabs. The first condition of any settlement, then, would seem to be for Turkey to be able to offer some sort of terms for the Arabs, which would save her own credit. Nothing is more certain than that Italy will not establish actual sovereignty over the whole country which she has annexed for ten, twenty, or even thirty years. At no point has her army penetrated more than twenty miles into the interior from the coast, and no position in its permanent occupation is more than seven or eight miles inland. If Italy would undertake not to try to extend her occupation into the interior for a number of years it would be to her own advantage, and it might be capable of being represented as a concession won by Turkey for the tribes of the interior. If, in addition, Italy gave undertakings about her future policy in the country, especially as to religious freedom, the temptation to Turkey might be considerable. But except on some such terms, we cannot imagine Turkey making peace in a war which is costing her comparatively so little and Italy so much.

The Prospects of the War.

THE Salonika correspondent of the Kölnische Zeitung reports an interesting lecture which was delivered last week in that city by Omer Nadji Bey, of the Central Young Turkish Committee, who has just returned from Tripoli. The lecturer was full of enthusiasm for the Turco-Arab forces, and did not conceal his contempt for the Italian enemy, whom he charged with cowardice. According to him, the Italians stood an excellent chance at the beginning of the war if only they had pushed vigorously forward after occupying the coast. The Turkish troops were at that time weak, war material was scanty, and the Arabs were neither devoted to the Turks nor sufficiently trained and organised to offer strong resistance. The hesitation of the Italians was a fatal tactical blunder, and there can now no longer be any question of crushing the well-trained and tolerably well-armed Arabs, who are capable of placing in the field a million and a half of warriors. Even women and children are taking part in the war, and with the approaching hot weather, which will prove to them more devastating than the Turco-Arab bullets, the Italians will be more completely than ever thrown back on their trenches, and the war may last indefinitely.

There is only too much reason to believe that this description of the state of affairs at the front is substantially correct. It is scarcely surprising, therefore, that the Porte should think so little of making peace. It is expected that in the course of the next few days the Ambassadors of the Great Powers at Constantinople will undertake a démarche similar to that of their colleagues at Rome, not, of course, with a view to communicating the peace terms formulated by Italy—these are regarded as beyond anything that friendly and neutral Powers could broach to the Porte,—but with a view to ascertaining the Turkish terms of peace. The result, however, that may be expected from this step is a foregone conclusion—the Porte, as the Constantinople correspondent of the Siecle points out, will reply by reiterating her refusal to acknowledge the Italian sovereignty over the two African provinces, either as a legal or as an "accomplished" fact, and the Ambassadors will withdraw with the easy conscience of persons who have done their duty.

It is now well nigh the universal opinion that the meeting between the Kaiser and the King of Italy at Venice has not changed the situation in the slightest. The Journal des Débats thinks it "improbable that the Kaiser, yielding to the wishes of the Italian press, should have promised King Victor Emmanuel to bring pressure upon Turkey to submit, or that he should have encouraged a decisive Italian action in the Dardanelles. It is more probable," the journal continues, "that the Kaiser drew the attention of his ally to the dangers of such an aspiration, which might turn out badly, or at least cost the Italian navy a considerable number of ships." In truth everything suggests that William II. effectively urged counsels of moderation, and only promised his diplomatic support in case Italy should offer reasonable terms. In this respect the Berlin Cabinet is in accord with the other Cabinets, including that of St. Petersburg, which was regarded at one moment as being favourably disposed towards more active intervention.

Attention, however, may be drawn to a telegram in the Frankfurter Zeitung from its Venice correspondent denying altogether that the Venice meeting had any political significance. "Intentionally," he says, "no toasts were drunk, and the Marquis di San Giuliano was absent, whereas in former years the Venetian meetings were always attended by Signor Tittoni. The Governments were anxious to avoid all suggestion that the meeting had any bearing on the solution of current problems or on future combinations. Those Italian papers which attached great expectations to the meeting simply did not reflect the views of the Italian Government. The Consulta has never approached Germany with a request to bring pressure upon Turkey. In fact, it is reported from the nearest entourage of the two monarchs that even in private there was much less politics discussed than the public outside assumes."

The telegram bears evident marks of official inspiration, and need not therefore be taken literally. Still it is significant that the official mind should think it necessary to assure the Italian press that its expectations were baseless.

The Outlook for Peace.

THE March number of the Revue Française contains an article entitled "The Italian-Turkish War and Europe," from the pen of M. H. Marchand, which in the light of quite recent events is of special interest.

The Turks, he says, are on velvet (jouent sur les velours), they contemplate the approach of the spring with an equanimity far from obtaining among the Powers of Europe, and count upon the patriotism of the Albanians and Arabs to forget internal grievances in the face of external danger. They think also that a violent solution of the Eastern question is too full of dangers to be undertaken by the Powers most deeply interested. On the other hand the Italians find themselves saddled with a vast expenditure which they cannot afford, and are yet making very little headway in their occupation of Tripoli. He points out that difficulties which they have been unable to overcome during the cold weather will be immeasurably greater during the hot season now fast approaching and considers that their failure reflects no discredit on the Italian troops.

England waited fifteen years before avenging Hicks Pasha and General Gordon, and has apparently evacuated for all time the back regions of Somaliland. France herself reduced to subjection the mountaineers of Kabylie only after an occupation of Algiers of twenty-seven years, while for nearly three years their operations were confined to the coast. Italy, then, must expect the war to last for many years before the flag of the House of Savoy is seen to fly over the terres légères of Tripoli.

All Italy's hopes have been falsified and she now finds herself practically as far from her objective as ever, after suffering very serious losses in both men and money. Turkey has only five thousand fighting men on the scene of the fighting, which cost her little to maintain, while all her best troops, the Anatolian regiments and the Albanians, are ready at a moment's notice to offer a very vigorous resistance to any aggression on the part of neighbouring powers. Of the latter, Bulgaria is the most formidable, Montenegro perhaps the most dangerous. But Bulgaria, in spite of her fine army and the bait offered her by the Macedonian bands, is unlikely to enter upon a war singlehanded with Turkey. Montenegro is a danger spot not so much in herself as in her relations with Russia, as well as Italy. It is well to remember that King Nikola is a father-in-law of two Russian Grand Dukes as well as of the Kings of Italy and Serbia. The courage of Queen Elena at the time of the recent attempt to assassinate her husband as well as her devotion at the time of the earthquakes at Messina, have, no doubt, served to popularise the Montenegrin connection among the people of Italy, and also, no doubt, to interest the "gentlemen of the Black Mountain" in the adopted country of their King's daughter. In addition to this, King Nikola is a personal friend of the Czar, while the Serbs all over the Balkans look to Russia almost in the light of a suzerain, though not quite in the case of Montenegro. As a case in point, may be mentioned the incident of the Serbs from Vrnaka coming in to celebrate the Constitution in Skutari, who formed up as if it were natural before the Russian Consulate.

At the end of his article, M. Marmand calls attention to a rumour that Russia had proposed that Turkey should declare Tripoli independent and withdraw her forces. Thus Turkey's face would be saved, and the Tripolitans—which would mean the Arabs—could make their own terms. The idea is clever, but could not impose upon the young Turks, who would not dare to adopt such a policy of surrender. But the mention of the rumour synchronises with the change of Russian Ministers in Constantinople, and as the late Ambassador was credited with an over-anxiety to propitiate the Porte, it is possible that the change affords some explanation of the rumour. Again, Italy has approached the Powers once more with the terms upon which she is ready to make peace, inspired, doubtless, with a new hope of pressure being applied. But the young Turks dare not accept the terms even under the maximum amount of pressure. They would probably prefer to die fighting except for one thing. The Albanians care nothing for Tripoli, and are profoundly discontented. They are on the verge of, if not actually in, rebellion. Now, Turkey in Europe without the Albanians might almost as well not be there. On the last occasion of their revolt they were given shelter by Montenegro, and indirectly helped by Russia and Austria, according to Dr. Brailsford. It is quite possible that, if astutely worked, a rebellion of the Albanians might be made the means of coercing the Turks, and an argument that they would be powerless to resist. With the Russian fleet on one side of the Dardanelles, the Italian on the other and Albania in revolt, helped in secret only by Russia and Montenegro, what could the poor Turk do? He could only yield to force majeure, and by so doing save the peace of Europe for a time. (The Near East.)

will therefore be confined to receiving the reply of the Government to the wishes expressed last Session and to formulating further motions.

In his Speech the Khedive alluded to the various measures undertaken and to be undertaken for the amelioration of the country. Among the former were the extension of education, improved irrigation, including the work of raising the Assuan Dam, which is nearing completion, and the drainage of Lower Egypt. In referring to the creation of a Department of Agriculture, His Highness stated that the solicitude of the Government was directed above all to the improvement of cotton cultivation and to the protection of the harvest against diseases affecting the cotton plant. At the same time, in order to protect the interests of small cultivators, a project was about to be put into execution whereby the current prices of cotton would be posted up in the villages and measures would be taken to ensure that cotton was correctly weighed. Allusion was also made to the extension to rural districts of the Postal Savings Bank which will come into operation next month. Finally, the Khedive announced that, as in the Legislative Council, members of the General Assembly would henceforth be granted the right to question Ministers, the best means for improving the representative system was also being considered, but in this question, as in all questions concerning the constitutional laws of the country, much prudence and circumspection were required.

Among the replies given by the Government to the motions put forward last Session was one concerning the Press Law. During the last few months four or five newspapers have been suspended, and voices are not wanting which demand that the law, which was revived by Sir Eldon Gorst, shall be abolished. The reply of the Government was in effect that so soon as the reasons which led to this step—the necessity for safeguarding public order—have disappeared the law will necessarily fall into disuse.

Count Aehrenthal.

THE death of Count Aehrenthal removes a figure from the European diplomatic world in whose life there was illustrated, more than once, the lying and fraudulent character of so many of the transactions on which the diplomatic "game" turns. The most notable of these transactions was the annexation of Bosnia-Herzegovina in October 1908. The annexation had been decided on in Austria in the middle of August. Count Aehrenthal, who was fond of underground diplomacy, concerted with Bulgaria that she should proclaim her independence almost simultaneously with the Austrian coup. At the beginning of October the Austrian Foreign Minister caused the Emperor Francis Joseph to address autograph letters to the various European Courts. The Austrian Ambassadors were instructed not to deliver these letters until October 5th, and they were aware before leaving Vienna that the proclamation of Bulgarian independence would accompany the annexation. One of the ambassadors, however, Count Rudolf Khevenhüller-Metsch, for some reason, disregarded his instructions and delivered the Emperor's letter to President Fallières on 3rd October. In reply to an inquiry from the President as to Bulgarian independence, the Count admitted that everything was ready, adding "La Bulgarie nous devancera d'un jour." This news was instantly communicated by the French Government to London, and on the same day, October 3rd, the British Ambassador was instructed to inquire officially of Baron von Aehrenthal at Budapest whether the Austro-Hungarian Government had any knowledge of the impending declaration of Bulgarian independence. Baron Aehrenthal replied that he had no such knowledge, did not consider the proclamation to be imminent, and added that there was no mention of it in Austrian reports from Sofia. This official denial reached London on October 3rd. The proclamation of Bulgarian independence two days later formed an accidental comment on Count Aehrenthal's honour and truthfulness. Perhaps one might reply that such conduct is an essential and inseparable part of the diplomatic game where the very triumph of ingenious deceit is to tell the whole truth in the perfect knowledge that you will not be believed. The late Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister fell short of that deception.—(Egypt)

The Egyptian Assembly.

Cairo, March 25.

THE Session of the General Assembly, which, according to the Organic Law, must be convoked at least once in two years, was opened this morning by the Khedive. The last occasion on which the Assembly met was in the spring of 1910, when it was convoked for the special purpose of considering the proposal for the prolongation of the Suez Canal Convention, which was rejected. This time the Assembly meets in the ordinary course of events. Business

The Week.

The India Bill.

THE Government of India Bill follows Lord Crewe's forecast in the House of Lords on March 26th. By an amendment of the schedule of the Councils Act of 1909, it provides for a maximum of fifty members for the Presidency of Bengal and Behar Legislatures. Section 4 renews the power of the Governor-General to redistribute territories and extends this power to territories under his immediate authority and management as well as to those of the Presidencies and Lieutenant Governorships. The ex-officio membership of a Presidency Legislature of the Advocate-General or the officer acting in that capacity is not to be applicable to Bengal.

In the House of Commons on the 18th, Mr. Montagu presented the India Bill, which is officially described as a Bill to make such amendments in the laws relating to the Government of India as are consequential on the appointment of a separate Governor of Fort William in Bengal and other administrative changes in the local Governments of India. The second reading will take place on the 24th instant.

Owing to a verbal error by which the Proclamation cited in the preamble to the Government of India Bill is referred to in section 4 as "the said recited Declaration of Proclamation," a fresh Bill has been substituted. It now reads, "the said recited Proclamation."

In the House of Commons Mr. Montagu moved the second reading of the Government of India Bill on the 22nd. He said it was a machinery Bill to carry out a policy acclaimed by a vast majority of all classes and races concerned while its out-and-out opponents were now in a position of splendid isolation. He did not propose to do more than explain the provisions. It had been contended, he said, that Government ought to have proceeded by way of a Bill. He replied that no Government ought to ask the House for powers already granted, for every Act recited in the preamble was ample parliamentary authority. The method of carrying out the changes was strictly constitutional. It was the only method that could have been adopted. The Statutes in question were only obsolete in that they were not familiar to the House. They were perfectly well known to those administering the Government of India. He hoped it would be possible speedily to consolidate the various Council and Government of India Acts passed since 1793.

Mr. Montagu then proceeded to explain the clauses seriatim. Although he said the Bill only mentioned an Executive Council for Bihar and Orissa, the province would also have a Legislative Council, but it was unnecessary to include the provision in the Bill. If Government were granted the necessary powers Legislative Councils would be given to Assam and the Central Provinces immediately. The Bill merely consisted of slight alterations in machinery enabling a policy to be carried out which met with general acceptance and which, he believed, the House would agree contained elements of lasting advantage and the germ of an improved Government of India.

Mr. Bonar Law denied that the changes met with general acceptance. His information was that whereas the changes were first received with enthusiasm they were now subject to criticism in India. The Opposition, however, would not oppose the Bill for obvious reasons. In the first place they would be sorry to deal with anything affecting the Government of India in any way which might be regarded as bringing India into the arena of party politics. If ever Indian administration became a party question it would be impossible for our rule in India to continue. The second reason was the manner in which the changes had been carried out which he still believed to be unconstitutional. He recognised the impossibility of reversing what had been done. He was not going to criticise the Bill but he did not desire to hamper his friends.

Sir John Rees said that nothing was further from the fact than the assertion that the changes were welcomed in India. They were a needless concession to a dead agitation. Following the extinction of the opium revenue, they made a great and grievous change in the position of the Indian taxpayer.

Sir John Jardine said that the changes had already brought much greater contentment.

Captain Murray said that commercial opinion in Bombay and Calcutta was not averse to the changes.

Sir Gilbert Parker thought that by an act which could not be reversed and the seriousness of which was not realised, Government had created a dangerous agitation, which would only revive the difficulties of the past.

Colonel Yate urged the protection of the new capital with modern defences.

Mr. Montagu, replying to the criticisms, said that as regarded defence, the position of Delhi, as the centre of the railway system, was a very good one. Regarding the Muhammadans of Eastern Bengal, it was a mistake to talk of the Muhammadans of India as though they were a homogeneous nationality. Muhammadans of Eastern Bengal and Hindus had little or no relation with those outside Bengal. Their position was carefully safeguarded. Mr. Montagu pointed out that on three Executive Councils already appointed, the Indian member was a Muhammadan. He emphasised the intention of the Government of India that the Governor of Bengal should pass a substantial part of the year at Dacca. That was a welcome feature to the Muhammadans and one to which they were perfectly entitled.

Further than that the Muhammadans had no right. It had never been the policy of the British Government to construct a province for the benefit of one race and religion. The Government always tried to hold the balance between different races impartially. If it could be shown that the policy of the partition in 1905 was intended to establish a Muhammadan province, that would have been a departure from the best policy for which Lord Curzon would be held guilty. It would have been a worse blunder of policy than any of which his worst critics accused him. But Lord Curzon would be the first to admit that there was no such policy.

The new policy, Mr. Montagu continued, had been described as a reversal of the old. He did not mean any disrespect to one of the greatest Viceroys India had ever had when he said that Lord Curzon had in this matter no policy of any kind. He was an administrator, a great administrator. He produced efficiency which was one of the cherished possessions of the Government of India. He was concerned with an unwieldy province and moved nationalities about.

Here Mr. Malcolm objected that Mr. Montagu was entering upon controversial matter to which the Opposition would not be allowed to reply.

Mr. Montagu, who was only speaking a second time by leave of the House, deferred to the objection merely observing that if there had been a direct reversal of policy much of the criticism of the Bill would be justified.

As regarded constitutionality of procedure, he said there were some rights, which the House of Commons in the opinion of the majority of its members rightly never claimed to exercise. The House never claimed to criticise in detail the administration of India. He instanced the Partition of 1905. Such changes affecting so many interests and fraught with great Imperial concern had always been dealt with by administrative action, the Commons having the opportunity to express its opinion afterwards.

Mr. Montagu said that in speaking of concession to agitation now dead, Sir J. D. Rees was totally uninformed. There were two kinds of agitation in India. One was the expression of a genuine grievance based on the belief that the Partition of Bengal was an outrage against nationality and a genuine desire for redress. There were also agitators often of anti-British purpose who took advantage of the unrest and were a parasitic growth on unrest. The latter was the illegitimate agitation. He was glad to say that it was dead because it had been wisely handled and severely repressed under Lord Morley's administration.

But the real and bitter resentment against the line which Lord Curzon drew right across Bengali-speaking nations and the grievance against unfair and disproportionate representation remained as deep on Durbur day as ever. That kind of agitation was at the root of most that was threateningly wrong in India. It was the wisest statesmanship to investigate the reasonableness of the grievance and remove it and settle a national wrong, so none could say that they were responding to illegitimate clamour that was dead. They had redressed a grievance which as long as it lasted would have remained as great as on the day it was caused.

The cost of the new Government of Behar and Orissa would be £300,000. The estimate for Delhi remained as originally four millions. It must be remembered that new buildings would have been necessary in Calcutta had the Government remained there. When the revised estimate was available it would be submitted to the House. But he assumed that it would be nearer four millions than eight millions.

Mr. Bonar Law, Mr. Montagu said, and others had referred to the change of policy as the result of the Bill and suggested that there was a discrepancy between the speeches of Lord Crewe and himself and the words of Lord Hardinge's despatch. The words of paragraph III of the Despatch were definite and unmistakable. If any microscopic difference might or could be detected, it was due to the difference between the Despatch, the other place and a platform in Mr. Montagu's own constituency.

There would be no immediate step and no resulting step as a result of the changes which the House was asked to approve. But surely where every section of the people of India had a policy, where their preachers and teachers were all over the country advocating this and advocating that, when certain small sections of the busiest among them were advocating a policy hostile to British rule, it would not be out of place for Lord Hardinge as he had done in that Despatch to show that there was a direction in which British occupation was tending.

In conclusion Mr. Montagu reiterated that Government's policy had been welcomed by the overwhelming bulk of the people of India and by all races and creeds. It would open a new era of contentment and progress. There were already signs of great hope, of increasing peace, increasing prosperity and increasing consent of the governed to be governed by a Government which had shown sympathy with their legitimate aspirations. The Bill was then read a second time.

In the Committee stage of the Government of India Bill on the 24th, Sir John Rees dwelt on the additional expense entailed by the establishment of a Governorship and Council for Bengal. Sir J. Rees proceeded to comment upon the Viceroy giving as a recommendation for the change that it would have a good effect upon English public opinion, but Mr. Maclean, Deputy Chairman ruled this out of order.

Lord Ronaldshay said that though the Governor of Bengal had been appointed by proclamation, the Bill was necessary to give the Governor his full powers. He asked what would be the Governor's position if the Bill did not pass?

Mr. Montagu replied that without the Bill, the Governor would be unable to exercise the same functions as the Governors of Bombay and Madras. He would be able to work with his Executive but it would be extremely difficult to meet the Legislative Council, and legislation would be at a standstill, until steps were taken to remove the deadlock. Every administrative act could, of course, be performed as the Clause only referred to the Governor's relations with Council. Clause one was then passed. The discussion of clause two was adjourned.

China.

REUTERS learn that it is unlikely that there will be any opposition to the conditions of Russia and Japan in connection with the loan to be issued to China by the "four nation" Syndicate. Negotiations between the various interests are now in progress but until the Anglo-Belgian loan question is settled there will be no further advances on account of the projected big loan though sixty millions sterling is mentioned as the eventual amount. The loan figure has not yet been fixed but depends on China's requirements and financial position. The question of official control and application of proceeds is also unsettled.

REUTERS wires from Peking on the 17th—According to Chinese reports the Russians have obtained numerous concessions principally with regard to mining from Mongolians.

REUTERS understands that according to a telegram from Peking the six nations' loan is at a dead-lock. The latest development is that the Ministers of four nations have presented a Note to China, answering the latest Chinese reply, and stating that the Powers do not feel justified in advising the banks to resume negotiations, pending effective action by China to secure respect for the pledges to international banks, adding that there is no room for a misunderstanding on the subject of the Anglo-Belgian loan, as China suggested. The affair is a breach of undertakings between China and the banks.

REUTERS wires from Peking on the 23rd.—A manifesto has been issued ordering the abolition of the Board of Colonies on the ground that Mongolia, Tibet and Turkestan have become part of the Republic and are no longer Colonies.

REUTERS wires from Peking on the 24th.—Tang-Shao-Yi has submitted to the Ministers of "the four nations" a statement explaining the position with regard to the Belgian loan, but the Ministers have renewed their protest and demand cancellation of the loan, to which demand Tang-Shao-Yi is apparently prepared to agree.

A message to the Times from St. Petersburg says that the intention of China to send delegates to Mongolia to treat with regard to the recognition of Chinese sovereignty is viewed with favour in official circles. Russia still adheres to the idea that Mongolia should be an autonomous province under Chinese suzerainty. It is believed that China will ultimately accept this formula.

Russian money is finding its way into the Mongolian treasury in return for mining and other concessions.

Home Rule Bill.

THE Mansion House in Dublin was crammed on the 23rd when the National Convention met. On the motion of Mr. Redmond seconded by the Lord Mayor of Cork the Home Rule Bill was approved amid a scene of enthusiasm lasting several minutes.

Regarding the Bill, Mr. Redmond characterised it as the greatest and most satisfactory ever offered to Ireland and they would be a nation of fools if they did not accept it. He considered that the financial side was much better than in the previous Bills. He favoured a nominated Senate. In view of the experience of the Colonies, he wanted a Senate crowded with men who had hitherto been unsympathetic to Nationalists, men with a great stake in the country representative of literature and art.

TETE À TETE

ENVER BEY'S is not a name that can leave any Mussalman unaffected when his death is reported. There has been much perturbation in every Moslem household since the 24th instant when Reuter's wire from Rome was published, stating that the gallant leader of the Turks at Benghazi had died on the morning of the 22nd at Mariut from a wound received in the recent fighting. But there was little inclination to believe this tragic news because all had realized that it had only come from Rome, and the subsequent telegram from Cairo confirmed the disbelief of Indian Mussalmans. Reuter's correspondent at Cairo said that "nothing is known there to corroborate the Italian report of the death of Enver Bey," and this should have settled it. For the manufacturers of news at Rome are practised artisans, and they take good care to leave some safe corner for beating a retreat at the advent of truth. They did not say they had received this news from the Italian Commander at Benghazi or Tripoli. They only asserted that "a telegram from Cairo received here states" etc., etc. But Reuter's correspondent at Cairo could find nothing to corroborate this truth of Italian manufacture, and it was fairly safe to call it a lie, as one is irresistibly led to pun. But we have not been content to wait for Reuter to correct or confirm the news wired from Rome. Immediately on reading Reuter's telegram on the 24th, we cabled to the War Minister, Constantinople, and wired to the Consul-General at Bombay. H. E. Jaffer Bey, the Ottoman Consul-General at Bombay, wired back that the news of Enver Bey's death had not been confirmed. This telegram was received by us in Calcutta at 12-18 on the 25th, and fully strengthened our belief that after annexing Tripoli in the Chamber and the Senate, and winning victories in the closets of Commanders and Cabinet Ministers, the Italians had taken to killing Turkish heroes in editorial sanctums. But what has been annexed has yet to be conquered, and the accomplished fact has yet to be accomplished. Similarly, Turkish Commanders that daily riddle them with bullets and nightly plague them with nightmares have yet to be killed on the field of battle. The Kaiser has already shown his keen appreciation of Italian prowess by telling Signor Giannini, a member of the Italian Chamber of Deputies, during his recent visit to Venice, "If I had people so intelligent as the Italians, I would conquer half of Europe." What a pity indeed that the stolid and slow-moving Germans kill their hare before they cook it! To the white lies and black lies, the war has now added Tripoli, Italy, and the Triple Allies. As for Enver Bey, the facsimile, which we publish below, of the cable of Field Marshal Mahmoud Shevket Pasha, which we received this morning as we were going to press, will tell its own tale. Long live Ghazi Enver Bey, and may he have honour and victory, like the two victories achieved by him on the 10th and 12th March, though denied by Italy. But if it please God at any time to take him away from us, we know he would not himself choose a better death than fighting sword in hand for his country and his creed, his Sultan and his God. Were he to die there, how many of us would not envy him such a death in preference to all we have here! As Ghalib says,

زیست اولكى ۛ حو اوس كوچہ سے گھیل آے

(There is death who died and were buried there, and there is life who returned wounded from that neighbourhood.)

READERS of Paradise Lost have noted the artistic development of Satan's character, declining gradually from a lost angel to the despicable and disgusting creature assuming strange shapes to compass the destruction of Man. It would appear that Italy, not content with being a first-class European Power, and goaded by the ambition of her King who would be an Emperor, like the other two rulers of the Alliance Powers, attempted a task far beyond her strength and, failing in that, rapidly sinking into ragged misery. The first stage was one of boasting on a titanic scale and a bandit's raid on an unprotected portion of the Ottoman Empire. In the first flush of the landing of troops in Tripoli all sorts of heroic resolves of restricting the field of operations were made, but when nothing could be done in Tripoli after the occupation of a few coast towns, except the advance on Ainzara so loudly proclaimed as the prelude of a general advance, the bandit took to piracy in the Red Sea, to the bombardment of unprotected ports and to harassing neutral shipping. Tired of that and told by France to mend her manners, Italy and her untiring but tiresome supporters began to proclaim still more loudly of her intention "to strike a telling blow at the enemy." General Canova had frankly told his Government that victory in Tripoli was hopeless. At last Ainzara too had to be evacuated, and things reverted after nearly six months of "a sort of war" to what the Drill Sergeant would call, "As you were." Then all the "self denymg" pledges not to extend the field of operations were brushed aside, and last week the long impending forcing of the Dardanelles commenced. Now, it is necessary to understand the exact situation of the Dardanelles before one can form any idea about the desperate nature of the Italian attempt. The strait of Dardanelles, in ancient times called the Hellespont, famous from the story of Hero and Leander and from Lord Byron's successful attempt (reported by others) to rival the ancient swimmer, unites the sea of Marmora with the Aegean and extends for a distance of about 47 miles. It has an average breadth of 3 or 4 miles, but at its narrowest part is barely a mile across. The superiority of the Italian fleet is, therefore, of little avail here, for the land defences of the peninsula of Gallipoli on the north west, and of the mainland of Asia Minor on the south east make it possible for Turkey to engage even a larger fleet than Italy has, without calling out the Ottoman fleet stationed at Nagara. At the Aegean extremity stand the castles of Sedil Bahr in Europe and Kum Kala in Asia. The two castles of the Dardanelles par excellence are Chanak Kalesi, Sultanah Kalesi or the Old Castle of Anatolia, and Kilitli Bahr or the Old Castle of Rumelia. Such is the strength of these positions that when in 1878 the British Mediterranean fleet was ordered to Constantinople to resist the Russian domination over Turkey as arranged in the Treaty of San Stefano, and it was not certain whether the Turks would resist or favour this advance, the late Admiral Phipps Hornby, who was in command, afterwards described "the breathless suspense amid which the Fleet passed through the straits in the darkness not knowing at what moment they might be greeted with a hail of shot and shell." Since then the dangers of the strait have increased rather than decreased, and the positions are now fortified with that efficiency which is characteristic of Mahmoud Shevket Pasha and his Young Turk lieutenants. They know the strategic value of the strait, and they have been ready any time during the war to give the Italian fleet a warm reception. As the Statesman remarked, "the Dardanelles are believed to be practically impassable nowadays. They constitute the one point on which Turkish efficiency is concentrated, and the action of the Italian fleet, in thus attempting an enterprise of so desperate a character, seems to suggest that the Government in Rome feels that the ineffective result of their operations in Tripoli necessitates some attempt at effective action elsewhere." Yet what has been the result? Our contemporary writes: "It is doubtful whether the Italian Commander had fully estimated the danger of his enterprise, which has apparently even in spite of his early retreat, resulted in the loss or practical disablement of at least one of his ships." If Italy tried her hand at forcing the Dardanelles, she has clearly burnt her fingers. But having failed in this perilous enterprise, as she was bound to do, she must invent some objective in order to explain away the defeat, and the inventive genius of Italy has discovered this time not one objective, but two. Only, these expert larks have forgotten that the two reasons which they assign to this rash attempt are mutually destructive. The first is that "the fleet merely hoped to induce the Turkish fleet to come out and fight." This reasoning the Statesman rightly calls "highly diverting." It writes: "Considering that the warships which Turkey possesses are vastly inferior both in quality and number to the Italian fleet and that they were protected by forts and mines, the idea that they would rush out to destruction would hardly appeal even to an Italian cabin-boy." But even without arguing in this way it can be shown that this idea never occurred to the Italian Admiral of the fleet. For the papers in Rome assign a wholly different and much more natural reason to this attempt. "The Italian papers suggest that it was intended to force the Turks to close the Dardanelles." This was done, and naturally Lloyd's and the Baltic Exchange were extremely uneasy. Reuter wired on the 20th instant that all chartering for the Black Sea was at a standstill, and that there were 150 steamers on the other side of the Bosphorus. Three days later, it was reported that the London and Baltic ship-owners were discussing the cancelling of contracts, which would have been a serious matter for the Russian wheat exporters. On an average some 12,000 merchant vessels pass the straits, and the aggregate tonnage in 1908 exceeded 13 million tons. Of this British tonnage amounted to 5½ million tons, and one can well understand the seriousness of closing the Dardanelles to British shipping to which Mr Acland referred in reply to a question in the Commons. But Russia is in no better position, for were it not for the strait of the Bosphorus which unites the Black Sea with the Sea of Marmora and connects it, through the Dardanelles, with the Aegean, and thence with the Mediterranean, the Black Sea would be a mere lake. Russian shipping amounts to over a million tons, and is nearly double the tonnage of Italy, France and Germany singly. Russia has therefore been more importunate than Great Britain, and knowing very well that Russia would jump at any opportunity for quarrelling with her, Turkey had contemplated the re-opening of the Dardanelles even before a Russian protest had been formulated, although it was impossible for her to ignore the danger to herself. That showed that Turkey was, as Mr Acland admitted, fully alive to the importance of the matter. But the Commander of the forts has rightly refused to undertake the responsibility of re-opening the Dardanelles in view of the continued presence of the Italians in the Archipelago, and the Cabinet has taken counsel together but has not yet come to any conclusion.

IN THE case of Great Britain and Russia the closing of the Dardanelles is after all merely a question of some commercial loss. But to Turkey it may mean life or death. Yet she knows that it is not only Italy that she is fighting but that every hand is anxious to be at her throat and the Russian hand is most anxious to be there, though Mr Leo Maxse of the National Review asserts an unbelieving world on that most reliable piece of evidence, his own unsupported testimony, that "few Powers are more obviously interested in keeping the peace than Russia." In Persia, Turkey has for the past few years kept Russia on tenter-hooks on account of her army in Urumia, which commands the route to Tabriz, and can prevent an advance on Teheran when Russia shows unmistakably her intention to annex Persia. But the question of the straits is even more important, and Russia has been most uneasy about it since in the Russo-Japanese War she realized the difficulty of concentrating her naval strength quickly at the seat of war. Her diplomacy has since then been directed towards opening the straits to her men of war. In 1833, by the Treaty of Unkiar Skelessi, which she forced on Turkey, she required Turkey under a secret clause in certain contingencies to close the Dardanelles to the warships of all nations in Russia's hour of need, which meant in effect the closing of the straits against the invader from the Mediterranean when Russia was threatened. But the Powers were averse to this, and on the 13th July, 1841, by the Protocol following the Convention of London, the straits of Dardanelles and Bosphorus became closed to all foreign warships. In 1856, after the Crimean War, the Treaty of Paris was signed, the principle of that Protocol was confirmed, and, by Article XI of that Treaty, the Black Sea was neutralized, its waters and its ports, thrown open to the mercantile marine of every nation, were "formally and in perpetuity interdicted to the flag of war," and, consequently, by Article XIII, "the maintenance or establishment upon its coast of military maritime arsenals becomes alike unnecessary and purposeless, in consequence His Majesty the Emperor of All the Russias and His Imperial Majesty the Sultan engage not to establish or to maintain upon that coast any military maritime arsenal." In the Convention annexed to that Treaty, the Sultan declared his firm resolve "to maintain for the future the principle invariably established as the ancient rule of his Empire," prohibiting the passage of foreign warships through the straits, and Great Britain, Austria, France, Prussia, Russia, and the "King of Sardinia," on the other part, engaged themselves "to respect the determination of the Sultan and to conform themselves to the principles above declared." But Bismarck had received assistance from Russia in defending the Prussian Cabinet against the jealousy and enmity of Austria and France, and in return for these services Bismarck helped Russia to recover a portion of what she had lost by the Crimean War. For, thanks to his connivance and diplomatic support, she was able in 1871 to denounce with impunity the clauses of the Treaty of Paris which limited Russian armament in the Black Sea. As the Plenipotentiary of Austria said in the Conference at London, it had ostensibly been called "to give a fresh pledge for the faith of Treaties," but it was clear from the Earl of Granville's speech on the very first day of the Conference that it was entered upon with foregone conclusions and made freedom of discussion impossible. The Russian Plenipotentiary pointed out "how much the present situation of Europe differs from that which existed at the time of the Congress of Paris," and that in view of this "it would be an act of prudent and wise policy to submit the stipulations of 1856, relative to the navigation of the Black Sea, to a revision guided by an unanimous sentiment of equity and concord." The stipulations, he declared, were "no longer in harmony with the relations of good neighbourhood which exist at this moment between the two Riverain Powers." The Plenipotentiary of North Germany showed only too clearly that the talk of "a spirit of conciliation, of equity and of peace" was insincere, and that he came with instructions to support Russia, though he proclaimed his own Government's "entire impartiality and perfect freedom of judgment." The sequel proved that Bismarck and Russia could do what they liked. But even then the principle of the closing of the straits was maintained, though Russia was enabled to rebuild Sevastopol and construct a Black Sea fleet. The "relations of good neighbourhood" were disturbed six years later when the Russo-Turkish War commenced. At its conclusion the Treaty of Berlin upset the arrangements decided upon in the Treaty of San Stefano, but by Article LXIII, which is of a general character, the provisions of the Treaty of Paris of 1856 about the Black Sea and the straits, as modified by the Treaty of London of 1871, were confirmed and maintained. But Russia has no respect for all these frontiers and pledges, and would use any pretext that comes her way to provoke a quarrel with Turkey and force her to open the straits to her Black Sea fleet. That is the natural consequence of the Conference of 1871 which made the construction of the Black Sea fleet possible, and Russian diplomacy has always been directed to that end. Very probably the Italian provocation to Turkey to close the Dardanelles to merchant shipping also for the present was a move planned by Russia herself, for Russian "friendly note," are the stormy petrels of her diplomacy, and one has just been addressed to Turkey. But if it was not, Italy stands confessed that her only weapon to-day is the creation of chagrin and worry to the neutrals so that they may bring pressure to bear upon Turkey. Is this war or what? A tiny Turkish gunboat is sunk, a yacht belonging to the Khedive is seized, the cables between Asia Minor and the Turkish Archipelago are cut, and the Italian fleet of 39 ships returns to Italy "having accomplished its object." If this is war it is not different to the despicable shifts to which Satan is put in the last books of Paradise Lost, and though there was never anything angelic about this war, its present condition does not even show the least trace of the grim determination of the Devil as he fell from heaven. Even the disgrace of Adowa cannot compare with the ragged and prolonged misery of the last six months, and when the war is over lovers of righteousness even in international politics would have the satisfaction of seeing the most unrighteous aggressor getting her deserts by sinking in a few years into a third-rate Power. Nemesis is not far behind now and will soon overtake Italy, in spite of Mr. Leo Maxse who asserts that "Italy has triumphed in the 'stricken field'."

ALTHOUGH Mr. H. V. Cobb, C.I.E., the Resident of Baroda, was to have gone on a promotion, as it was first thought, to Indore, and as it was definitely arranged later, to Ajmer, as the Agent to the Cobb-wela.

Governor-General, the people of Baroda would have been the last to grudge him this recognition of his over-subtle sense of smell where sedition was concerned. But we regret to hear that all health has snatched the reward of such strenuous sedition-muzzling from him, and even Baroda would sympathise with him in his illness which necessitates a return to England. We believe Colonel Impey goes to Baroda in his place, and we hope he will not prove the "strong man" among "Politicals" that it was Mr. Cobb's great ambition to appear to be. Baroda has supped long enough of such horrors and needs some rest. In the meantime we would request Mr. Cobb to read what Viscount Hardinge, the brother of H.H. the Viceroy, said about the Dular incident while delivering a lantern lecture at the Town Hall at Tunbridge Wells on 29th March, "in connection with the Junior Conservative Association." Making special mention of the incident at the Durbar which is connected with the name of H.H. the Gaekwar, Lord Hardinge is reported to have said that he happened to be within twenty yards and had no hesitation in saying that the whole thing had been grossly exaggerated. He had seen many English officers and ladies at Court do very similar things—English officers going by the King without bowing and ladies running past the King and Queen simply through nervousness. He asked that if the Gaekwar of Baroda did not make a low enough bow, why should they not attribute the same nervousness to him as to loyal British officers? That is the mature and deliberate opinion of the Viceroy's brother, who has the additional importance in this connection of having been on the staff of His Majesty the King-Emperor, being his Aide-de-Camp. Add to his opinion the fact that English officers and English ladies who are somewhat gauche on such occasions have not the same excuse for their nervousness as the Gaekwar had, such as communications received just before their departure to the Court about black-mailing ruffians, and a censor morum of the rank and type of Mr. Cobb. But we do not wish to revive a controversy that was hardly less silly than mischievous, and after this testimony from Colonel Viscount Hardinge, C.B., A.D.C., and the arrival of Colonel Impey at Baroda, we are sure all Cobb-wels would be brushed away, and Baroda would once more be the home of peace and progress.

THE British Foreign Office has within a short space of time issued two Blue-books relating to affairs in Persia. The first covers the period from the beginning of 1911 to September, and the second brings up the narrative to the end of the difficulties caused by the Russian demands for indemnity and the dismissal of Mr Shuster. Though there is nothing new in regard to the leading episodes of the Persian history covering the period, the papers nevertheless reveal more fully the attitude of Sir Edward Grey as he dealt with the successive phases of the crisis. The trouble began with what is now generally known as the Stokes affair. Mr Shuster wanted to appoint Major Stokes to an important command of the Treasury gendarmes. Sir Edward Grey at first could see nothing wrong in the appointment, but as soon as the Russian objection was launched he changed his mind and definitely set his countenance against the proposal of Mr Shuster. This was the initial success scored by Russian diplomacy, which continued to grow bolder and more exacting each time. Sir Edward Grey showed signs of irresolution. The irony of it all was that Sir Edward Grey was conscious all along of his being forced to make needless and undue concessions to unjustifiable Russian demands. There is a pathetic paragraph in his despatch dated 16th August, 1911, sent to the British Ambassador at St Petersburg. Sir Edward Grey wrote—"I think that Russian opinion and Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs are unduly sensitive about Stokes's appointment. I am disappointed to find that he appears to realise so little that I have admitted the Russian objection and done all in my power to prevent the appointment owing to the great weight I attach to maintaining the good understanding and the co-operation between the two countries. M. Neratoff should explain to the public that it is solely due to our action that the appointment has not been made, and thus do in the present case what I have done in this country in keeping public opinion patient over the continued presence of Russian troops in Northern Persia and the action of Colonel Liakhoff in past years. I have had to defend these matters several times, and if I had been as exacting over them as Russia is now the good understanding between Great Britain and Russia would have come to an end long ago." The Muscovite had had his way, the British Minister had obligingly kept public opinion "patient," and yet he has had to complain of lack of appreciation, not to say gratitude, for all he had done. The Blue book dealing with the escapade of Mohamed Ali throws no light on the question of Russian complicity in the coup. Russia was formally responsible for his safe custody. The Russian denial of all knowledge about Mohamed Ali's movements must be taken for what it is worth. It may be clever diplomacy to throw the blame on Russian agents in whitewashing the central authorities, but it hardly disposes of the grave moral and political drawbacks that seriously discount the value of Russian co-operation and friendship. Sir Edward Grey pretends to believe that Russian policy is guided by the Tsar, whereas it is the policy of the Grand Dukes and Chauvinistic Russians abroad who do not share the Tsar's pacifism. The ex-Shah's free and unrestricted entry into Persia and his bid for the throne illustrate the actual state of Russo-British relations. The observance of neutrality about Mohamed Ali's adventure was scarcely creditable to the signatories to the Protocol of 1904. But it lay exactly the opportunity that Russia had been consistently working for, while Sir Edward Grey held back, not knowing what to do, or not having courage to do it. In regard to the later stages of the trouble, we fully appreciate and admire the firmness shown by Sir Edward Grey towards the end when even he felt that the Russian demands and the methods of enforcing them were growing intolerable. He protested against the Russian troops entering Teheran, considered the importance attached by Russia to the incident regarding the Shua-us-Sultaneh's property to be excessive, and deprecated the demand for an indemnity. He reminded the Russian Government that there was danger of the two Governments drifting apart if the gravity of the issues at stake was not realised. This representation had the desired effect and Russia gave a definite undertaking to make no further demand regarding the political future of Persia without consulting Great Britain. We wish the same strength and directness of purpose had characterised Sir Edward Grey's earlier policy. He, however, allowed himself to be led step by step into the labyrinth of Russian diplomacy with the result that he could not save Persia from being mercilessly dragooned and bullied and shorn of some of her most important sovereign rights. The Times of India, like so many others, thinks that the Anglo-Russian Agreement has saved Persia, because it enabled England to exercise pressure in a friendly manner. "If there had been no such instrument," says our contemporary, "then Great Britain could have presented her representations only in the form of ultimatums . . ." Had there been no such Agreement and no simple Sir Edward Grey, Russia would have thought twice before making any aggressive move in Persia. As for ultimatums, Great Britain was ready to go to war with Germany for nothing—unless we say, in an unrighteous cause. No doubt the difficulties were enormous, but then it is the function of trained diplomacy to smooth away the difficulties for the development of a definite and courageous policy. If it is in the interests of Great Britain to keep Russia out of the practical occupation of Persia, it would be sheer lunacy to suppose that the object would be attained by humouring Russian susceptibilities. And we are glad that the Times of India also recognises that the real mischief in the irresolute and faltering early steps which Sir Edward Grey had taken. It must be gratifying to the Indian Moslems to know that their feelings on the subject of Persia have entered into the considerations of the British Government in forming their Persian policy. The Times of India says that "their national interest in a neighbouring Islamic State has on occasions warped their judgment", and that "we trust they will now recognise that... Great Britain has been careful of the feelings of the Muhammadans of this country." If the Mussalmans have erred in this estimate of the character of the Anglo-Russian Convention or the strength of British policy they have erred in good company. As regards the self-denying ordinance that has prevented Great Britain from more active interference in Persian affairs, we learn on the authority of "Asiaticus" in his article in the April number of the National Review that "any intervention on a larger scale would involve India in a widespread entanglement for an indefinite length of time. Such intervention would be both costly and dangerous." "Asiaticus" is no other than Mr Lovat Fraser, the former editor of the Times of India. It becomes difficult, then, to say who is right, the Times of India or its former editor, and whether Moslem feelings have for once assisted in the formation of Imperial policy, or Moslem gratitude is demanded as an "unearned increment" of a narrow and insincere Imperialism. But we are sure the Mussalmans are not so base as to withhold gratitude where gratitude is due.

By THE appointment of Sir William Nicholson's Committee "to consider military policy administration and expenditure in India," a serious flutter has been caused in the military circles. But the nervousness with which some of the military critics are looking forward to the work of the Committee is more serious still. It is rather amusing to observe the anxiety and suspicion with which all possible results of the inquiry are being discussed even before the Committee has entered on its labours. Every effort is being made by the Tory Press of England to impress Sir William Nicholson and his colleagues with the absolute necessity of leaving things where they are, if they cannot recommend a further increase in military expenditure. Mr. Lovat Fraser's recent article in the Poll Mall Gazette is an apt case in point. After a hurried analysis of the system of Army administration, he comes to the conclusion that it would be deplorable if any attempt is made to interfere with the system organised by Lord Kitchener, that the Commander-in-Chief should be retained, that the number of British officers, however excessive, should not be reduced, that in trying to formulate proposals for the removal of minor defects, if any, nothing should be done to reduce the strength of the Army or curtail the existing expenditure. After these restrictions we do not see if any scope is left for the Committee's inquiries, and we think it would be better, both for the convenience of Sir William Nicholson and the satisfaction of the worshippers of Lord Kitchener, if Mr Lovat Fraser's article is adopted as the Committee's formal report on the military administration of India. Lord Kitchener may have been a great military administrator, but his reforms, carried out at immense cost, are not to be taken as the last word in military organisation, nor are the Government of India debarred from conducting inquiries with a view to economy simply because it would be putting Lord Kitchener's system on trial. Those who have made a fetish of Lord Kitchener—and we hasten to point out that Mr Lovat Fraser as the editor of the Times of India was a bitter opponent of K. of K. during the latter's controversy with Mr Fraser's hero, Lord Curzon—seem to forget that the chief object of their solicitude should be military efficiency and not military expenditure. There are many who still believe that Lord Kitchener's reforms were expensive without being efficient. If the Nicholson Committee would find it possible to devise economies without impairing efficiency it would amply justify its appointment. We are, however, afraid that the standard of efficiency is very elastic and some alarmists in England see in bloated armaments and mounting millions the only guarantee of safety. We trust that the Committee will not merely mark time and register the decrees of the enemies of retrenchment, and that it would consider the claims of Indians for Commissions in the Army which are now strongly supported by that true friend of India, Lord Minto.

The Comrade.

Compulsory Education Debate.

VI.

WE HAVE dealt with all the general objections, both official and non-official, and now come to the Muhammadan objections. Far from desiring to minimise the objections raised by the Mussalmans against the absence of certain very necessary safeguards, we believe they have a genuine grievance against Mr. Gokhale that in drawing up the Bill sufficient attention was not paid to Moslem interests. Incidentally, the absence of such safeguards shows that even so shrewd and sagacious a publicist as the Hon. Mr. Gokhale—whom it is itself an honour for every community of India to honour—is apt to overlook the Moslem point of view on account of being out of touch with the Mussalmans and their centres of social, intellectual and political activity. Much as publicists may try to be just to all communities, they are only too often betrayed by their ignorance of the views and aspirations of some communities into unconscious injustice. No one can advocate a cause without having mastered the brief, and we are still far from the days when, if ever, it will be possible to have "Members for India" in our Councils. It would have been better if Mr. Gokhale had consulted a few leading Mussalmans before drawing up his Bill, and preferably not those who generally follow his lead in politics even at the risk of going contrary to the wishes of their own community. It certainly hurt the amour propre of the Mussalmans that a Bill of this character was drafted and launched into the Council without paying any heed to the wishes of 70 million people, or taking the least care to court their good-will. But in spite of that, it was the Moslem community which first offered Mr. Gokhale its support, and that in no uncertain terms, while forward Bengal still sulked in its tent and took no pains to hide its chagrin. What is more significant, the Mussalmans were by no means easy in their minds about certain matters to which we have more than once referred in these columns. But the sins of the details were not visited on the main principles of the Bill, and they supported the latter throughout while freely criticising the former.

Had the Hon. Mr. Shafi followed the same course he would have done a distinct service to his community and also to the country at large. But, for reasons behind which we have no desire to go, he was personally opposed to compulsion, and he made persistent efforts throughout the year to carry the community with him in that opposition. In this he failed, for thanks to the efforts of its leading men, including the Hon. Mr. Shafi himself, the community had by now acquired a taste for education, and recognising its own backwardness, it was not prepared to place the freedom of the individual above the good of the community. What Mr. Shafi should then have done was to come to the Council, present the case against compulsion as forcibly as he could—that is, if he still was of the same opinion—but at the same time confess—if he referred to the community at all—that in this matter he had failed to make his own convictions the beliefs of his co-religionists as well. As a matter of fact he represents a mixed constituency, namely, the Legislative Council of the Punjab, and he was not bound to refer to the convictions of his co-religionists at all. But if he did so, it was his duty to make it clear that in this matter his own views were at variance with theirs. But Mr. Shafi is nothing if not a "leader," and it was perhaps difficult for him to come to the Council as a shepherd without his sheep. He also brought into the Council chamber the atmosphere of the Court room, and tried to prove too much. In this he failed again, and while we are sorry for the rough handling he received at the hands of the Hon. Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque, we cannot say that he did not in the least deserve it. He referred to the "guarded and cautious resolution" of the Moslem League; but we do not know if any other supporters of the principles of Mr. Gokhale's Bill were at all less guarded and cautious in the matter of details than the Moslem League; and in saying that "at the bottom of these conditions there lurks a conviction in the minds of the exponents of these views that a resort to compulsion under existing circumstances is premature and impracticable," Mr. Shafi was not correctly representing the innermost convictions of the overwhelming Moslem majority that supported the principles of the Bill.

But in all this the wish may have been father to the thought, and all that we can say is that Mr. Shafi deceived himself as well as the Council. When, however, we come to the statement that only "34 out of 61 members who attended the Anniversary" supported the League's resolution, and that the letter of the late Secretary of the All-India Moslem League on the subject of the Bill was "adopted by a majority at an adjourned meeting in which 7 members were present," we confess we find it difficult to characterise the tactics of Mr. Shafi as different from those of a portfogging mukhtar. We have, in fact, some difficulty in believing that the suggestio falsi was altogether unconscious. Mr. Shafi was careful enough to explain, while Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque was speaking, that the letter of the Secretary of the League was drafted at an adjourned meeting of its Council; but a shrewd lawyer like him could not fail to see that the reference to the adjourned meeting, however strictly accurate, was likely to be misunderstood, and we know that it was useful for his purpose that it should be so misunderstood. Similarly, although 61 members attended the last session of the League and 34 voted for the resolution, unless further data are supplied one is apt to think that the remaining 27 either voted against the resolution or altogether abstained from voting. If Mr. Shafi had no desire to mislead, and was in fact anxious that no misunderstanding should take place, why did he refer to the numbers at the adjourned meeting of the League's Council and not to those on the first day, and why did he mention the numbers attending the last Session of the League and not those that opposed the resolution? Now, as a matter of fact, the meeting of the League's Council was attended by perhaps the largest number on record, for members had come to Lucknow in the middle of last August from every part of India to take part in an important meeting of the Moslem University Constitution Committee, and a very large majority of those present differed from Mr. Shafi. Although he himself was absent, he had sent no less than three different communications by post and wire, and the reading out of these took such a long time that the members who were present could not have the letter to the Government drafted that day, and, as Mofussil members were returning to their respective Provinces, they had barely sufficient time to register their votes on the principles of the Bill. A unique opportunity had presented itself to the Mofussil members to discuss these, and the reason that although so many had attended and registered their votes in favour of them, only 7 members—probably all local—could be present on the following day to adopt the draft of the Secretary's letter, was that an absent member—and that no other than the Hon. Mr. Shafi himself—practically monopolised the discussion with his various warnings. As for the discussion in the League itself, although 34 voted for the resolution, its opponents numbered no more than the "Citizens of Great Britain" who hailed from the sartorial establishments of Tooley Street, and one of the trio was the Hon. Maulvi Rafiuddin, who had accepted only three months before the similar resolution of the Muhammadan Educational Conference at Delhi.

While on this subject, we should like to say that it is not only the Secretary of the Punjab League that has thus tried to belittle the deliberate opinion of the Mussalmans as expressed in a resolution of their accredited political body, the All-India Moslem League. The Hon. Nawab Abdul Majid is the President of the United Provinces League, and although he quoted with approval the adverse opinion of that association on a subject that was far from provincial, he condemned the clear majority of the All-India League as "people who have never freely mixed with the common people, and who 'do not know their feelings and . . . are not in a position to give their opinion on the probable effect which will be produced on the mass of the people if compulsion is resorted to'." Now, both these eminent gentlemen are "leaders" of the Mussalmans, and whenever communal honours have to be distributed the community never forgets to include them in the largest. But how do they treat the community? They have ample use for it when it is sensible enough to agree with them, but it is evidently an incumbrance when it is perverse enough to think for itself and differ. In effect, there is little to choose between the Conservatives and the Radicals among the Mussalmans, for both treat the community as a corpse in the hands of the undertaker. There are unmistakeable signs that the community has begun to resent this treatment, and there is some danger that dictatorship such as this would lead to communal nihilism and the negation of all order and authority. This must be avoided at all cost, and we appeal both to the idols and to the idol-breakers to prevent too hasty an iconoclasm.

As regards the Moslem objections, we think that while the Hon. Nawab Abdul Majid has stated them fairly well, the Hon. Mr. Shafi has confessedly heaped up all possible and impossible objections together and has made out the Mussalmans to be hopelessly pig-headed in their unreasonableness. The objections which relate to the Bill itself, and not to the present system of education generally, are, we believe, three. In the first place, there was no safeguard in the Bill that Mussalman boys would not be compelled to use some language other than their mother-tongue as the medium of instruction, and apprehensions prevailed that Urdu would be ousted out from elementary schools not only elsewhere, but in Upper India itself. In the second place, as the Bill made no provision for religious instruction, it was apprehended that such instruction would disappear altogether, and that a Moslem boy would grow up in utter ignorance of his religion. In the third place, there was no assurance that the Committees in charge of compulsory education in local areas would have thereon adequate Moslem representation.

The Hon. Mr. Malaviya did not rightly enter into the Urdu-Hindi controversy while discussing Mr. Gokhale's Bill, but his silence is not always reassuring, and even if it were, statements such as this, that according to "so great a scholar as Sir William Hunter, Hindi stands at the head of all the vernaculars of India," are sure to create fresh apprehensions. Mr. Gokhale, however, met the language difficulty by showing his willingness to insert in the Bill that "where 25 children speaking a particular language attend a school, provision should be made for teaching those children in that language, further, where the number is less than that, it should be left to the community itself to say whether the children should come under the compulsion of the Bill or not." We hope he would also add that even if a language is not the mother-tongue of 25 pupils, if they wish to learn it as a second language, provision should be made in the school for teaching that language as such in case 10 pupils apply for it. This is necessary for Borahs, Khojas, Memons, Bengali and Sindhi Mussalmans, and others who habitually speak and write in another vernacular, yet wish to know Urdu, because much Moslem religious literature has been translated into that language, and because it is the standard medium of communication between Mussalmans of different Provinces.

As for religious education, all communities should be free to make provisions for religious instruction even at the cost of the State. Finally, the Committees in charge of elementary education in local areas should always have on them an effective and adequate representation of the Mussalmans. To these two suggestions Mr. Gokhale has said nothing, but we trust that when a new Bill is introduced next year, definite provisions would be made in it for re-assuring the Mussalmans. They have not yet developed an indifferentism in the matter of faith, and no system of instruction which neglects religion would meet with their approval. As regards Moslem representation, we repeat what we have often said, that it does not argue political sagacity to insist on a numerical basis of representation and thereby always send the Mussalmans in to the opposition camp. True political wisdom lies in removing their apprehensions by giving them effective and real representation, and thus securing the co-operation of the community in all measures designed for the progress and welfare of the whole country. In the matter of Compulsory Primary Education, the Mussalmans have clearly shown that they are ready to work shoulder to shoulder with the Hindus, and although the Mussalmans are now adequately represented in the Imperial Council, where would have been the harm if there were some more Moslem supporters of the Bill in the Council in the place of Sir G. R. Chinnai, the Maharajahdhiraj of Burdwan and Mr. Dadabhai? What matters is the confidence, good will, and co-operation of the different communities, and not a nice proportion of their representation. So long as Hindus insist on the latter, there is reason to fear that whatever Moslem representation there may be in the Councils would largely be diffident in co-operating with the Hindus, for the extremist who plays to the gallery is more likely to find favour with the electors than the moderate Mussalman, who regards Moslem representation not as an end in itself, but as a means to the great end of co-operation with all classes and communities for the good of our Motherland.

The Government of India Bill.

THOUGH none could have reasonably expected that the House of Commons debate on the Government of India Bill would be anything more than a formal rehearsal of well-known opinions dressed up in the approved official style, we imagine very few were prepared for the heroic and unruffled dogmatism with which Mr. Montagu, the Under-Secretary of State for India, discoursed on the Durbar changes and the policy that inspired them. Mr. Montagu, is nothing if not sententious, he suffers from that sort of literary temperament which leads one to strenuously think aloud, though the thought becomes in the process a series of tremendous judgments. His speeches on Indian affairs are masterpieces in the art of bold and untrammelled assertion, he moves with magnificent self-confidence in regions of hopeless controversy and doubt, and many a veteran or affairs would envy his superb note of conviction. However, the gift of excessive self-confidence is not always an unmixed blessing. The tangle of Indian affairs in particular would not be smoothed away by categorical pronouncements. Lord Curzon tried the experiment, and the results he achieved are still the subject of Mr. Montagu's most uncompromising philippics. Even Under-Secretaries of State cannot lose the infallibility of their position by sometimes trying to study things instead of laying down the law about them.

Mr. Montagu began by claiming that both the changes and the method of carrying them out were absolutely and strictly constitutional. The Bill, he said, was a machinery Bill "to carry out a policy acclaimed by the vast majority of all classes and races . . ." We have amply discussed this aspect of the question on several occasions and have no desire to repeat what we have already said.

in this behalf. But it is rather amusing to see Ministers protesting too much against the charge of unconstitutionality. Let us, however, grant that all that has been done was perfectly bona fide. Let us freely accept the assurance of the Under-Secretary of State that the Government of India were amply provided with existing statutes and enactments to indulge in huge administrative gambles and to incur fresh expenditure of millions. But does the matter end here? Is the legality of the procedure the only issue or even the main issue raised by the announcement made at Delhi? We must recognise that Mr. Montagu is fully conscious of the far weightier issue of policy underlying the changes, which renders the constitutional question comparatively trivial. It is the spirit of the new policy that is the far more serious consideration. The changes themselves are the result of that policy which, says Mr. Montagu, "has been welcomed by the overwhelming bulk of the people of India, and by all races and creeds. It would open a new era of contentment and progress. There were already signs of great hope of increasing the peace, increasing the prosperity, and increasing the consent of the governed to be governed by a Government which had shown sympathy with their legitimate aspirations." We earnestly hope the beneficent prospects outlined by Mr. Montagu will speedily materialise as the fruits of that policy. But we confess, even after reading the picturesque despatches of the Government of India and Lord Crewe and all other official pronouncements on the subject, we are still uncertain as to what that policy really is. There has been plenty of fine feeling, sympathy and good will shown towards India since the Royal Visit by those responsible for the Government of the country. And although it is yet too early to estimate the character and tendencies of the new spirit, there can be no doubt that a new spirit is abroad in the land. That does not, however, mean that Indian affairs have been cast in a new perspective or definite change has been introduced in the objective and character of the British Rule. There has been no definite enunciation of policy or principles, and it is not our fault if we are left to infer what Mr. Montagu calls "the new policy" from the nature of the recent administrative changes, their genesis, their fruits, and the reasons that are said to have prompted them.

Now, coming direct to the modification of the Partition of Bengal, the first question that naturally arises is why the Partition was at all carried out. Mr. Montagu tells us that Lord Curzon had no policy in partitioning Bengal, and that he was simply concerned with administrative efficiency. But he had thoughtlessly cut across a united and homogeneous nationality and created widespread agitation. Says Mr. Montagu --

But the real and bitter resentment against the line which Lord Curzon drew across the Bengali speaking nations and the grievance against unfair and disproportionate representation remained as deep on Durbur Jay as ever. That kind of agitation was at the root of most that was threateningly wrong in India. It was the wisest statesmanship to investigate the reasonableness of the grievance, and remove it, and settle a national wrong so none could say that they were responding to an illegitimate clamour that was dead. They had redressed a grievance which, as long as it lasted, would have remained as great as on the day it was caused.

Let us suppose the Partition of Bengal was a grievous wrong which had driven the entire people to desperation. It was no doubt a wise statesmanship to remove the wrong and heal the festering wound inflicted by an impetuous Viceroy on "the Bengali speaking nations." Then why was that monstrous wrong, that terrible and unbearable woe allowed to remain unredressed when a most liberal and sympathetic Ministry came into power? To talk of expediency then and of "settling the national wrong" now is the height of fatuity. The Partition agitation may have been based on some genuine grievance. It was, however, its virulent and anarchical manifestations that seem to have frightened the Government into revoking it. At least that is the conclusion that one is forced to draw after studying the whole melancholy situation. Mr. Montagu need be under no illusions as to the real value that has been attached to his wrong healing by those who were "wronged." They have now a truer insight into the methods of political success and they make no secret of their knowledge.

Mr. Montagu had to say something in his own inimitable style about the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal, every word of which is well worth pondering. His generalisations are sometimes as staggering as they are positive and absolute. About the Mussalmans of India he confidently asserted that "it was a mistake to talk of them as though they were a homogeneous nationality." This was perhaps a major premise which led to another categorical assertion, to wit, "the Muhammadans of Eastern Bengal and Hindus had little or no relation with those outside Bengal." We do not know why Mr. Montagu found it necessary to make these remarks. We hope he was not trying to use these luminous saws about Indian Moslem ethnology as arguments against the united demands of the Mussalmans for a recognition of their claim to a separate individuality in the political evolution of the country. We do not know what Mr. Montagu means by "a homogeneous nationality." If a common religion, a common culture, a common language, a common history, an identity of aims and aspirations and a community of living interest include in them the elements of homogeneity the Indian Mussalmans are the most homogeneous community in India. Islam does not recognise the boundaries of colour and race. Its greatest glory is to have destroyed for ever these artificial barriers and welded the true believers into a common brotherhood inspired by the same ideals of life and its ultimate purpose. It is, therefore, misleading to talk of the Indian Mussalmans as a "nationality" that is not "homogeneous." In fact the Mussalmans are the only community in India that is stirred by the same ideals and is moved by the same hopes. The Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal are bound to their co-religionists in other parts of the country by ties stronger than any that bind a Scotchman to an Englishman, and all their social, political, and educational activities are inspired by and co-ordinated with those of the whole community.

Perhaps Mr. Montagu meant to prove by his remarks about the relations of the Moslems of Eastern Bengal that they had much in common with the Bengali Hindus. It is, however, a strange phenomenon, which unhappily often escapes notice, that while the Hindus of Bengal strongly opposed the Partition, the Mussalmans were as strongly in favour of it. There ought to have been a united outcry against Lord Curzon's blunder if there had been any community of interest or sentiment amongst "the Bengali-speaking nations." The Hindu politician would, of course, say that they were misled by the false glamour of official favouritism. We know the fatal facility with which he can construct arguments of this kind; but no one, who has dispassionately considered the various elements—racial, religious, and political—that constituted the Partition question, can take him seriously. Deep down in his consciousness the only "wrong" that burnt was the loss of monopoly. Mr. Montagu has said admirable things about the impartial character of the British Rule, and has denounced, in the solemn, pontifical tones of orthodox Liberalism, all those who imagine that Eastern Bengal was purposely created to be a Muhammadan Province. No one having the least knowledge of the conditions of British Rule can for a moment believe that the favouring of one community at the expense of another can be the reasoned policy of the State. It would end in disaster. There is, however, a kind of infatuation for mock liberalism and its facile formulas that not seldom masquerades as justice, and perpetuates a fearful iniquity all the more grinding and ruthless because it is borne in silence, Mr. Montagu's righteous fervour notwithstanding. Lord Curzon did justify the Partition on the ground that it would give a much-needed opportunity to the Mussalmans to improve their condition. He could see no injustice in creating equality of opportunity for different races and creeds where it did not exist before. Indeed he had far truer sense of justice when he set about to right a perpetual wrong under which more than half the population of Bengal was groaning as the result of the conditions that favoured exclusive Hindu ascendancy. The impartiality had degenerated into indifference. It was a far wiser statesmanship that realised the danger of allowing millions of the "Bengali-speaking nations" to be perpetually condemned to political and social servitude. Lord Curzon redressed the balance, and, without injuring the legitimate Hindu interests, set free the energies of the Mussalmans to work out their own salvation. Was this a "national wrong" or a necessary measure of justice? The anti-partitionist cries had the ring of "unity" and "national sentiment" about them. They found willing converts amongst those who would not hesitate to forge new fetters in the sacred name of liberty. Mr. Montagu thinks that by undoing the Partition the grievance of the "Bengali-speaking nations" has been removed. But what are these "nations"? Are we to understand that more than half the population of Bengal has no title to be called "people" inasmuch as their grievances have never found an echo in the Bengal Press? Are the boycott demonstrations, anti-partition meetings, violent crusades in the Press, anarchical propaganda, Samitis and bombs to be the hall-marks of a living "nationality"? Mr. Montagu seems to imply as if the Moslem demands were unfair and unreasonable. We should think they have a right to demand that the pledges given to them shall be redeemed in full, and we do not see any unfairness in their refusal to sink quietly again into their bondage from which a mere chance had given them deliverance. We are sure even Mr. Montagu would not like that they should adopt the cult of the "nationalism" that has succeeded in proving a "settled fact" to have been a "genuine grievance," although there seems to be no other way of making themselves effectively heard. Whatever the new policy may be in its essence, in its practical effects it has taught the people of this country the unmistakable lesson that clamour tempered by violence is a political asset not to be despised. It is just because the results of this lesson are too terrible to contemplate and disastrous to peace and order that we have written so often on the subject. We wish the people to unlearn it, but that consummation, no matter how devoutly to be wished, cannot be brought about by indirectly apologising for weakness.

Behar and the "Beharee."

IT SPEAKS volumes for the energy and political capacity of the people of Behar who are responsible for this enterprise that within an incredibly short space of time they have converted the Beharee from a weekly into a daily paper. It was in utter disregard of All Fools' Day that the recent administrative changes were carried out by the Government, and, following that precedent, these enterprising workers have shown their contempt for superstitions by converting the Beharee into a daily on a 13th. But whatever the day chosen for the conversion, we welcome this indication of our contemporary's progress. Behar and Bengal were an ill-assorted couple, and the separation gives to Behar an opportunity for developing the individuality which a century and a half of association with Bengal had not succeeded in destroying. Beharees are no doubt sure that what has secured to them their good fortune is nothing less than their own character of sturdy loyalty. But we are not so sure if Bengal has not proved the sturdier of the two, and we have yet to discover that loyalty is in any way a peculiar merit of Behar, or that, for the matter of that, it ever enters as an important element into Government calculations when political concessions are to be made. A lady of considerable beauty was once observed to show some partiality towards a somewhat plain individual. At this one of the company turned round towards another and said, "What a lucky fellow, that, I say." His companion, who was shrewder, replied, "I pity the poor devil who is intended to be jealous." Well, we have a suspicion that if Behar is lucky, some other Province is also intended to be jealous. But howsoever Behar may have secured her separate existence, it depends upon the Beharees what use they are going to make of such existence. A powerful organ of Behar opinion was a sine qua non of progress, and we shall be happy to discover in the enlarged and renovated Beharee such an organ of Behar opinion.

Behar had hitherto suffered for being smaller than Bengal, and few minorities can do otherwise than wear the badge of their tribe. But Orissa and Chota Nagpur yoked to Behar are just as ill-assorted as Behar yoked to Bengal. All that they have achieved is a change of masters. Behar will have the power of the giant, and it rests with the Beharees whether that power is to be used like a giant's. The two representatives of Behar in the Imperial Council have already been on a fugitive pilgrimage of assurance to Cuttack on the suggestion of His Excellency the Viceroy, and we trust the Uryas have been duly assured of the good intentions and kindly disposition of their new masters. There is, however, a Behar within Behar itself, which stands in no less need of assurance than Orissa, although we are often asked to believe that such an element has no separate existence. We refer to the Mussalmans who will now form a very poor minority of the new Province. Thanks to the enterprise of some of the leading Muslim families of Behar, the community is not comparatively backward in education. But the Hindus are fortunately leaving off the old-world superstitions which prevented their crossing the seas, and in a few years their superior wealth and numbers would tell forcibly, and a population of 7 per cent. will find it difficult to make itself felt in the new Province. So long as the relations of Hindus and Mussalmans are such that religion does not draw lines of cleavage in politics, all is well. But when once such distinctions begin to enter into mundane affairs, the weaker community must go to the wall.

Behar has had the good fortune to have had among its leaders such men as the late Babu Saligram Singh, Khan Bahadur Syed Fazl-i-Imam, Nawab Vilayet Ali Khan, Khan Bahadur Khuda Baksh Khan, C.I.E., and the much younger but hardly less influential Babu Mahesh Narayan. It is also fortunate that amongst the older men Rai Radha Kishan Bahadur, Khan Bahadur Maulvi Klairat Abnadi and the Hon. Nawab Sarfraz Husain Khan are still there to watch over the new Province, while the comparatively younger men include Babu Krishna Sahay, the Hon. Messrs. Shiva Shanker Sahay, Deep Narayan Singh, Mazhar-ul-Haque, and Wasil Ahmed. Far the most brilliant leaders of Behar have, of course, been the brothers the Hon. Messrs. Ali Imam and Hassan Imam. But they and their amiable uncle are now cut off from public life, and although their very existence must be an influence for good, politics cannot know them while they remain in office. With a past so encouraging and with the present so hopeful, Behar may well look forward to the continuance of those happy relations which kept the Hindus and Mussalmans united.

But we shall be suppressing an important fact if we give no hint of hostile tendencies which have been too persistent to be ignored. The Hindus of Behar would no doubt ascribe all these to the Muslim League and the separate electorates, just as in Bengal every evil is alleged to have had its root in the Partition. But it is curious that some prominent Mussalmans of Behar took the lead in founding the Muslim League, while the provisions of the Reform Scheme which relate to Muslim representation are almost their own creation, and had received the approval of a Provincial Conference of Behar. Since then the Hon. Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque has had occasion to discover the demerits of separate electorates, and although even in Behar he would rather have the Mussalmans voting for the Mussalman representatives in the Legislative Councils, for some occult reasons he would not apply that principle to local bodies. Similarly, the Hon. Mr. S. Sinha, who had, we believe, supported separate Muslim electorates and a larger representation of Mussalmans than mere numbers warranted, is still of opinion that this should be endured more or less as an evil that cannot be cured, but would stoutly oppose the logical extension of these principles. Mr. Parmeshwar Lall, however, is more consistent and will have none of such representation anywhere. Some eight or nine months ago he had called his co-religionists together to form a militant Hindu Sabha to oppose a moribund Provincial Muslim League whose comatose condition perhaps only its Honorary Secretary, the Hon. Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque, can explain. There was a good deal of plain speaking then, and the rift in the lute became only too apparent. It is no secret that Mr. Parmeshwar Lall cannot tolerate a Muslim politician even of the type of Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque, and in the Behar Provincial Conference presided over by the latter, Mr. Parmeshwar Lall referred to the "height of impertinence" displayed in the Presidential Address, and to the evils of having a Mussalman in the chair. What then could be more natural than the letter of Mr. Parmeshwar Lall to the Bengalee written, as he says, "in common justice to the Hindu community", inquiring what attitude the daily Beharee would adopt towards the Mussalmans? He quotes at length the Hon. Mr. S. Sinha's views on the Hindu-Muslim question, condemns what he calls the "excessive over-representation" of Muhammadans in the Councils, confronts the Hon. Mr. Ali Imam with Mr. J. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P., and with much plausibility says that "the fact that the Government of India through the late Sir John Jenkins once said in the Imperial Council that the question would not be re-opened until the Muhammadans themselves give up their claims does not settle the question any more than the statement of Lord Morley as to the Partition". After this ominous statement, Mr. Parmeshwar Lall asks, "will the paper (the Beharee) express the views of the Hindu community on the subject or will it take up the extraordinary attitude of Mr. Sinha," stating at the same time that the views of the latter are not shared by those who are financing the Beharee to-day.

We had hoped that after being called upon to explain this our contemporary would not hesitate to offer a clear statement of its views. But all that it has done is to reproduce an article from its first issue when it went by the name of the Behar Times. We have carefully read that article, but find little in it that is applicable to the conditions of to-day. It indicates nothing beyond a protest against Bengali domination which had, in fact, led to the establishment of the paper 18 years ago. The Hindu-Muslim question did not exist then in Behar, nor elsewhere either, for the Mussalmans were in too depressed a condition to count in politics. Recently, however, there has been little to distinguish the Beharee from other Congress organs representing the views of the assertive and articulate section of the Hindus; and a couple of months ago we were amused at the irony of fate that led the Beharee to talk of the necessity of safeguarding Hindu interests in the matter of high Government appointments, for this remark was made ad hoc of the acceptance by Mr. Hasan Imam of a Judgeship, at considerable self-sacrifice dictated by the needs of the Province itself. It cannot, therefore, be denied that there is considerable apprehension that the Beharee would be a Hindu paper in all but name, and we think the Mussalmans of Behar should thank Mr. Parmeshwar Lall, who would make it frankly the organ of the Hindu opinion of Behar, rather than those who may be tempted to sail under dubious, if not false, colours. For one thing, however, we are thankful to the founder of the Behar Times of 1894. He wished to dissociate himself from "the canting conventional liberalism" as much as from partisanship, and we would be sorry if the Beharee, while exposing its Bengali opponents ruthlessly and often in language which we would hesitate to employ, would still persist in asking the Mussalmans of Behar and elsewhere to believe implicitly in the angelic virtues of the Bengali leaders of the Congress and their organs. In its issue of the 14th instant it repeats a somewhat trite but no less true saying: "So long as human nature is what it is, one can hardly feel elated at the impending prospect of loss of pelf and power." We wonder if the Beharee has ever thought that the same human nature that makes the Bengali what he is makes the Hindus of Behar and elsewhere also what they are. We also pity poor human nature, and, as a necessary corollary, we vote for separate electorates so long as human nature is human nature and the conditions of India remain the same as they are to-day.

Essays: Indian and Islamic.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE"

SIR,—I have read with interest, almost with amusement, the letter of Khwaja Ghulam Saqlan. In his zeal he has forgotten the usual courtesies and has made his criticism a mere veil for a personal attack. I will not follow his example, but will only say that he would have done better had he waited and read the essays before rushing into print. Upon his own admission his criticisms, if criticisms at all, are founded upon a perusal of the review which appeared in the Comrade.

I would hardly have thought it necessary to reply to his letter had he not charged me with a lack of moral courage in not openly discarding Islam. My views, according to him, are un-Islamic. They have an atheistic complexion. Allah be praised! I do not stand in need of a certificate of orthodoxy from so high a pontiff. And all the more thankful to the Almighty am I that the days of religious persecution are over—never, I trust, to return. We live in days of free discussion, and this inestimable gift our religionists should enjoy and not throw away. Our religion is founded on too solid a foundation to suffer any damage from free discussion. If anything free discussion will bring out its hidden qualities more and more.

Nothing is more painful than to break with the past, and I can well imagine the horror of one who has been brought up in old traditions at the sight of old beliefs attacked, accepted positions challenged, dearest traditions rejected, old landmarks swept away. Everything is in a state of flux here: religion, law, social conditions—everything, in fact, with which man has any concern, direct or indirect. Every change, slight or great, has been resisted, but in spite of resistance the world has moved on. Is it not Ghulab who has said—

ہر کس کہ شد صاحب نظر دین بزرگان خوس نہ کرد

Was not Socrates condemned as a corrupter of youth? Was not Jesus crucified and Mahomed persecuted? Why? Because each sought to lead humanity to a larger sense of duty, to a more perfect sense of righteousness. The old religions needed remodelling, readjustment, and these prophets were the instruments of reform.

The old Arabs who fought the Prophet were as deeply convinced of the truth of their religion as the Khwajah is—and rightly so—of his own. But that did not prevent Mahomed from exposing the hollowness and falsity of the religious system then prevailing. The fact is that the heathen religion had done its work. Another was required, more in harmony with the growing needs of the time. And so the world has moved on from point to point.

Have not changes taken place in Islam itself? What are the different sects? Are they not the various aspects of Islam; Islam seen through various lenses? Surely Mr. Saqlan does not contend that Islam is cast iron, hide-bound, stereotyped. If anything, it is the one religion which is flexible, accommodating and absolutely unfettered by any unalterable, inviolate rules.

My supreme offence is that I have said that Islam owes a great deal to Judaism and Christianity. Can any one in his senses deny the indebtedness of Islam to these two great religions of the East? Mahomed never claimed the honour of having set up a new religion. Over and over again he denounced the corruptions that had clung to Judaism and Christianity, and sought to purify them. It was the religion of Abraham that he was restoring in its original, pristine purity.

If the Khwaja had only taken the trouble to read my book he would have found that I deplore as much as he does the neglect of religious education among us. But it is perfectly clear that, however much we may be in agreement on this point, our conceptions of religious education will vastly differ.

If my views appear unorthodox to the great Khwajah, be it so. I do not quarrel with him on that score. But where does he find that I deny what he calls the basic truth of Islam?

"Now there should be no mistake in what," says he, "I mean. If the learned author is a Mussalman, belonging to any definite sect or even a rational exponent of Islam who has taken up some visionary 'Broad Church' as his model, he cannot be allowed to deny the basic truth of Islam that there is an external existence, which can and does inspire apostles for the guidance of mankind, and that of all such appointed agents of the Almighty Mahomed was the greatest, and that whatever he said was in conformity with and by order of the creator and ruler of mankind."

Is there a single passage in my book which even remotely suggests a denial of the eternal existence or leads a fair-minded man to the belief that Mahomed was not the prophet of God? I am not aware of any such passage and I challenge the Khwajah to cite one if he can.

As a Moslem, not only by birth but also by deliberate choice, I cannot but have the highest regard and veneration for the Prophet of Arabia. In my opinion, he stands first and foremost among the religious teachers of the world. His humanity, his gentleness, his self-sacrifice at a time when not a single peak of human greatness had remained unclimbed—all these mark him out as the greatest of men almost superhuman in firmness of will and strength of purpose. I have no less a love for the Prophet of Arabia and "the founder of Islam" (I use these words advisedly) than my critic has, but the parting of ways comes here between us.

I would not rob the Prophet of his glory by making him a mere conduit pipe between Allah and the angel Gabriel. No! I consider him to be the author of that great religious reform which opened to humanity a new path for salvation and showed a new road to righteousness. Inspired he was, for what is inspiration but the surest conviction of the truth of one's message and mission in life? Inspired, indeed, in the truest sense of the word, for he could not have achieved what he did in fact achieve without divine light and without divine protection.

Let us have the basic truth of Islam—to quote the language of my amiable critic—and let us adhere to it. Why call for allegiance to the accretions that overlie it? Can we not be good Muslims without the accretions? Surely we can.

No greater service can we render to our community and religion than the removal of fanaticism, which, to our discredit, is always associated with Islam. The advance of modern culture has very largely leavened our thoughts and has deeply affected our religious beliefs. To deny this would be the height of folly. To oppose it would be the height of absurdity, for opposition would be unavailing. We must accept the situation and make the most of it. The disputed propositions of one age are the commonplaces of another.

It would be idle to stifle the enquiry or to stop free discussion in matters religious, because enquiry will be made and discussions will take place—protest as much as we may. The only solution of the problem is the weeding out of non-essentials and the uprooting of useless overgrowths in our religion.

Before I conclude, I would like to add one word about the 'mundane instruction' which has excited the indignation of Mr. Saqlan. Much as I admire his contempt for mundane instruction, I only trust he will not put his views into practice upon those who enjoy his protection and have the benefit of his guidance. If we have such kindly lights as the Khwajah to lead us, our community, poor as it is, in "dipti sahibs, balister sahibs and babu sahibs," will soon cease to supply even this small quota, and will eventually become a fit training ground only for butlers, khanasamahs, railway employees and, possibly, village chowkidars.

We have already neglected secular education enough, and it is time that we awakened to our real needs and requirements—leaving the heavy-turbaned and long-bearded aspirants to the kouris of paradise to quibble, to wrangle, to dissipate their energy over religious squabbles.

The "basic truth of Islam" should suffice for the present. I loathe controversy, and I trust I will not be drawn into it. I ask for the Khwajah's forgiveness if I have been, in course of this letter, betrayed into warmth of language.

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

THE Pioneer's Shiraz correspondent wrote on 29th March.—Ispahan Road has reverted to its former state of absolute insecurity. A large caravan was plundered about six weeks ago and stores for the squadron of the C.I.H. at Ispahan were looted as well as a large number of packages belonging to an English firm here. The freight rates rose to Rs. 60 per mule for the journey, the normal rate being a quarter of that sum, and now no transport owners will risk their animals at all, so that Ispahan is absolutely cut off from the south. Fortunately, Mr. Knox, late Consul here, with Major Capper going up to join his squadron at Ispahan, managed to get through safely.

Replying to Mr. Morrell, in the House of Commons on the 19th, Mr. Acland said that in view of the situation, the British and Russian Governments had urged Persia to hasten the arrival of the new Governor Firman Firina at Hamadan, and to strengthen his forces to enable him to deal with Salar-ed-Dauleh. Firman Firina had now left Kazvin for Hamadan.

Reuter wires from Teheran on the 22nd.—The tribesmen to the north of Ispahan attacked Major Peterson, a Swedish gendarmier officer, as he was returning from Shiraz. One of the assailants was killed.

The Regent yesterday received Sir Walter Townley, the new British Minister.

March 30.

A BLUE BOOK was issued on the 29th March [Cd 6104] containing further correspondence on Persian affairs. The correspondence begins in January of last year with the suggestion that Swedish officers should be appointed to organise a gendarmerie in Persia, and is carried down to the end of September. It thus covers the appointment of Mr. Shuster as Treasurer-General, the return of the ex-Shah to Persia, and the controversy regarding the appointment of Major Stokes. All these events are dealt with in great detail, the correspondence including despatches to and from Sir George Buchanan at St. Petersburg as well as to and from Sir George Barclay at Teheran. The despatches fill rather less than 200 pages and cannot be adequately summarized. It is interesting, however, to note that as early as 10th July (he arrived in Teheran on 12th May) Mr. Shuster's attitude prompted the following mailed despatch from Sir George Barclay to Sir Edward Grey—

Mr. Morgan Shuster has now been two months in Teheran, and his influence is already a leading factor in the situation. The Mejliss, for the moment at least, is entirely at his command, and proposals from him have only to be made to be accepted with practical unanimity.

One must admire the pluck and energy with which he has at once thrown himself into the struggle for reform, but at the same time one cannot have but some misgivings as to the results of his headlong progress.

On the only occasion on which I have met Mr. Shuster he emphasized the purely financial character of the work before him, and said that he was no politician. If he means by this merely that he will refrain from meddling in politics one can only applaud his resolve, but the apparently light-hearted way in which he embarked on a conflict with the Belgian Customs Administration, and followed this up with the offer of the Treasury gendarmerie appointment to Major Stokes, in both of which steps he was exposing himself to opposition from Russia, would seem to give his disclaimer of the politician's role a more ominous significance, and point to its denoting a disregard of political considerations which it would be wiser to take into account.

The proposal to appoint Major Stokes was telegraphed to the Foreign Office by Sir George Barclay on July 7th, the first intimation regarding it having reached him on that day. On July 10th Sir Edward Grey telegraphed to Sir George Buchanan instructing him to obtain the views of M. Nérotov on the proposed appointment. M. Nérotov expressed himself in favour either of the appointment of an officer from among the minor Powers or of the division of the new command between a Russian and a British officer. Both suggestions were immediately communicated to Sir George Barclay, who replied that the splitting up of the command would certainly not commend itself to the Persian Government and further transmitted a note from Mr. Shuster strongly insisting on the appointment of Major Stokes in preference to an officer of some minor Power. These papers, therefore, destroy the accusation made in some quarters against Sir Edward Grey that he failed to act with promptitude when the appointment of Major Stokes was first proposed.

Bushire, March 29.

Lord Lamington has arrived here, and at the invitation of Sir Percy Cox, the Resident, has gone on board the Royal Indian Marine steamer Lawrence to visit Koweit. (Reuter)

Teheran, March 31.

Russian troops have bombarded the mosque at Meshed containing the tomb of Imam Riza, where a number of inhabitants had taken bast.

St. Petersburg, March 29.

Shua-es-Sultaneh, the ex-Shah's brother, is reported to be in St. Petersburg on private business. The visit is declared to be devoid of political significance.

The following is an extract from a private letter from Shiraz written by a member of the Indian force which left Bombay on October 19th and 20th to reinforce the British Consulate Guards in Southern Persia—

We cannot move about in small numbers, already we have lost in killed and wounded ten men, six followers, 20 horses, and eight mules, we have a blood feud with the Kashgai tribe, and the road to the coast is absolutely blocked to us. Taking the area we must defend here we have 350 rifles to 2,800 yards of perimeter, and our water supply can be cut off at any moment. In the spring 120,000 tribesmen, supplying roughly 30,000 modern rifles, will be round Shiraz, and then times will be a bit too lively.

I do not think that any one at home realizes the absolute chaos that there is now in Southern Persia. There is literally no government. The tribesmen, who are all good fighting men, have many modern rifles, and apparently unlimited ammunition. The nominal road guards are merely riflemen, stationed at posts about four miles apart all along the road, and they, at the muzzle of the rifle, demand toll from all who use the road.

Brussels, March 30.

It is reported that six officials belonging to the Finance Department left Belgium a few days ago for Persia. Three of them will be attached to the Treasury service and the others to the Customs Administration.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN")

The St. Petersburg Reich publishes the following Note, which throws a light on the events which preceded the bombardment of the mosque of the Imam Riza at Meshed—"The telegraph has brought the news that our Consul at Meshed, Prince Dabizha, has called upon the population to surrender their arms within three days. We are informed that the order issued by the Consul has been provoked by the fact that the adherents of Mohammed Ali, having joined hands with the opponents of the Russians, had posted themselves in the mosque, whence they have repeatedly made sorties, plundering both Persians and foreign subjects. The Consul has at present at his disposal about one battalion of Russian troops, which have been ordered on the expiry of the three days' grace to disarm the local Persians forcibly and completely to isolate those who have taken bast."

The Novoe Vremya publishes from its Teheran correspondent the following message—"The Regent insists that the clergy should sanction the reply of the Persian Government to the Anglo-Russian Note in order to avoid responsibility before the future Mejliss."

"In view of the projected reforms with regard to the reduction of the staffs of the administrative departments, all the officials of the Ministries of Justice and of Public Instruction have been dismissed."

The Temps announces the appointment of the Sipahdar to the post of governor of the province of Azerbaijan.

The Novoe Vremya's special correspondent in Persia, who, during the last few months has been flooding the columns of that widely read and influential organ of the St. Petersburg bureaucracy with his letters, deals in his latest article with the latest developments of the Persian questions—more particularly with the compulsory withdrawal of the ex-Shah. The writer takes the view that Mohammed Ali was in possession of virtually all Northern Persia except Teheran when the two Powers intervened.

Expounding his opinion he declares:—"On the very eve of the complete bankruptcy of a Government so notoriously incapable and so potentially inimical to us Anglo-Russian diplomacy decides to turn into dust all the successes of lawful authority resting on the people's will, and, discarding (because it appears for the moment inconvenient to it) the principle of non-intervention in the domestic affairs of Persia which it had proclaimed itself, offers to that Government not only its pecuniary support in the shape of a loan, but also its assistance in the matter of removing the old Shah and his brother from Persia. Recalling, then, the divergence of view between the British Foreign Office and M. Sazonoff on the question of the ultimate recognition of the ex-Shah should he succeed in capturing Teheran—a divergence which the Russian Foreign Minister in an interview reported in the Novoe Vremya only qualified by saying that 'the Russian troops would by no means lend their shields for carrying Mohammed Ali to Teheran,'—the writer of the letter assures the world that 'the old Shah was not at all in need of Russian shields. The illegally deposed monarch was able with his own shield to attain his object, but then the highest diplomatic quarters decided that the lawful sovereign of Persia was an article of political contraband, and he has now been compelled to return to Odessa.'

The writer asserts that "In the political world of Teheran the Anglo-Russian Note of 19th February is regarded as a new and considerable victory for the powerful and skilful English diplomacy which has sacrificed to us Mr Shuster and a score of revolutionists executed at Tabriz and Resht for the murder of a hundred Russian soldiers in exchange for a sovereign who, even in the estimation of a Radical journal, was the sole friend of Russia." "And now," the correspondent concludes, "we are once more galvanising this semi-decomposed body, which, however, as the recent events at Tabriz and Resht have shown, is capable in this simulation of life of producing most unexpected and dangerous reflexive movements against the repetition of which no diplomatic notes can ever safeguard us."

It is evident that only the complete occupation of the country will satisfy the representative of the Novoe Vremya.

On 3rd April in answer to a question put by Colonel Yate as to whether it would be made a condition in the agreement for the next loan to Persia "that the payment of the claims of the British and Indian merchants, amounting now to over £75,000, should rank with the claim for compensation for the attack on Mr. Smart, the British Consul, and his escort as a first charge on that loan." Sir Edward Grey stated that "the case of Mr. Smart is most exceptional, the attack having been made on one of His Majesty's Consular officers proceeding to his post. The Persian Government at once recognised the gravity of the matter, and have agreed to settle it as soon as any adequate funds are in hand. As regards other British and Indian claims, I would refer the hon. and gallant member to the answer returned to his question on 29th February, to which I have nothing to add. I cannot say whether the payment of commercial claims will be one of the objects of the next loan: the first object of any loan must be the restoration of order."

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Odessa, March 31.

The assistant-editor of the Odesskii Novosti was a few days ago accorded an interview with the wife of the ex-Shah and was by that lady explicitly informed that her Royal consort had definitely decided to take up his residence in England. The necessary arrangements had not yet been completed, nor has any date as yet been fixed for their departure hence. Mohammed Ali is anxious to meet his half-brother, Salar-ed-Dowleh, who is expected here within the next fortnight. The ex-Shah is now being treated by a specialist for diabetes, and is confined to his bedroom. His wife explained to the interviewer that it was this resolve of his Majesty to reside in England that has prevented his leasing a more commodious dwelling here. The Royal exile and his family, with a very limited number of attendants, are uncomfortably quartered in small ten roomed villa. The suite and a few followers who returned with Mohammed Ali from Persia are variously lodged in neighbouring private apartments. Captain Khabaef, the Russian adjutant attached to the ex-Shah, has not yet returned from his private mission to Tsarskoe Selo, whither he carried an autograph letter from Mohammed Ali to the Tsar. I am privately informed that on the tenour of the Imperial reply to that communication really depends the freedom of Mohammed Ali's choice of transferring his residence to England. He will be accompanied by his wife and two younger sons, a suite of half-a-dozen persons, and a few personal attendants. The editorial interviewer gathered from an observation of the ex-Shah's wife that it was not improbable that Salar-ed-Dowleh would also elect to retire to England. The final withdrawal of this Kajar prince from Persian territory is here regarded as the fortunate removal after that of Mohammed Ali, of the most dangerous mischievous factor militating against an early restoration of peace and order in Iran.

A Persian Dialogue.

(FROM THE "TIMES" TEHERAN CORRESPONDENT.)

TEHERAN is changed in these latter days and has resumed an ancient habit, lately interrupted for a space of years. It has for the moment an intermission of its modern fitful fever of politics; and if it does not, after its fitful fever, sleep either better or worse—Teherani has always had a turn for sleeping sound and waking voluble—it now gives back to the philosophical contemplation of existence what politics had stolen. The Mejliss sits no longer, and newspapers are few. The tide of war which flowed nearly to the city walls in the late tempestuous autumn, has ebbed away to the Caspian Gates on the east and the Turkish frontier on the West. Mr. Shuster has gone and the ex-Shah is going. The exacting patriotism, which rendered life unbearable by a boycott of tea, sugar and tram-rides, is no longer in place. So, with the gentle air of spring and the faint fragrance of violets to charm his garden, the Teherani has lost interest in politics, and being off with his new love, finds it well to be with the old. And the old love is all that ever went with philosophy, from metaphysics to the nice conduct of a carven silver walking-stick which is the Persian top's equivalent for the clouded cane, the management whereof betrayed so much to the more observant of our ancestors.

It was in this mood of revived reflection that Sohrab sat on my verandah and discoursed upon the vanity of human power. For it is not well to plunge abruptly from one absorption to another, and Sohrab, with a nice sense of transition, tinged his mood, not with the contemplation of pure being, but with the philosophical consideration of politics. He has much to say on such subjects that is of interest to me. For I find it a great comfort, and no mean aid to our friendship, that, though he has never travelled further West than Stambul, he has made some studies in the politics and literature of Europe. There is a select company of subcutaneous experts who profess to be able to get into the Oriental skin and to cross the supposed chasm between East and West but an indolent disposition and some lurking doubts about my own ability ever fully to understand anyone else, Oriental or otherwise, has barred me from their number. For I remember a manservant at home to whom I paid a small living wage, and who therefore had in the opinion of just and reasonable people, no right to allow himself to be in any way a mystery to me, but who, nevertheless, daily presented himself, as a baffling series of conundrums. Sohrab is more comprehensible than he. For Sohrab takes an occasional and entertaining interest in English politics, and he has even learnt to read the Times as well as the works of Monsieur Anatole France.

Sohrab is a poet and loves the quatrain. Unlike most of his countrymen, who rather resent our enthusiasm for Omar Khayyam and prefer both Sami and Hafiz, he admires Omar and imitates him, though somewhat longo intervallo. And it was to summarize the prevailing mood of Teheran that I quoted him a verse of Omar, and thereby provoked discussion—

Iran indeed is gone with all its Rose,
And Jamshyd's Sev'n-ringed Cup where no one knows,
But still the Vine her ancient Ruby yields
And still a Garden by the Water blows.

"Iran indeed is gone," said Sohrab, "but Iran is not. As for Jamshyd's Seven-ringed Cup, I do not know whether the butler of one or other of the Legations may not have taken it to add to his master's collection, for it is not well to leave things about in Persia. But Iran remains."

"Why, yes," I answered vaguely, "Iran remains." Believing myself to be what Lord Morley has called 'a good European,' I was somewhat nettled by his innuendo as to the possible fate of Jamshyd's Cup.

"I do not mean," he continued, "that there are still remains for the picking. Nor am I speaking in the geographical sense, that Persia remains only because, unlike the Cup, it is not portable, and so cannot be carried away. What I mean is that Persia as a nation has still something of its own, which is its contribution to the general stock of human value. It is true that we have just left a glorious future behind us. Two years ago we talked in that glorious future, the era of liberty and independence. But we have been like the thieves who found themselves in heaven—we have looted Paradise instead of living in it, so that we may say of the Constitution and of the country that it is a poor thing and not our own."

"If that be so," said I, "what have you left?"

"You," he answered, "judge a nation by its material power and riches. If a country is so great that, when its Ambassador speaks, everyone is seated on the carpet either of hope or fear, expecting either war or peace, or at least a loan or a railway, to come out of his mouth, so that there is general disappointment when he only asks for another glass of tea, you consider the citizens of that nation blessed. We, too, have pursued that shadow, and the Mejliss has wasted much time in giving orders that there were none to execute. We sent great Governors and Princes to pacify disordered provinces and Sardars to crush rebellious tribes. And the Governors and the Sardars salaamed and said, 'Chashm, by our eyes, we will go at once.' And six months later I have found those Governors and Sardars still smoking the opium of content in their houses in Teheran, or cheating the city of its wheat supply at great profit to themselves, and in general giving to the interpretation of the era of liberty and independence a personal and joyous application. But had the breath of the Mejliss been able to create fleets and armies—in which case I make no doubt that we should have been in the front rank of nations both by land and sea—so that we should have been a cause of fear to other nations, what profit would that have brought to the souls of our citizens? Or wherein is a man happier working at the bottom of a great ship than singing on the top of a high camel? You will say that he is sustained in his toil and compensated for blackness of his face by the thought that the ship, though for the most part he only sees the bottom of it, is one of the largest warships in the world. But, for my part, I think that he is sustained by the thought that he will receive sufficient money for his needs, which is, perhaps, what makes the camel-driver sing, or perhaps it is not. Moreover, the camel may be the largest of his kind also; and in any case it is not given to every country to have such large animals, whereon one may sit with a clean face and see the sun."

It seemed to me that several fallacies floated on this sea of illustration, but my admiration of this instance of Persian adaptability, in one who had lately been amongst the most thoroughgoing constitutionalists, overcame any instinct of combativeness. Here indeed was the eirapania which of old was the hallmark of the best Periclean Athenian. Sohrab had risen superior to political circumstance, and discovered anew the true greatness of his country. But he had not as yet revealed wherein it lay, and my curiosity was unsatisfied.

"I understand you to mean, Sohrab, that in the possession of the elements of happiness the modern Persian is at least no worse off than the citizen of a great Empire, but that every great country possesses a distinctive quality of its own, and that in this sense Persia is still an independent nation."

"I am not speaking of Literature or Art," he said. "I might contend that a country which has excelled in these has perpetuated itself for ever, and that, for this reason, my country need take no notice either of armies or ultimatums. But I speak only of a still existent contribution to the art of life, an art wherein nations may learn much from one another. For example, the essential contribution of the English seems to me to be comfort. The English are held to be hard workers, but in my judgment they toil only in order to make themselves comfortable and they have made of comfort a fine art, so that every country learns from them in the production of comfort. With the Germans I am, by circumstance, less well acquainted. Were I to judge from the newspapers, I would say that they excelled in the production of discomfort, and that other nations were recognizing a master in this art. But I am more disposed to judge them from their philosophy and to believe that their special attribute is calm. The Russians excel in hospitality, and the French in gaiety and cookery—though in this latter we rival them in the matter of rice and it seems to me that the Italians, having conquered the world by macaroni, might have left Tripoli to the Turks without loss of glory. As for the Turks, they also have an art of pleasing by their innocent stupidity, which is somewhat difficult for Persians to acquire, but nevertheless repays cultivation."

"But I take it that it was not of your acknowledged and unique position in the matter of rice that you spoke," said I. "I am seated on the carpet of expectation."

"The carpet was made in Persia," retorted Sohrab. "But it is not of excellence in carpets that I would speak, were it for me to mention the qualities of my own countrymen."

"But this is the abode of friendship and the court of frankness."

"No, it is for you to say what is the proper virtue of the Persian, and if, in my opinion, you are right, I shall surrender the citadel of modesty, not as concerning myself, but for my countrymen."

"Dignity," I answered, without hesitation.

"You have hit the mark. I speak not of national dignity, so much as of personal dignity. For is it not the test of dignity that it survives even when bereft of resources and in humiliating conditions? And this is in the nature of the Persian, so that even the servility of your servants is dignified, and the friendly greeting of cabmen—I speak not of their quarrels, wherein the difference is perhaps less—is a ceremonious form of words, whereas I understand that in your countries it is of ribald and barbarous character. It is true that, in these latter days, it has often pleased God to deprive us as a nation of the resources wherewith we should like to comport ourselves in a dignified manner; as, for instance, when last week we wished to give the Turkish Ambassador a salute, but, owing to a misunderstanding between our officials and those of our Northern neighbour, the guns were missing at the appointed hour. Yet I am assured that, even in the lamentable absence of the guns, all things were conducted in a proper and worthy manner, and everything humanly possible was done to comfort the heart of the afflicted Ambassador, who naturally resented an entry without either the smell of powder or the sound of shot."

The contemplation of the calamity of this silent and inodorous arrival produced a long pause. The stillness was at length broken by Sohrab reciting one of his own quatrains, which may be rendered thus—

The Kingdom, Power and Glory, since we must,
We leave beneath Time's Key to Moth and Rust,
But let the Flow'r of Dignity and Pride
Blossom for ever in Dishonour's Dust.

Sohrab left me revolving in my mind an Oriental compliment, which, being unspoken, was perhaps more sincere than most. For I thought that he was justified in his optimism and that the nation which produced him could never die.

"The Charm of Persia."

WE ALL know the dreary and unreal conversation that hovers round a subject which fills the mind of all, but which no one dares to touch. It is like a funeral luncheon, when people chatter about politics, the theatre, and even the cold weather, but the worn-out body just left cold in the ground is not mentioned. At the Geographical Society once we heard a traveller who had returned from two years on the Congo, discourse amiably upon fetich and idols, ants and flies, for more than an hour, and at the end the chairman thanked him for having so skilfully avoided all reference to "certain unpleasant subjects"—which were exactly the subjects the audience should have wished to hear about if they had not shrank from having their feelings harrowed after dinner. Similarly, at a recent International Conference upon peace and the treatment of subject races, no word was allowed upon European questions or the suppression of other races by the Great Powers—the only points that would have given vitality to the discussions. "Oh, no, we never mention her! Her name is never heard," our modest grandmothers used to sing with drawing-room pathos, and often in polite public assemblies, as well as in conversations at the dinner table, we are reminded of that sentimental warbling.

We were reminded of it again the other day when Sir Mortimer Durand was expatiating to the Persia Society on "The Charm of Persia." Sir Mortimer Durand knows Persia well. He was Minister at Teheran for about six years. He travelled leisurely over the country. As one who was long intimate with the North West Frontier, and who has penetrated at least twice on public affairs to the heart of Afghanistan, he knows the value of a free and independent Persia for our Indian Empire. He knows what it will mean for us in the future if we are compelled to advance our frontier from the natural line of mountains and passes, fortified and defended at so great expense and sacrifice during the last two generations, to the indeterminate and desert plains of central or southern Persia. He knows also the special character and capacities of the Persian people. We cannot doubt that he has followed the events of the last five years with particular, and even with absorbing interest. Far more vividly than those who have not dwelt in Teheran, he has realised those attempts at reform, the struggle for liberty and self-government, the corrupt intrigues of the Court, the nameless intrigues of Russian encroachment, the gallant and unavailing stand made by Mr Shuster against them, the pathetic loyalty of the popular party to their one disinterested friend, the brutality of Russia's invasion, the impotent acquiescence of her British ally in aggression, the final collapse of freedom and hope.

All this he knew, and whatever view he might take of the situation he has a special right to his opinion. That situation was the point of interest. In that brief struggle for freedom now lies the "Charm of Persia," that he took for the title of his discourse. But of this real point of interest and genuine charm he said not a word. It may be that the rules of the Persia Society prohibit allusion to anything vital. Or it may be that the speaker considered himself still bound by his former office, though, if everyone upheld that obligation, how much of our most trustworthy information we should miss! At all events, there it was. Upon the one subject of intense and actual interest he was dumb. "Oh, no, we never mention her," was his song, and round the thought that filled all minds he did not even hover.

He flew right away to an account of the climate—the dry and sunny air, so like South Africa, so cheering to the spirits. He told of the seasons in their turn, of the violets, the iris, the tiger-lilies, and the roses to which Omar's nightingale sings; the planes and poplars, the blackbirds, hoopoes, and plaintive owls, the summer quarters up in the hills to which the Legations remove; the delightful winters when even skating may be had along canals laid down for stores of ice, and sheltered by high walls from the brilliant sun. And then he told of the free and spacious country, still unfettered by railways; of the caravans, and of the official manner of travelling with two sets of tents, one daily sent on in front, so that on arrival the encampment is always ready. This manner of travelling he identified with "the simple life," and how many a wayworn traveller, struggling at the end of day to make some shelter of a bit of canvas or a cave, might envy official simplicity! He told of the mournful ruins of Isfahan, of the Bakhtiari, lying on acorn bread in pride among their mountains, of the Arab plains, where blue and green rivers meet, and horses play about the tents like cats. Then he told of polo, shooting, and the Briton's chances of amusement in killing various beautiful animals, of the country's arts, so rapidly declining under the blighting touch of Europe, of the literature and the poetic faculty still surviving even among muleteers. And at the last moment he called to mind the greatness and power of the land in past ages, as when, not so very long ago, a Persian conqueror equalled Napoleon in the extent of his conquests. That was the nearest approach to history, and that was all. Not a word of the poignant tragedy in which Persia is protagonist, while England sits mutely "assisting" at the final act.

Certainly, it is something to be made to realise the charm of a country thus to be sacrificed, and the happy disposition of a people so soon to be enslaved under the most tyrannical of the world's Governments. Tragedy is rendered all the more poignant when, like Hamlet or Antigone, its victim is endowed with a special and conspicuous charm of nature. The external beauty of her scenery, the tradition of her art, which may be said to have supplied not only the Middle East but India herself with their highest ideals of form and decoration, the literary associations interwoven in the very names and outward appearance of her cities—all these combine to endow this victim of Imperialist greed with peculiar interest. In his book of travel, called "A Year Amongst the Persians," Professor Edward Browne thus describes his first sight of one such city—

"We were now," he writes, "at that point, known to all students of Hâfiz, called Tung-i-Allahu Akbar, because whoever first beholds Shirâz hence is constrained by the exceeding beauty of the sight to cry out in admiration, 'Allahu Akbar'—'God is most great!' At our very feet, in a grassy, fertile plain, girt with purple hills (on the loftier summits of which the snow still lingered), and half concealed amidst gardens of dark stately cypresses, wherein the rose and the Judas tree in luxuriant abundance struggled with a host of other flowers for the mastery of color, sweet and beautiful in its garb of spring verdure, which clothed the very roofs of the bazaars, studded with many a slender minaret, and many a turquoise-hued dome, lay the home of Persian culture, the mother of Persian genius, the sanctuary of poetry and philosophy, Shirâz."

Only when we have realised all that is conveyed in the names of such places as Teheran, Isfahan, Shirâz, or even Naishapur, can we also realise the approaching horror of their subjugation under the monotonous brutality of Russian dominance. So, to some extent, even Sir Mortimer Durand's agreeable discourse upon temperature, flowers, horses, tents, and shooting must be allowed its effect. Those of the audience to whom Persia was only a geographical expression may have gained from it some sense of reality, and for those who knew the reality, it revived the tragedy of her fate. It served a purpose, but with how much finer delicacy and effect a similar purpose might be served, was well shown three days later in a letter from the Times correspondent in Teheran. It is called "A Persian Dialogue," or "Philosophy in Adversity" (the Times of 1st April), and the writer, well known for past services to the Persian cause, treats the overthrow of Persian freedom with elusive irony that even such champions of national suppression as the Times or the Norve Freeman could hardly catch hold of. The dialogue runs between the writer and a poet-philosopher, named Sohrab, who, in despair of Persia's new love of political freedom, has turned back with some contentment to her old love "of all that ever went with philosophy, from metaphysics to the nice conduct of a curved silver walking stick, which is the Persian fop's equivalent for a clouded cane." With native irony, perhaps tinged by his study of Anatole France, the philosopher maintains that "Persia as a nation has still something of its own, which is its contribution to the general stock of human value"—

"It is true," he proceeds, "that we have just left a glorious future behind us. Two years ago we talked in that glorious future the era of liberty and independence. But we have been like the thieves who found themselves in heaven—we have looked Paradise instead of living in it, so that we may say of the Constitution and of the country that it is a poor thing and not our own."

In the course of the dialogue, the distinctive quality supplied by various nations to the general stock of human value is discussed. The English contribution is found to be comfort, the German, discomfort and philosophic calm; the Russian, hospitality; the French gaiety and cookery; the Italian, macaroni (owing to the world-wide triumph of which they might have left Tripoli to the Turks without loss of glory); the Turkish, and innocent stupidity. As to the Persian contribution, Sohrab politely urges the correspondent to name it. "Dignity," he answered, without hesitation.

"You have hit the mark," Sohrab replied; "I speak not of national dignity, so much as of personal dignity. For is it not the test of dignity that it survives even when bereft of resources and in humiliating conditions? And this is in the nature of the Persian. . . . As, for instance, when last week we wished to give the Turkish Ambassador a salute, but owing to a misunderstanding between our officials and those of our Northern neighbour, the guns were missing at the appointed hour. Yet I am assured that, even in the lamentable absence of the guns, all things were conducted in a proper and worthy manner, and everything humanly possible was done to comfort the heart of the afflicted Ambassador, who naturally resented an entry without either the smell of powder or the sound of shot."

Finally, the poet sums up the meaning of dignity, and its surviving power, in one of his own quarters—

"The Kingdom, Pow'r, and Glory, since we must,
We leave beneath Time's Key to Moth and Rust,
But let the Flow'r of Dignity and Pride
Blossom for ever in Dishonor's Dust."

It may be that in the history of nations—"in this battered Caravanserai, whose portals are alternate Night and Day"—a race that dignity in dishonor is to be counted happy. But for us the true charm of Persia will still lie in the memory of her honourable effort for national independence, however calamitous, and her tragedy in the suppression of that honourable effort by two great Powers, actuated, the one by greed, the other by fear. It is useless to blink the truth by shirking the central interest and seeking refuge in amiable prettiness that moves no passion. Nor can one envy those diplomatists who, at the whisper of Freedom in the Chancelleries of Europe, combine in unison to practice their ante-chamber song, beginning—

"Oh, no, we never mention it!
Its name is never heard,
Our lips are now forbid to speak
That once familiar word"

Sir Edward Grey on Persia.

By H. F. B. LYNCH

THE Anglo-Russian Convention was signed in September 1907. Though Parliament had been in session until late in the summer, no suggestion had been made by Ministers that a treaty of this far-reaching nature was under negotiation. On the contrary, the House of Commons had been informed, in answer to a question, that the negotiations had reference to mere frontier questions in Asia. When the terms of the Convention were published, they produced what may almost be described as a feeling of consternation among those in this country who were well acquainted with Asiatic affairs. This feeling was mainly engendered by the provisions relating to Persia, while those which concerned Tibet and Afghanistan appeared to open wider rather than to close the door upon Russian intrigues in those regions. When Parliament reassembled in February of the following year, five months after the conclusion of the Convention, a debate took place (February 17, 1908) which, although it dealt with a fact that had been accomplished, was nevertheless memorable for the speeches which it elicited. It was opened by a speech of exceptional grasp and comprehensiveness from the late Lord Percy. It is interesting now to read the terms of the Motion which stood in his name. "That this House, while welcoming the principle of an agreement with Russia with regard to Persia, Afghanistan, and Tibet, is of opinion that the terms of the Convention, while involving at several points a sacrifice of British interests, still leave room for international misunderstandings of a kind which both the contracting Powers desire to avoid." Lord Percy began by enlarging upon the ambiguous nature of some of the most important provisions in the Convention. Were the two areas traced in the Convention, and subject, respectively, to British and to Russian influence, commercial or political areas; and, if the latter, what was the meaning to be attached to the word "political"? Noting that the phrase "spheres of influence" had been carefully avoided in the text of the treaty, he asked whether in fact there was anything to prevent their creation? Would it be contrary to the provisions of the treaty if one or both of the contracting parties were to persuade the Persian Government to entrust them with the machinery of administration, allow them to maintain a local garrison or even grant them a lease of territory in the regions where the Convention recognizes that they have a predominant interest in the maintenance of law and order?

In the light of subsequent happenings, Lord Percy's speech assumes an importance which impels me to make further reference to it on this occasion. He drew a striking contrast in principle between the Anglo-French Agreement and that concluded with Russia. In the case of the latter, both the character of the settlement and the methods by which it had been arrived at were the exact antithesis of those which had inspired and determined the former. The Anglo-French Agreement was a comprehensive arrangement, removing all outstanding difficulties between the two countries. It ranged from Newfoundland to Siam, and it proceeded to balance a concession in one part of the world against a corresponding concession in another part. In dealing with any particular problem, the authors of the Anglo-French Agreement started with the assumption that the most effective—if not the only effective—means of preventing a future conflict and clash of interest between the two Powers was to put an end once and for all to anything in the nature of a condominium in identical or even in contiguous geographical areas. We got a free hand, so far as France was concerned, in Newfoundland and Egypt, and France obtained similarly a free hand, so far as we were concerned, in Morocco. Contrast this kind of agreement with the Anglo-Russian Convention. That Convention alone included in its scope the regions commonly known as the Middle East, in particular portions of which it confirmed or extended Russian interests, and in Persia created a political condominium between Russia and ourselves. The Convention merely facilitated the prosecution of rival policies without, in fact, taking the trouble to inquire whether these policies were reconcilable or not. After emphasizing the enormous commercial sacrifices which we had made to Russia in Persia, Lord Percy concluded his speech on a less pessimistic note. Everything would depend, he said, on the manner in which the two Powers would interpret the main provisions of the Convention. It was quite possible that Sir Edward Grey had received from the Russian Government satisfactory assurances on all the points which he had just raised. British good faith and British honour were one of the principal assets of the British Empire, and both were involved in our dealings with the Mohammedan peoples in the countries adjacent to India. He expressed the hope that these peoples might come in future to look upon the Convention, not as a sign that Great Britain had ceased to take any practical interest in their welfare, but, on the contrary, as a crowning proof of the unselfish and disinterested character of her friendship.

Such is an outline of the speech to which, in February, 1908, Sir Edward Grey had to respond. It seemed to us who heard it to be unanswerable. Rising at once, the Foreign Secretary replied in the style to which we have now become familiar, and which consists in giving his own versions of events and of causes and setting it up against the version presented by his adversary. Addressed to an audience, to the vast majority of whom such subjects are new and unfamiliar, this style of reply possesses obvious merits. Very few of Sir Edward Gray's "facts" about Persia will bear the test of critical examination. In a recent letter to the Times (February 22, 1912), Professor Brownie has collected a number of such loose statements and it would not be difficult to add to the list. We know that Sir Edward Grey really reads the newspapers, and we must assume that the information conveyed to him by his department is either accurate or misleading. But the "facts" make a brave show, when skilfully strung together, and, on the occasion of his reply to Lord Percy, a great part of his speech was devoted to this process. He at first refrained altogether from dealing with Lord Percy's inquiries about the nature of the areas in Persia which had been traced in the Convention, and whether there was anything to prevent the conversion of these areas into spheres of political influence or even of occupation. But, when pressed by an interruption from the latter to give the House a reply, he brushed aside the question as hypothetical in nature, and confined himself to the statement that it had never entered his head for a moment that an Agreement which confirmed the integrity of Persia could be turned into a partition without consultation between the Governments concerned. This statement, however, was so obviously unsatisfactory that he was obliged to return to the subject before bringing his speech to a close. It is this passage which was the Foreign Secretary's substantial contribution to the debate, and it is so important that I shall quote it at length. It ran as follows: "I cannot say that all danger of interference in Persia is now over... But the danger of interference by ourselves or Russia is greatly diminished; and when I hear it said that Persian interests have suffered, I maintain that that statement is the direct contrary to the truth. I have used the term 'British and Russian spheres' I trust that it will be noted and understood that I have used it solely in the sense in which it is used in this Agreement and not in the sense of the political partition of Persia. Under the Agreement we bind ourselves not to seek certain concessions of a certain kind in certain spheres. But these are only British and Russian spheres in a sense which is in no way derogatory to the independence and sovereignty of Persia. But if Persia is to have, as I hope she will, the chance of working out her own constitutional problems, now so serious and difficult, in her own way; if, after years of mis-government and bad government, she is to come by constitutional means to a better form of government, to a better, stronger, and less corrupt administration, then I say that the chance of doing so without interference, her chance of working out these problems in her own way, has been greatly improved by the agreement between Russia and ourselves." I would beg my readers to note that this language is almost identical with the language used in the Spring-Rice despatch, to which I shall presently come. The same note was struck by Mr (now Lord) Morley, who wound up the debate on behalf of the Government of India after a speech delivered by myself. "It is quite true," he said, "that my hon friend the Member for Ripon has made a case in one or two details. But think what the change is! We now have got Persia herself, weak and rather distracted as she is by constitutional struggles, free from that squalid and mischievous rivalry, and you have these two great European Powers, no longer rivals—I had almost called them confederates—in the sterilization of anything like moral progress or material progress in Persia. That is the broad answer that I would make to all those detailed criticisms." Lord Morley's peroration was conceived in the same vein. "I think His Majesty's Government and the country have reason to congratulate themselves upon this arrangement being made, and the foreign Powers concerned, whether the Amir of Afghanistan or other potentates, may know that what we have undertaken will be faithfully observed and carried out"—Asiatic Quarterly Review.

News of the Week.

Reuter wires from Tangier on the 18th.—According to news from Fez the trouble there is not general. Several quarters of the town are in revolt against local measures and several Frenchmen have been killed.

The Ambassador is safe and reinforcements have arrived from Mequinez.

The total military casualties at Fez were 25 killed and 60 wounded. The papers contain terrible narratives of the savagery of the mob who paraded the streets carrying the horribly mutilated bodies of Europeans and heads held aloft on spears. Unbridled licence prevailed for three days. The Jews were particularly singled out and were barbarously ill-treated. Many were thrown from the house tops and girls violated. Four thousand Jews took refuge in the Palace. The French killed 800 of the rioters.

General Monier telegraphs on the 22nd that quiet has been restored at Fez but that the French losses were officers 15 killed and 4 wounded, and men 40 killed and 70 wounded. In addition 13 civilians were killed.

General Monier has dismissed the Pashas and will appoint Governors to replace them. A court martial will try the ringleaders, while the inhabitants of Fez will be disarmed. It is also possible that a war contribution will be levied as an indemnity to the families of the victims of the disorders.

News by the English Mail

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, March 31

It is announced that the Sultan signed the Protectorate Treaty at Fez on Saturday.

According to information received from Fez, a vigorous attack has been made on Sefru by discontented tribesmen and a column of 1,500 to 2,000 men has been ordered to advance to the relief of the besieged troops.

Paris, April 1.

The French Foreign Office has now received confirmation of the news that the Sultan of Morocco signed the treaty establishing a French protectorate on Saturday afternoon. It is semi-officially stated that the Treaty is on the lines of the Treaty of the Bardo with the Bey of Tunis. The French Minister, Mr. Regnault, who submitted the Treaty for signature, telegraphed at 5 o'clock the same day that it had been signed, but the Foreign Office only received the news yesterday afternoon.

The Treaty contains a reservation as to the future administration of Tangier and of the Spanish sphere, which has yet to be delimited. I am informed on the best French authority that the Sultan manifested very great reluctance to except Tangier and the future Spanish sphere from the exercise of his direct authority as defined and limited in the Protectorate Treaty. As regards a portion of the Spanish zone districts connected with Larache and Alcazar, it was urged that these were so-called Maghzen territory where the Sultan's authority had always been exercised.

M. Poincare, the French Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs, had, however, given most precise instructions to M. Regnault to reserve Tangier and the future Spanish sphere from the operation of the Treaty. This condition was regarded as essential, as regards Tangier in view of the express stipulation of the Franco-German Treaty that the régime in Tangier shall be international. The question, moreover, is one in which Great Britain is particularly concerned. As regards the Spanish sphere French Treaty obligations towards Spain as well as the Franco-Spanish negotiations now in progress precluded any arrangements with regard to these territories without Spain's consent.

It is now stated that France has renounced her demand for the cession of Cabo del Agua on the Mediterranean at the mouth of the Muluya river. On the other hand there seems to be some doubt as to whether she still insists upon detaching from the Spanish sphere certain districts north of the river Lakkos, near Alcazar. It is reported that France has withdrawn some of her demands with regard to Spanish territory in the south near Ifni. That territory does not constitute part of the Shereefian Empire. France, however, would like to have access to the sea in that region and not a mere belt of Hinterland such as Spain is understood to have offered.

A review of French and Shereefian troops was held at Fez last Thursday, and the French Minister, M. Regnault, warmly congratulated General Moimier upon the appearance of his men and upon their achievements in the field. Some 5,000 men were on parade. In front of the lines General Bailloud presented General Moimier with the cross of a Commander of the Legion of Honour.

On Saturday, after the signature of the Treaty, the Sultan gave a banquet in honour of M. Regnault, who proposed the toast of the Sultan's health and referred with satisfaction to the past and future co-operation of France with his Shereefian Majesty. The Sultan responded in similar terms.

Tangier, April 1

The calming influence of E. Mokri, the Grand Vizier, who reached Fez a few days before M. Regnault, the French Minister, and the latter's intimate knowledge of the Sultan's personality and his remarkable tact, seemed to have had a most desirable effect upon the spirits of Mulai Hafid and were not without influence in inducing him to regard with equanimity the French proposals.

Paris, April 1.

The absence of any form of shelter for merchandise and lighters at Casablanca, as reported in the Times of February 21, has led the authorities to decide on the construction of some shelter before the completion of the harbour works, in order to meet the more pressing needs of the merchants interested in the loading and discharging of cargo. Tenders were invited for the work, but British objections were offered to a technical error in the terms of the offer and the construction has been postponed. A deputation will leave for Tangier in a few days in order to urge the Foreign Representatives to find some solution as quickly as possible.

Paris, April 2.

A despatch from Fez of to-day's date says that the treaty establishing a French protectorate over Morocco declares that France and Morocco are in agreement as to the establishment of a new régime and proclaims freedom of religion. France is allowed for the maintenance of order, to enter into military occupation of points necessary for this purpose, after due notification to the Sultan. The treaty then proceeds to deal with the support to be given to the Sultan for the maintenance of his authority and defines the powers of the Resident General. It next provides for the diplomatic representation of Morocco by France and for the reorganization of the country's finances. Loans may not be made without the assent of the French Government.

President Fallières has sent a telegram to the Sultan assuring him of the support of France and congratulating him on the happy issue of the negotiations. — Reuter

Paris, April 2.

In French messages from Madrid attention is drawn to the importance of the visit of the Spanish Ambassador in London to Madrid, where he is to discuss with his Government the various aspects of the proposed internationalization of Tangier. According to the Journal des Débats France has communicated to Spain a draft proposal on the subject with which England is said to be in substantial agreement.

Paris, April 3

According to a semi-official summary of the Franco-Moroccan Treaty, signed at Fez last Saturday, which is issued this evening, the French Government and the Maghzen proclaim their intention of introducing in Morocco the reforms which France shall deem expedient. In the first place, the new régime is to safeguard the religious attributes of the Sultan and his traditional prestige, and will secure respect for existing religious institutions. The Maghzen is to be maintained and reformed. The rights of Spain and the special status of Tangier are questions that will be reserved. France is to be free to occupy such points as she may consider necessary in the interests of order and she will be entitled to exercise police powers throughout the country and in Moroccan waters.

France undertakes to lend the Sultan every assistance. Government measures are to be proposed by her and promulgated by the Sultan. France will be represented by a "Resident Commissary General," who will be invested with all the powers of a French Republic and will act as sole intermediary between the Maghzen and foreign Powers. He will approve and promulgate the Sultan's decrees. France will represent Moroccan subjects and interests abroad. The Sultan is pledged not to contract any foreign engagements or loans or grant any concessions without the assent of France. The two Governments reserve the question of financial organization.

Mulai Hafid appears to have received several French newspaper correspondents in audience at Fez on Sunday. The Sultan expressed to them, as he had already intimated to the French Minister, M. Regnault, his satisfaction at the prospect of co-operating with France, whose experience of the Musulman world would be of invaluable service. He expressed his pleasure at the promptitude with which the Protectorate negotiations had been concluded, thanks to M. Regnault's tact and skill. He felt sure that the country might look forward to a prosperous future.

Madrid, April 3

The prospects of a satisfactory termination of the Franco-Spanish negotiations have undoubtedly been greatly improved by the latest French proposals, which were communicated by the French Ambassador to the Spanish Foreign Minister last Saturday evening. These proposals have clearly made a favourable impression in Madrid and are regarded as "reasonable." Although this does not imply that Spain is prepared to accept them as they stand, it means that she is prepared to concede something like them, and that the negotiators, instead of being poles apart as they were a couple of weeks ago, are now within measurable distance of each other.

The Spanish Government, indeed, now seem anxious to press matters forward. Nothing, it is true, can be done for the next two or three days. Both the Prime Minister and the French Ambassador left Madrid last night for Seville, but the former returns here on Saturday, when a Cabinet Council will be held and the Spanish reply will be discussed. A further conference will, therefore, in all probability take place very shortly after the return of the Ambassador, who is expected here on Tuesday. Meanwhile the presence of Senor Villa Urrutia, the Spanish Ambassador in London, who arrives to-night, will afford the Government an opportunity of learning what views are held in England, especially with regard to the future status of Tangier—a question which excites the keenest interest here. The Spaniards, naturally, hold that, if everyone had his due, Tangier would be theirs, and, had this aspiration been realized, there can be no doubt that the course of the present negotiations would have been much swifter and smoother. Since, however, that may not be, much anxiety is manifested that the safeguards devised for the internationalization of the town may be thorough and effective.

Paris, April 4.

The text of the "treaty for instituting the régime of a French protectorate in Morocco" is published to-day. The clause reserving Spanish rights as well as the future position of Tangier runs:—

"The Government of the Republic will make arrangements (see concertation) with the Spanish Government on the subject of the interests which that Government derives from its geographical position and its territorial possessions on the Moroccan coast. The town of Tangier will likewise retain the special character which has been acknowledged to belong to it, and which will determine its municipal organization."

It would, perhaps, have been out of place to refer in a treaty with the Sultan to the Franco-Spanish Convention of 1904, but there can be no doubt that Spain regards her interests and rights in Morocco as being based quite as much upon the terms of that treaty as upon the facts of "her geographical position and her territorial possessions on the Moroccan coast."

One of the financial stipulations is to the effect that the Sultan undertakes "for the future not to contract, directly or indirectly, any public or private loan, or to grant, under any form whatever, any concession without the authorization of the French Government."

Article II gives the French Government a right to effect the military occupation of any part of Moroccan territory where it considers such occupation to be necessary for the maintenance of order and the security of commercial transactions. The only condition of such occupation is that France should previously have informed the Maghzen. The significance of the article is that it precludes the necessity of asking the Sultan or the Maghzen each time that France is under the necessity of extending the area of her military occupation of Morocco.

With regard to the details of the territorial compensation proposals in Morocco, as they now present themselves to the Spanish and French negotiators in Madrid, it may be inferred from various accounts of their tenor that France has tacitly abandoned her claim both to Cabo del Agua, at the mouth of the Muluya River, and to the Beni Bu Yahi territory, on the left bank. Spain may succeed in securing both banks of the Lakkos River between Alcazar and Larache, and there is a prospect of mutual concessions in the Wergha Valley and in the southern Spanish sphere.

News of the Week.

A TELEGRAM from Constantinople on the 18th states that the Italian fleet has entered the Dardanelles and that an Italian vessel has been sunk.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 18th.—It is positively denied that an Italian warship was damaged in yesterday's demonstration in the Dardanelles.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on the 18th.—It is officially stated that the Italian warships fired projectiles into the forts of the Dardanelles and the barracks of Sedilbahr, Orhanieh and Kumkaleh, which were slightly damaged. The Orhanieh fort replied and damaged an Italian vessel, which caught fire and drew off. The Italians subsequently put to sea. Prior to their arrival in the Dardanelles, the Italians bombarded Samos, Mitylene and Rhodes. The fleet comprised altogether 39 ships. The bombardment was simultaneous with the opening of the Parliament, at which the Sultan made a speech in which he said:—"We desire peace, but only on condition that Turkey's sovereign rights are maintained."

The New York Herald of 24th March has the following:—Owing to the presence of floating mines in the Dardanelles, the Hamburg-American Line's steamer Cincinnati carrying four hundred Americans on a tour of the world, has cancelled its visit to Constantinople. The passage of the Straits by vessels of large dimensions entails great danger from such an explosion as occurred yesterday.

Other steamers of the Hamburg-American Line have received orders to avoid the Dardanelles.

A letter to the paper of 19th March from Constantinople runs as follows:—I left Beirut on the 9th instant by the Khedivial Line through to the Turkish capital under some difficulties. Sixty tourists had cancelled their bookings by the vessel and only six first-class passengers left Beirut. The city of Beirut has been under martial law since the bombardment.

Our course took us past the island of Patmos and we anchored off the island of Rhodes, where one passenger ventured to embark for a trip through the war zone. At the entrance to Smyrna harbour a harmless kind of a fort is located, and two antediluvian ships are stationed, so that on the approach of an enemy they may be sunk, thus blocking the channel. Smyrna was much perturbed over rumours of an attack.

The lights along the Dardanelles are out at night, and the Straits are virtually hermetically sealed except for daynight shipping. A Turkish torpedo boat led the way for some distance through the heavily mined waters, delaying our ship many hours. Sixty thousand armed Turks line the Dardanelles at strategic points where so-called forts are located. The entire Turkish fleet of six ships is on watch near the entrance to the Sea of Marmora.

Turkey notifies that she has released the chain of floating mines. Consequently the navigation of the Dardanelles is closed.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 19th.—It is stated here that the Italian fleet did not intend to attack or force the Dardanelles nor to land troops.

The fleet merely hoped to induce the Turkish fleet to come out and fight. Eventually, after two hours' cannonade with the forts, the fleet steered off, having meanwhile cut several submarine cables.

Lloyd's and the Baltic Exchange are uneasy at the closing of the Dardanelles. All chartering for the Black Sea is at a standstill and there are 150 steamers on the other side of the Bosphorus.

In the House of Commons, Mr. Acland said the Government fully appreciated the seriousness of closing the Dardanelles to British shipping. He would immediately endeavour to obtain information whether the mines were adrift in the open sea.

Reuter is informed that the Italian squadron is returning to Italy, having accomplished its object. The Italian papers suggest that it was intended to force the Turks to close the Dardanelles.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on the 19th.—Italian war vessels have seized a yacht belonging to the Khedive off the coast of Asia Minor opposite to Rhodes.

News-papers declare that Turkey will never be intimidated by action such as the bombardment of the Dardanelles, which is merely a proof of the weakness and failure of Italian efforts in Tripoli.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 19th.—An official statement says that the fleet cut the cables between Asia Minor and the Turkish Archipelago and sunk a Turkish gunboat.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on the 19th.—It is reported that in view of prejudice to shipping Government has decided to re-open the Dardanelles.

Reuter wires from St. Petersburg on the 19th:—Russia will protest against the closing of the Dardanelles as contrary to international agreements.

Reuter wires from St. Petersburg on the 22nd:—The closing of the Dardanelles has caused uneasiness in Southern Russia among grain merchants, who are appealing to the Premier to demand the re-opening of the waters. They say that otherwise the heaviest losses will be incurred.

The Porte will reply to-day to the communication of the Ambassadors of the 16th instant regarding mediation in the war. The reply will reassert the impossibility of Turkey negotiating unless the Sultan's sovereignty over Tripoli be recognised.

In the House of Commons Mr. Acland stated that at present there was no blockade of the Dardanelles. Britain had communicated with Turkey expressing the hope that the Straits would soon be opened again in view of injury to shipping. Government believed that Turkey was fully alive to the importance of the matter.

Though the Porte has contemplated the reopening of the Dardanelles the Commander of the Forts has refused to undertake the responsibility in view of the continued presence of the Italians in the Archipelago.

A large number of ships laden with grain are in the meantime held up in the harbour and Bosphorus, presenting an unprecedented sight. The underwriters at Lloyd's are uneasy and chartering for enormous trade from the Black Sea is at a standstill. London and Baltic shipowners are discussing cancellation of contracts.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 22nd.—The Italians have occupied the Island of St. Anapalia in the Aegean Sea and have established a revictualling base. The position of the island is most suitable for the repression of contraband.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 22nd.—A telegram from Cairo states that Enver Bey died yesterday morning at Marut from wounds received in the recent fighting. It appears that the Turks are seeking to conceal the death of Enver Bey until the end of the war. In the meantime they announce that the Sultan has created Enver Bey a Pasha and has recalled him to Constantinople to recuperate. Aziz Bey will replace him for the time being pending the arrival of Eyubsalin Bey, who will take the chief command. (This was a false rumour. See page 367.)

The Madras Presidency Moslem League has telegraphed to the Grand Vizier at Constantinople stating that Indian Mussalmans are entirely against abandoning any rights in Tripoli. The League also congratulates the Right Hon. Syed Ameer Ali on the graceful recognition by the Sultan of Turkey of his valuable services to Islam and to humanity, especially those in organising and despatching a medical mission to the seat of war in Tripoli for succour to wounded Mussalmans.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on the 23rd.—The Porte's reply to the Powers is couched in moderate language. It expresses thanks for the offers of mediation, which it accepts conditionally on the maintenance of the effective, integral sovereign rights of Turkey and the Italian evacuation of Tripolitania. Any other solution, the Porte says, is impossible without disturbing the whole Empire. The Note concludes that Turkey is prepared to grant Italy economic concessions in Tripoli.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 24th.—The Italians lost seven killed and seventy wounded in repulsing attacks on the 23rd instant on the new positions on Macabez Peninsula.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on the 24th.—A friendly Russian Note points out that the immediate danger in the Dardanelles is removed, and recommends re-opening. It is believed that the Turkish ministers to-morrow will decide to remove the mines.

A message from Reuter's correspondent at Cairo says nothing is known there to corroborate the Italian report of the death of Enver Bey.

At a meeting of Muhammadans held at Medical College Street the following resolution was passed:—That telegrams be sent to Sir Edward Grey, H. E. the Viceroy, and the Home Secretary, Government of India, protesting against the extension of Italian hostilities to the very mouth of the Dardanelles in spite of the assurances of the Powers to limit military operations to Tripoli; and as British subjects respectfully pointing out to His Majesty's Government the deplorable consequences of destroying faith in the words of great Powers (including England) by flagrant breach of promise.

Berlin, March 31.

Now that the Venice meeting is over the German semi-official Press condemns as efforts to sow dissension in the Triple Alliance.

all suggestions that a meeting between the German Emperor and the King of Italy might have important consequences as regards the Turco-Italian War. The articles in the Italian Press before and at the time of the meeting are forgotten, and the North German Gazette, relying on an article which has been put into the Popolo Romano, says that the supposed "disappointment" of the Italian Press at the fruitlessness of the meeting is a fable. These petty Press operations are all in the day's work, but as I have pointed out before, there was no reason to suppose that the Emperor William, when he left Berlin, had solved in an Italian sense the problem created by his ambiguous relations with Italy and Turkey. What would be interesting to know, on the other hand, is what message the Emperor carried concerning a possible extension by Italy of the sphere of military operations. It is reasonable to suppose that His Majesty deprecated any such extension of the sphere of operations. When, a fortnight ago, it was proposed that the Emperor should postpone or abandon his visit to Corfu, the German domestic crisis may have been sufficient reason for such a change of plans, but it appears that His Majesty was at the same time advised of the complications which might arise from his residence in the very heart of the troubled area.

After its reference to the Venice meeting, the North German Gazette makes the following careful reference to the present state of the deliberations of the Powers:

As regards the peace mediation it seems, according to newspaper reports which have remained uncontradicted, that although nothing may yet have been done officially in this sense, a parallel action of the five Great Powers in Constantinople is being prepared after the manner of the démarché which they undertook in Rome. The question then would be whether the five Powers consider it appropriate to put a question to Turkey as well as to Italy in a friendly but official form concerning her peace conditions.

Rome, April 1

Yesterday, at Tobruk, the enemy, numbering 3,000, attacked a new fort, but were repulsed with loss by the Italian artillery.

The Turkish report that Derna is suffering from lack of water owing to the cutting of an aqueduct by the Ottoman troops is denied by the Ministerial Tribuna. An attempt to divert the water was frustrated by the Italians.

Constantinople, April 1.

Some anxiety has been caused among the timorous in Constantinople during the last few days by the action of the authorities, who are making preparations both against fire and for the rapid conversion of the schools and other public buildings into hospitals and first-aid stations, and who have issued confidential instructions to all the local doctors and surgeons who are Ottoman subjects. However, there is every reason to believe that these are merely precautionary measures against an Italian naval attack, and are in no way connected with the elections, which will probably be held in a week's time.

Rome, April 2

A message from Tripoli of today's date states that last night a band of about 100 Arabs fired at long range on the Ain Zara Fort without effecting any damage. By means of searchlights, the Italians located the position of the enemy and a few shots by the artillery quickly dispersed them.

Another message, from Tobruk, reports that some bodies of Turks and Arabs yesterday again made several attempts by a harassing fire to put a stop to the work on the new fort but were on each occasion driven off by the artillery and rifle fire of the troops covering the working parties.—(Reuter)

"The Ottoman Embassy in London is requested by Neschet Bey, Commander of the Turkish Forces in Tripoli, to convey to the British Press and public his gratitude for their generous donations, which, accompanied by the marks of sympathy manifested by them towards the suffering Arabs in Tripoli, have gone a long way towards relieving the distress caused among the population by the war."

Rome, April 4.

Particulars of a slight engagement between Italian troops and a number of Beduin are given in the following telegram: of yesterday's date from Bengal:—

"While defence works were being thrown up facing the oasis of Suni Osman, some bands of Beduin tried to interrupt the work. In order to put an end to these tactics, a battalion of infantry was sent this morning to patrol the oasis supported against attack by another infantry battalion and a field battery. The Beduin advanced towards the oasis and fired on our troops without causing any loss, but they were immediately repulsed.

"About 10 o'clock one of our battleships opened fire on Coeffia, which is a well-known rallying point for the Turco-Arab forces. Coeffia is situated about five miles from Suni Osman oasis. Following on this bombardment, there was, about 1 o'clock, an extensive movement of Turkish and Arab troops from Coeffia and Sidi Muffer, the men advancing towards the oasis. Our infantry, however, supported by the field battery and the fort artillery, checked the advance immediately, and forced the enemy to take to flight. The work on the defences was thus able to proceed without interruption. We lost one man killed and one wounded, whereas the enemy had about 100 casualties."—(Reuter.)

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

The Temps correspondent with the left wing of the Turco-Arab Forces transmits a brief message saying, that two Italian dirigibles dropped six bombs, of which only one exploded. The remainder were picked up by the Arabs and photographed.

The Arabs continue to attack the Italian lines in small groups, and return bringing back war material of various kinds. On March 8th they even succeeded in penetrating into Ain Zara and set fire to two large buildings—the sole remaining there,—of which one was a dépôt and the other had been formerly used by the Turks as a hospital. The correspondent is of the opinion that the hot season which is now due will prevent all action by the Italians.

The Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung, whose knowledge of Turkish affairs is unrivalled, reviews the electoral situation in an article which is interesting both from the view it takes of the contending parties, and for the general optimism with which it regards the chances of Parliamentary government in Turkey. "The party of Union and Progress," he says, "which regards itself with some justification as the founder of the new political organisation of life, has in the course of the last Parliament kept a firm hold on the reins of power. Sometimes it would succumb to the fierce attack of the Opposition, and sometimes it would itself undertake a cleansing operation among its members. That was natural. It was only by the gradual separation of chaff from the wheat, and through the fire of the party discipline that it could at all attain the consciousness of its own worth. It has passed during the four years on which Turkish Parliamentary government now looks back through some exceedingly difficult situations which have severely tried its power and existence. Both domestic and foreign policy have played it some nasty tricks, and have seemed more than once to counteract with its success its endeavours to create a united Ottoman fatherland. These have been for the party years of serious test, from which it now emerges from the electoral campaign hardened and steeled.

"Nothing even approximating this can be said of the parties of the Opposition. One misses here entirely anything resembling a programme. The decentralisation of the Administration, and, together with this, the creation of a sort of Federal State, only serve in the hands of these parties as a bait to catch adherents. There has never been any serious intention on the part of the leaders of these parties to carry out the promises they make. The lack of sincerity which pervades their words could only deceive a few Nationalist hotspurs, while producing in the more serious elements of the Opposition a contrary effect. Both the Liberty and Concord party and the minor groups are utterly bereft of conscientious leaders and faithful followers. Besides, the Opposition has never possessed any organisation. It has latterly devoted most of its strength to personal squabbles, which indeed filled the last two sessions of the Chamber. In the course of the electoral campaign it has lost rather than gained in the matter of organisation. The resignation of Damad Ferid Pasha, the Sultan's son-in-law, from the leadership of the Liberty and Concord party has been a specially hard blow to it. This meant the loss of the most brilliant name on its list. The party also showed a complete misconception of the situation when it tried to exploit for its party purposes the war in Tripoli. This cost its parties some adherents.

"On the other hand, the Committee party, enjoying the support of the Government, well understood how to make use of the situation in order to extend its organisation to the most distant corners of the Empire. From the point of view of impartiality this action of the Government cannot of course be justified, nor can one justify the strengthening of the press law and the arrest of a few hot spurs of the Opposition. The Government and the Committee party, however, declare that, in view of the need for securing the orderly development of government and for counteracting the centrifugal tendencies of the Opposition, the use of the power possessed by them is a matter of urgency and a high patriotic duty."

Although no Cabinet changes are at all probable till Parliament has met, there is reason to believe that some of the leading members of the Committee are inclined to criticise Said Pasha's long absence from the Porte, which has now lasted over two months; though the Grand Vizier frequently presides over Ministerial Councils which are held at his house.

The Jeune Turc learns that the Grand Vizier, following the advice of his doctors, intends making a cure at Carlsbad.

His Excellency the Turkish Ambassador His Highness Tewfik Pasha had the honour of being invited to luncheon with the King and Queen on 2nd April.

Sabkha, March 30.

THE days pass, and the Italian imbroglio still hangs its weary way, an incubus disorganising trade and the nervous system of those living in Turkish seaports. The Italian Government wantonly and gaily rushed their country into a reckless act of spoliation and brigandage, an act in every way contrary to the accepted law of nations and to twentieth-century ideas of civilisation. And with what result? What have their fleet and army really done during all these months? The latter, merely fringing the African coast, is hardly able to hold its own; the former, moving about in an aimless manner, has destroyed two small Turkish gunboats and interfered with a few merchant ships belonging to friendly Powers, while its rulers, ostentatiously rolling up their sleeves, proclaim loudly what they are going to do when once they make a start. Meanwhile, the Italian Government behind the scenes are urging the other Powers to interfere, and to bring pressure to bear on the aggrieved Turk to make peace by accepting all their iniquitous demands. One may be anti or philo-Turk, an adversary or a friend, but there should be a certain amount of justice guiding the conduct of the life of nations as well as of men. In the Italian case what has been done may be in accord with diplomatic rules, but morally it is downright robbery and brigandage. And who are the real sufferers? Mainly the Italians in the mother country, mourning their long list of dead, and their fellow countrymen in Turkey, whose homes are being broken up, and who are being driven forth with their wives and little ones to make a fresh start in life elsewhere. The next to suffer are the other Europeans living in Turkey, whose business is paralysed by the general upset of all commercial affairs. For who dare venture on anything with this bogey of mined waters, blockade, bombardment, etc. continually in mind?

Tak, for instance, this present week, with the imminence of bombardment or of an unknown danger weighing upon us, and our authorities evidently expecting something to happen, since they called out all the firemen, with their pumps, and have kept them on duty day and night in case of an emergency. That emergency might be the getting out of hand of the native element, with consequent rioting and incendiarism. The German and French Consuls speak of a bombardment as a certainty, and the former, as protector of Italian subjects, has arranged with them that when it begins they shall all take refuge in the German club, while the latter has warned French subjects to prepare themselves by laying in provisions, etc., lest for some days they may not be able to get about freely and may have to remain in their houses. It is said the German Consul officially informed our Governor-General of the arrangements he had made, and was then asked by this latter whether it was thereby meant to imply that he was incapable of maintaining order in the town. The Consul, of course, repudiated any such insinuation, but explained that it had been deemed prudent to arrange with the Italians some common line of action should a necessity arise.

And while all this uneasiness and unrest is caused from without, the interior situation is no less unsettling. Some few weeks ago massacres in Langaza, two or three hours' distance by carriage from this town, made such a sensation that the authorities had to appoint a commission of inquiry, which, however, never threw any public light on the question. Next some Parliamentary deputies took the matter up, and went to Langaza, with like result. Last of all, our big Reform Commission visited the place with the same object, but they never got to the bottom of that well in which Truth is said to be found. At any rate, nobody was ever brought to trial, and the matter dropped. Now again Langaza is to the fore, and at least some dozen people have been killed and many—including gendarmes—have been wounded in a riot over the elections. Our Governor-General, motored over post haste to restore order and to hold an inquiry, but the true why and wherefore of the riot will never be known outside official circles. Whether the instigators were the Union and Progress Committee or the Opposition will remain a mystery, and it is very doubtful that anyone will ever be brought to trial, although our local papers are again loudly calling for justice. One thing is sure: except to the Union and Progress Party, the manner in which the elections are being carried out is causing great dissatisfaction here and everywhere.

Our Reform Commissioners have at last reached Scutari, in Albania, after it had proved necessary three times to clear the road before them with troops and artillery and to subsidise some of the tribes further to protect the route. Perhaps the return journey will be made in a more triumphant fashion.

On April 1st Mr. Mark Sykes asked the Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether certain contact mines in the Dardanelles had exploded; whether any had broken adrift; whether the pilots appointed to take ships through the Straits could guarantee the safety of the course; and whether the British Consular authorities could guarantee the reliability of the pilots.

Mr. Montagu, Under-Secretary for India, who replied, said:—His Majesty's Vice-Consul at the Dardanelles had reported that several mines had recently exploded. It was uncertain whether they were contact or observation mines. No damage had been done by the explosions, which were all on the side furthest from the channel left for shipping. He had no information that any mines had broken adrift, or that the buoyed channel left clear for shipping was unsafe, or that the pilot ships which were provided by the Ottoman Government were unreliable.

Odessa, March 31.

M. Tcharykoff is expected here within the next few days from Constantinople, en route for St. Petersburg. The metropolitan correspondent of the Odeski Listok, who is usually well informed on diplomatic movements, affirms that the so-called disgrace of M. Tcharykoff has been greatly exaggerated, and that he will later receive another diplomatic appointment, but one of lesser importance than the Pera Embassy. Another local journal yesterday stated that M. Tcharykoff sought permission to wait upon the Tsar at Livadia before returning to St. Petersburg, but the request was not acceded to.

M. de Giers, the newly-appointed Russian Ambassador to the Porte, is a son of a former Minister for Foreign Affairs. He is fifty-six years of age. After graduating in jurisprudence at the St. Petersburg University he joined the army as a volunteer. He went through the Russo-Turkish campaign, and was subsequently decorated for distinguished bravery. He was afterwards attached to the Foreign Ministry, and on several occasions was entrusted with special and confidential missions. He was successively attached, in a secretarial capacity, to the Russian Legations in the Brazil, the Argentine, and China, he was in Peking during the Boxer Revolt. Later, M. de Giers was appointed Russian Minister to Munich and subsequently to Bucharest, where he remained until his recent transfer to Constantinople.

Constantinople, April 2 (delayed by Censor)

The question of the concentration of Russian troops on the Caucasian frontier may now be regarded as completely cleared up. The causes of the concentration were neither of a general nature nor did they stand in any relation to the plan for mediation in the Turco-Italian war. They were of a purely local character, being the nature of a demonstration against, first, the tactless attitude of certain Turkish agents in the contested zone between Persia and Turkey, and secondly, against the increase, which was not considered as justified, of the Turkish troops posted in localities situated beyond the contested zone, i.e., in Urumia, Hoy, Saou, and Shiplak.

The Acting Minister of the Interior and Minister of Posts and Telegraphs, Talaat Bey, with whom I had a long interview to-day, furnished me with several interesting particulars—

"We are not putting forward claims of any kind in connection with Urumia, Hoy, Saou, and Shiplak," he said, "but in view of the urgent requests of our Consuls, who complained of their extreme insecurity, we sent out a force of twenty-five soldiers to each Consulate. This number was afterwards increased to about eighty men. General Djibir Pasha is now about to leave on a tour of inspection."

"We are willing to diminish the number of our Consular Guards, and even to withdraw them altogether, if the safety of our Consuls and our protégés is assured. As for the contested zone itself, our occupation of it dates back four or five years. A discussion concerning it is about to be opened with Persian Commissioners, and we expect that an agreement will be reached. If this proves to be impracticable, we shall submit the question to The Hague Tribunal for decision."

"It would appear that certain Turkish agents in this zone, urged on by excessive zeal, have established themselves in certain points of the territory which are unquestionably Persian. In addition to this having misunderstood the instructions sent to them, they have made arrangements for taking a census in these districts and for carrying out electoral operations. To counteract this, I have just despatched a Judiciary Inspector, Ali Seyyidi, for the purpose of examining into the matter, and dismissing at once all the Turkish agents found guilty of having acted in this way."

"It follows, of course, that the arrangements for the census and the elections must be restricted to those districts on the frontier which are recognized to be Turkish."

"In these circumstances," concluded the Minister, "I earnestly hope that all misunderstanding with Russia may be explained away, for we have no desire to raise useless differences with our neighbour."

These statements by Talaat Bey are in entire agreement with my own information, according to which M. Sazonoff, the Russian Foreign Minister, has on several occasions emphatically intimated to the Turkish Ambassador at St. Petersburg, Turkhan Pasha, the increasing displeasure caused in Russia by the tactlessness of certain Ottoman agents on the Persian frontier.

(FROM THE "NEAR EAST.")

In the absence of any apparent consequences of the meeting of the German Emperor with King Victor Emmanuel in regard to the course of the Turco-Italian War, the Italian people seem have acquiesced in the abandonment of the hopes previously formed of diplomatic interference. Fresh exhortations are being addressed to the Government by the Press to conduct the war with energy to a decisive finish, and the impression is gaining ground that developments may shortly be expected in the military operations. If the Italian Government can, once persuade itself that the task before it in Tripoli may take years to achieve, it is evident that there will have to be a re-casting of the plan of campaign. One of the first steps contemplated is understood to be the fortification, in the place of Tobruk, of the Gulf of Bomba, lying farther to the East, and superior to Tobruk in strategic value. Not only would the new port serve as an additional point from which the conquest of the interior could be undertaken, but it would prove a valuable base for naval operations in the Aegean and Eastern Mediterranean. There is good anchorage in the bay, which is protected by islands, while the land is abundantly supplied with drinking water, which Tobruk lacks almost entirely. Transports loaded with coal, provisions, and ammunition are said to have been recently concentrated in the Gulf, and the actual occupation of the position may take place at any moment. Meanwhile the building in the occupied territory of fresh forts, which are generally the objects of attacks by the Turkish and Arab forces, continues. This method of enforcing the annexation is necessarily slow, and in the case of a somewhat costly war, particularly exasperating to the temper of the nation. It is, however, the soundest policy, and, however tempting it may be to the Italians to supplement the operations in Tripoli by some cheaply gained success in the Aegean Sea, we trust that they will avoid a course calculated to inflict the minimum damage on Turkey while causing the maximum anxiety to the Powers.

The prolongation of the war between Italy and Turkey causes increasing importance to attach to the attitude of the Senussi towards the invasion of Tripoli. This people is scattered over practically the whole of Northern Africa, but Tripoli is especially their stronghold, and the maintenance of Benghazi and Tobruk, in Barca, as free ports for the traffic in slaves and munitions of war has hitherto been regarded as essential to their independent existence. Turkish relations with the Senussi have been considerably strengthened since 1910, when a Resident was installed at Kufra, the headquarters of the Sheikh El Senussi, and the latter's cousin was subsequently appointed as Governor of Jarabub, the sacred city of the sect. The Sheikh has recently received from the Sultan a Turkish Order and a jewelled sword, gifts that were evidently intended to induce him to take up arms. So far, however, he has failed to organise a general movement of the Senussi, and he is now credited with a definite resolve not to take this step. At the same time he offers no objection to members of the sect taking the field against the Italians. If reports are to be believed, there is little chance of a "holy war" being proclaimed under the Sheikh El Senussi so long as his present capital, which is distant some forty days' journey from the actual theatre of hostilities, is not threatened by the Italians. On the other hand, the effect of the closing of the Barca ports has yet to make itself more clearly felt among this people, and when that stage has been reached it is possible that the independent action of the Senussi forces in their effort to reopen their illicit traffic may prove almost as embarrassing to the Italians as a holy war. Already, it is stated, the Arab forces now bearing the brunt of the struggle against the invaders have introduced a system of rotation for the men engaged in hostilities, in order that the crops of the various tribes may not suffer while the war is prosecuted without interruption. In respect of food, the Turkish and Arab forces are said to be well supplied, but it is believed that there is some lack of ammunition, for which they have to rely largely upon successful smuggling on the coast of Cyrenaica. This question of ammunition may ultimately prove an important factor in the Tripoli operations. The Turkish forces actually in the field are relatively insignificant in numbers, for the Ottoman Government is making the feeblest use of Arab hostility to the Italian invasion. If munitions of war fail, and the Porte is unable to provide any fresh supply on an adequate scale, the Arabs may be induced to take a different view of Italian pretensions.

WE ARE told all good Americans go to Paris when they die, and not a few of them, as we all know, visit Rome ere they depart this life. One of them—a very live one indeed, evidently—has lately written from the latter city to the Editor of the New York Herald, explaining, succinctly and forcibly, "Why Turkey Should Be Parcellled Out." As an essay on the gentle art of apportioning the property of others this lucubration is distinctly interesting.

"Who, beside England," this egregious individual asks, "is benefited by the territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire?" And he proceeds to answer his own query in his own way, and doubtless to his own great satisfaction, showing, incidentally, how blind the Powers have been heretofore to their own interests. Russia, for instance, "kept from the sea by Turkish territory both in Europe and Asia"; Austria "has Macedonia and Albania on her southern borders to fall under her rule and give her a magnificent and unrestricted seaboard; Germany "can only hope to secure a Mediterranean naval base or a Mediterranean colony out of Turkish territory in Syria or Arabia"; and the appearance of Russia as a Mediterranean naval Power would greatly strengthen the position of France, where her greatest interests are—in the Mediterranean Sea." In fine, "France and Russia on the one hand, and the Triple Alliance on the other, would balance things on the Mediterranean most completely, if they carried out the partition of Turkey outlined above." How simple these little international problems are, to be sure, when once they are grappled with by such a massy intellect as that of "An American!"

There is nothing ill considered about the project, be it noted "An American" is not one of those people who rush into print with ill-digested proposals, he has studied his facts carefully and provided for all details. "Russia can find her road to the sea across Mesopotamia, south of Asia Minor, from the Caucasus, Central Asia, and Northern Persia"; and "The Peninsula of Arabia, Syria, Mesopotamia, the Sea coast, and Yemen would give Germany a colonial field sufficient to occupy her for a hundred years, and occupy her with great profit." Note here the precision and meticulous care of the born diplomat! In case Russia should by any chance fail to "find her way to the sea across Mesopotamia" when it became a field of German colonial enterprise, she has a wide road left open to her through Northern Persia and Central Asia, being thus enabled to reach either the Yellow Sea or the Indian Ocean, as she may prefer. And again, though we are not quite sure whether both shores of the Red Sea are to go to Germany, there can be no shadow of doubt that the Yemen is to do so, since it certainly lies within "the peninsula of Arabia." Nor can there be any question that Tripoli, "with the war at an end," is to go to Italy, or that Austria Hungary is to have Macedonia, with Epirus, Albania, and Novi Bazar. For these things are made quite clear by "An American."

The author of this magnificent scheme for dismembering the Ottoman Empire—and, presumably, for extinguishing the Balkan States simultaneously—has not entirely forgotten this country, though his consideration of our interests is certainly exiguous. For this we are thankful. With Austria, Russia, France, and Germany amicably settled round the shores of the Mediterranean—and guarding the route to India and Australia—England might still feel satisfied that all was for the best. Or as he prefers to put it: "With all the countries contiguous to Europe's great inland sea under the control and guidance of European civilisation and commerce—who but England would not be the gainer? And would England lose so much really?" Finally, he has even—mirabile dictu!—remembered the Turks, who, he suggests, might be left in possession of Constantinople and Anatolia, "the latter their native land (an), to govern as best they can under the guidance of the Powers. Then Constantinople would not serve to create envy among the Powers." This is thoughtful, if a trifle inconsequential. Unfortunately, we are not told how many square yards of Turkish territory west of the Bosphorus is to be left to the Turks. "An American" should hasten to repair the omission.

طلمس ہوش ربا ایک مشہور کتاب ہے جس میں عجیب و غریب افسانے مذکور ہیں۔ ایک زمانہ میں اس کتاب کا بہت پرجا تھا۔ ناظرین اُن افسانوں کو پڑھ کر محو حیرت رہ جاتے تھے اور بے ساختہ اس کے مصنف کو داد دیتے تھے کہ وہ کیا باتیں دماغ سے نکالی ہیں! مگر یہ تو فقط افسانے ہی تھے اب اصلی چیز ملاحظہ کیجئے۔ زونونوں رکارت پر صدمہ بجائے ۲۰ سالوں کے ۶ چھ گالے چھاپے ہیں اور چھپوں گالے حسب معمول صرف عمار می روپیہ میں اذرعین۔

ایک زونونوں رکارت پر مشہور گوئیوں کے مقبول گالے اور ۶ چھ گالے اور قیمت صرف عمار روپیہ۔ ہمارے قارئین ان بیچنی کے ساتھ ان طلسمی رکارتوں کے منتظر تھے اور ہمارے ایجنٹ تقاضے پر تقاضا کر رہے تھے۔ اب آپ کی ضیافت طبع کے واسطے یہ حاضر ہیں۔ ان گالوں کی بھد مانگ ہے اسلئے فوراً خرید فرمائیے۔

اس صلیب کے اردو رکارتوں کی فہرست ضمیمہ گزشتہ گالوں سے لیا ہے۔ کون نہیں جانتا کہ محمدی جان - محمد حسین - جالکی ہائی - اپنے اپنے انداز میں مقبول خاص رعام ہیں۔ مگر قاری عبدالباقی صاحب ایک مقدم ہزرگ میں جنہوں نے بڑے ذوق و شوق کی کیفیت میں حضرت غوث الاعظم مدد القادر گھلانی علیہ الرحمۃ کی شان میں ۲۰ غزلین لائیں ہیں۔ ان کے سلف سے قلب پر برا اثر پڑتا ہے۔ بنارس کی گندھارلوں کے گالے تو ایسے پختہ مرنے میں کہ ان کی تعریف لکھنے کی ضرورت ہی نہیں۔ طلسمی رکارت کو ضرور سنلیکا درلہ آپ کو حیرت میں دھکیں۔

The Week.

Home Rule.

MR. CHURCHILL in moving the second reading of the Home Rule Bill said that Home Rule had never been a separatist movement. The present demand was moderate and reasonable. Never before had so little been asked but never before had so many asked for that little. There was not even a demand for Colonial autonomy. He denied that there were any naval or military risks involved. Assuming a complete divergence of views in the event of a war, the Irish Parliament would not be able to add to our military risks. But he denied the likelihood of such divergence as the Bill would remove every ground for quarrel. Identity of interests would then be absolute and anything that would ruin England would mean ruin to Ireland. The gain to the Empire would be of the greatest and risk to Great Britain would be of the smallest.

Mr. Churchill made a strong appeal to Ulster for co-operation. He admitted that Ulster was a serious obstacle to a thoroughly satisfactory settlement. Every citizen was entitled to resist oppression, provided that circumstances were sufficient but here there was no oppression. It would be a great disaster to Ireland if the Protestants in the north held aloof from the national Parliament. Ulster had her duties as well as her rights.

Mr. Churchill continued. The Protestants of the North had a plain duty to their co-religionists in the rest of Ireland and to the self governing Dominions. Nobody could measure the blessings to Ulstermen of the opportunity of conferring with their countrymen or the fame and honour they would reap if they led united Ireland home. "It is their duty to bring the ship safely into port but if they refuse they shall not obstruct the work of salvage."

Mr. Long said the Unionists were not prepared to desert their Ulster friends and advise them to accept the Bill which will bring not peace but war. There was bitter war in every clause. As regards national defence the Government were not entitled even for the final settlement to incur risks which were indubitably involved. The financial provisions, Mr. Long declared, were unsound and dishonest. The greatest imposture of all was the pretence that the Bill would help towards federalism. The Bill would make federalism ten times more difficult. The Opposition were united and determined not to desert their friends in Ireland and to defend interests common to both.

Resuming the Home Rule debate Sir Robert Finlay warned Government that to persist in the Bill would mean Civil War. Government regarded this as Parliamentary tactics but would find themselves face to face with grim realities.

Colonel Seely said that unless it was assumed that the Nationalist leaders was acting a lie, the House must admit the impossibility of religious persecution or injustice. The question was whether the Nationalist leaders could be trusted. The Opposition had refused to trust the Boer leaders and had prevented the grant of Home Rule to the Transvaal being the gift of the Nation, instead of Party. Were they going to be so mad as to repeat the error? He believed that the Irish people would work the Bill honourably and thus make Ireland the greatest bulwark of British-Irish liberties.

Mr. O'Brien said that the Nationalists had no arrière pensée when they stated that it would be their aim to work the Bill if it became law, for the peace, happiness and greatness of Britain as well as Ireland. He criticised the financial provisions as based on mysterious economics to be made by the Irish Government but which were not practicable.

Indians in Africa.

IN THE House of Commons, Mr. Montagu announced that Germany had not yet made any proposals regarding the importation of Indian labourers into Damaraland. Unless such a request were received, it would be premature to discuss details, but speaking generally Lord Crewe was not disposed to encourage any new scheme of indentured emigration from India to places outside the British Empire. Indentured emigration to Damaraland was unlawful and could not become lawful unless the Governor-General of India in Council was satisfied that the country made such laws and provisions as were thought sufficient for the protection of emigrants. In any event, no steps could be taken without an Anglo-German Convention making full provision for the emigrants' welfare.

In the Reichstag during the debate on the Colonial estimates General Liebert, Imperial Party, said that the influence of Indian merchants in East Africa was a serious matter. The English Government which itself took measures against Indian immigration could not complain if Germany did likewise.

Reuter wires from Capetown on the 1st.—The "Black Peril" outcry has been revived with intensity, especially in Johannesburg and Natal, where a number of outrages on white women are reported.

In a debate in the Senate Mr. Munnik (Transvaal) moved a resolution advocating that the minimum penalty for such outrages should be hanging.

Colonel Standford advocated the settling of the Kaffir families in locations and the establishment of a Native Police.

Mr. Hertzog deprecated yielding to sensationalism. He believed that the establishment of locations would be most effective.

Mr. Schreiner, ex-Premier, emphasises the necessity for keeping the natives in compounds.

Mr. Munnik's resolution was subsequently withdrawn.

China.

Information from reliable sources on the Tibetan border has now been received in Simla on the subject of the situation at Lhasa where fighting of a very severe order between Chinese and Tibetans continues. It appears that the Tibetans had lost in all some nine hundred killed and the Chinese three hundred killed. There are now about a thousand Chinese troops in the south of Lhasa, surrounded by a large force of Tibetans who occupy the northern portion of the city. The story of the arrest of the Regent and other Tibetan officials by the Chinese and the burning of Sera Monastery has proved to be untrue. The only Tibetan prisoners of importance in the hands of the Chinese are the wife and children of the Dalai Lama's brother, whose house the Chinese have seized and are now occupying. Several buildings in the south of the city have been burnt but Sera Monastery, Lhasa Temple and the Dalai Lama's palace have so far escaped. The Chinese are hard pressed and want of supplies is telling on them but both sides desire to end these disastrous hostilities. At present, there is no one to mediate but the Tashi Lama's Prime Minister is proceeding to Lhasa from Shigatse to endeavour to aid in this matter as terrible loss of life seems otherwise inevitable.

Reuter wires from Peking on the 29th.—The Advisory Council which is practically a provisional senate was opened to-day. In his inaugural speech Yuan-Shi Kai pointed out emphatically that the most important matter was finance. China at present was unable to pay for foreign capital which was essential. Government was now drafting a scheme of financial and taxation reforms which he briefly outlined. Government was negotiating with the Powers with a view to increase in Customs, abolition of Likin and reduction of export taxes. He hoped that railway and other reproductive loans would pay for themselves, otherwise salt gabelle would bear the expense. Yuan-Shi Kai pointed out that it would be necessary to employ foreign financial experts to ensure a correct budget and proper accounting. He hoped the people would abandon their opposition to the development of the country by means of foreign capital and would come to see that that was the best means. In conclusion Yuan-Shi Kai said that the mining laws would be reformed and superfluous troops reduced. The Powers in recent years had shown a just attitude and a desire to assist China for which the Chinese should be grateful.

Afghanistan.

The latest news from Khost Valley shows that no Afghan troops have so far arrived to raise the siege of Matun fort in which Shahgasi and a small garrison are shut up. The Mangals encouraged by the non-appearance of reinforcement have assumed the offensive. On Wednesday some three thousand attacked and sacked Matun Dazar and the Cantonment. The Afghan garrison made a strike from the fort and in the skirmish lost nine sepoy killed. The Mangals who had seven men killed eventually drew off and are said to have retired some distance. No details are available as to the number of the wounded on either side. The Shahgasi did not venture outside the fort during the fighting. There is no news of any Afghan relief column being on its way to Matun, though probably one must be on its way either from Ghazni or the Logar valley.

The Pioneer's frontier correspondent sends the following news regarding affairs in Khost Valley:—

On hearing of the revolt of tribesmen the Amir sent a proclamation calling upon the Mangals, Jadrans and Jagis to submit a statement of their grievances through their headmen and warning them of penalties of disloyalty. A number of the Mullahs were at the same time sent to Khost to preach obedience to authority according to the law laid down in the Koran. The Amir has transferred to other regiments the Jagis who were serving as his bodyguard. This step was probably due to the report from Kabul that between one and two hundred Jagi sepoys had deserted carrying off their rifles and ammunition.

Sardar Nasrullah Khan from his head-quarters at Kabul has issued urgent orders to the military commandant at Ghazni and Kandahar to prepare columns for movement upon Khost. A force of two batteries, two regiments of cavalry and six battalions of infantry under the command of General Abdul Aziz Khan was formed from Kabul and ordered to march upon Matun. There was a delay owing to transport difficulties. Pack animals and supplies were collected in Jellalabad and Laghman and sent to Kabul. The general direction of the punitive expedition is in the hands of Sardar Nasrullah Khan, Commander-in-Chief of Afghanistan.

Somaliland.

THE condition of affairs in Somaliland is shown by the following letter from the Aden correspondent of the Times of India, dated Aden, 21st April:—According to reports received last evening from Somaliland by country craft a force of the Osman Mahmood Midjirtains who have suffered much from the Mullah's depredations have attacked Ail, a dependency of Illig, one of the most important ports of Esa Mahmood Midjirtain's lying on the east coast and now held by the Mullah, while the Mullah's men were unaware and captured many hundreds of camels and other animals. On hearing of the Midjirtain's raid the Mullah is reported to have sent a column against Ras Hafoon and other places belonging to the Midjirtains but the result is not yet known. It is rumoured that the Mullah's followers have already occupied Darror which is about one day's journey from Bunder Kassim.

India Bill.

A SEMI-OFFICIAL copy of the Government of India Bill has reached the Government of India by the last mail. The text will not be published till the Bill is passed. The draft, however, confirms all the leading features of the Bill which have been published in this country. The maximum number of members for both Bengal and Behar Legislative Councils has been fixed at fifty each and the maximum for Assam and the Central Provinces has been left to the decision of the Government of India. The Governor of Bengal has been given the same powers as those exercised by the Governors of Bombay and Madras and an Executive Council is created for Behar. The Bill carries out certain amount of repeals and saves to the Government of India power which they have enjoyed for territorial redistributions and administrative changes.

It is notified that the newly created Bengal and Behar Legislative Councils will be in working order by September. Meanwhile the Bengal Government has been asked to forward draft regulations and no time will now be lost in making a similar request to the Government of Behar.

The Haj.

THE Government of India have issued the usual precautionary notification regarding the forthcoming Haj.

In order to promote the convenience of pilgrims and to relieve the present congestion of pilgrim traffic in Bombay, the Governor-General in Council has decided that for the ensuing pilgrimage and until further orders, the port of Karachi shall be open in addition to the port of Bombay to pilgrim traffic to Hedjaz. The usual precautionary notifications are published in the Gazette of India.

Wakf-ul-Aulad.

THE Secretary of State has accepted the principle of the Hon. Mr. Mahomed Ali Jinnah's Wakf Bill and possibly the details will be recast in certain particulars to meet the requirements of the Muhammadan community. The Imperial Legislative Council will proceed with the further progress of the measure next cold weather. This is the first non-official Bill which has so far been accepted by the Government of India and will in the end be placed on the Indian statute book. The Government of India will amend the Bill in several particulars in Select Committee and, if necessary, also in the Council.

TETE À TETE

In the issue of last week the Proprietor of the Comrade published the prospectus of the series of 3,500 Debentures which he is about to issue in order to set up a press of his own and launch an Urdu daily paper, with a weekly edition also. It was then announced that informal offers, which had been privately invited only for 3,000 Debentures, had exceeded that number. Till then 533 different gentlemen had offered to take 3,625 Debentures. But during the week that has intervened 78 more gentlemen have offered for 430 more Debentures, and if all these 4,055 informal offers are converted into formal applications, with a deposit of Rs 5 for each Debenture applied for, the Proprietor shall experience something akin to the embarras de riches. To prevent disappointment, we should like to point out that "first come, first served" would have to be his motto. He knows only too well that it is not the offer of an interest at 5 per cent per annum that could attract the formal applications, and in fact in many cases interest has been voluntarily relinquished, and some have gone so far as to say that they do not even want a refund of the money. But the generosity that is so lavish cannot be a less compelling motive than the hope of personal gain, and we expect a rush of formal applications this week. Already many have come in, the deposits having been invariably remitted on the 1st of the month, the pay-day in India. Next week we fear—and this fear is too like hope—that there will be a rush of money which the Manager's staff will be unable to cope with. We, therefore, wish to emphasise the fact that unless gentlemen look sharp about it, they may find it difficult to be "admitted into blessing." The burglar who relieved us of six hundred odd rupees and, we trust, taught our Manager a lesson, may, however, know just as well that all cash now finds its way to the Bank daily, and the Bank of Bengal has, at least, better arrangements than our landlord has yet made for the safety of our property.

It is with very great regret that we have to record the death of Khan Banadur Shaikh Sadiq Ali Sahab, the Vizier of Khairpur State. He was a man of the old school, of great capacity and experience, and had risen from comparatively poor circumstances to his high office by dint of merit. He was one of the most trusted and tried members of the Sindh Provincial Service, and during his long career as a faithful public servant he earned appreciation and reward at the hands of the Government. His services were lent to the Khairpur State about six years ago, and ever since he served the State with zeal and devotion till the end of his life. Shaikh Sadiq Ali Sahab was one of the most public-spirited Muhammadans of Sindh and was deeply interested in the spread of modern education amongst his co-religionists. He had thoroughly identified himself with the ideals of the Aligarh movement, was a Trustee of the Aligarh College, and took a very keen interest in the work of the Muhammadan Educational Conference. It was mainly due to his initiative and endeavour that a session of the Conference was held in Karachi, which greatly stimulated the desire of Sindh Muhammadans for modern education. Besides contributing considerable sums of money from his own pocket to various funds for the spread of Moslem education, he had secured handsome grants from the State for the Aligarh College and the Moslem University. He was at one time the elected representative of the Sindh Muhammadans on the Bombay Legislative Council. By his death the province of Sindh loses one of its leading citizens and the Mussalmans a genuine and useful worker. We offer our condolences to the bereaved family, and trust that the Khairpur State, which has recently acquired some distinction of an estimable character in the much advertised celebration of its Chief's receiving a G.C.I.E., will select a Vizier who would lead the State into the paths of progress and productive charity.

WE HAVE received, under a registered cover, the following communication purporting to be addressed to us by the Hon. Messrs. Mazhar-ul-Haque and Sachchidananda Sinha from Bankipore on the 1st May, and, as requested, we gladly

"give to this letter as prominent an insertion" as we did to the statements it seeks to contradict, even though the signature of one of the hon gentlemen is of such doubtful authenticity that had we time enough to do so, we would have referred to the alleged writer, or, at least, taken the opinion of a handwriting expert. The risk of publication is, however, great, and we may receive another communication next week—under registered cover,—informing us that there was "no warrant" for our having published the letter, which was "absolutely incorrect and without any foundation." In that case, we admit, there would be more real ground for complaint than there is in the present case. The letter runs as follows:—

"Our attention has been called to an article in the last issue of your journal headed 'Behar and the Beharee.' It contains a large number of misstatements, but we have no desire to refer to all of them in this letter. We, however, deem it our duty to take specific exception to one of these, namely, that we went to Orissa 'on the suggestion of His Excellency the Viceroy.' There is no warrant for your having made that statement, which is absolutely incorrect and without any foundation. It is equally untrue that we went to assure our Urya brethren of 'the good intentions and kindly disposition' of the Beharees. We shall be obliged to you by your kindly publishing this letter in the next issue of your journal. We trust you will in fairness to us give this letter as prominent an insertion as you did to the statements it seeks to contradict." Now for a word of explanation. The statement that the hon gentlemen went to Orissa "on the suggestion of His Excellency the Viceroy" may be even more "absolutely incorrect" than it is stated to be, but we take leave to submit—however feeble our submission may appear by the side of the emphatic manner which should be familiar to those interested in the personnel and proceedings of the Imperial Legislature—that the statement which we published is not "without any foundation," and has, at least, some "warrant" for it. We placed our own value on that foundation and that warrant when we published it, but it is open to others to revise that estimate in the light of the following little disclosure. Our informant was no other than one of the two hon gentlemen who have so emphatically contradicted the statement! We do not publish the name, nor the occasion—yet. We fancy the publication of the statement has already proved a source of worry to the hon gentlemen, and the publication of the source of our information even in this general manner is not likely to make it less. But the disclosure of the name of our informant would be worse still, though we shall have to do it if pressed by our informant, just as we have had to disclose the general source of our knowledge. We may, however, add that had we understood that the information was supplied to us confidentially we would have never dreamt of publishing it. As a matter of fact, we do not yet see what harm there is in His Excellency's suggesting to two representatives of Behar to go to Orissa and assure the Uryas, and what there is in the publication of such a statement to be upset about—presuming, of course, that it is true. We disavow all evil intentions in the publication, and those who know us would believe in our good intentions as well as in our veracity. That is enough for our purpose. The writers of this letter refer to "a large number of misstatements" in our article, but disclaim any desire to refer to all of them. We have examined the one to which they "take specific exception", and regret that a similar opportunity has not been conceded to us to deal similarly with the rest of the sweeping charge. There is, however, one other statement to which the writers allude, namely, the object of their visit to Orissa. Both the mover and the motive have thus been categorically denied, and we await an equally categorical denial of the motion. We would perhaps wake up one fine morning to hear that they never went to Orissa at all. The Hon Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson has playfully attributed to the Hon. Mr Gokhale the juggler's trick of forcing the mango tree to grow up from the seed in a few minutes before one's eyes. Would it, then, be strange for two of Mr Gokhale's colleagues to appear to have gone to Orissa when all the time they were in Calcutta or Bankipore? Alibis are not so difficult of proof after all, and to lawyers too. It is a wonderful world, all maya and nothing else. And to some, if not to all, truth is stranger than fiction.

WE WERE prepared to hear something even worse than the robbery in Lord Lamington's camp in which Colonel Williams was alleged to have lost all he had, and which Lord Lamington in the best manner of the English "milord" calls a mere trifle. We wonder to whom Lord Lamington owes this hospitality. Russia is far and yet so near. There is also the Persian Gulf officer of our own Government, who wanted to know whether his lordship, who could at one time be trusted with the governance of Bombay, could also be trusted now to seek the truth unassisted by petty politicals whom he would have ordered about four years ago. But—Honi soit qui mal y pense! Hush, that would never do, mon ami!

THE debate on Mr. Montagu's motion was as discursive as his own statement. The Leader of the Opposition contented himself by saying that the changes had not met with general acceptance, nor were they constitutionally carried out, but that he would not oppose the Bill because "they would be sorry to deal with anything affecting the Government of India in any way which might be regarded as bringing India into the arena of party politics." We have hitherto been taught to believe that the greatest achievements in British political history, in fact all that is healthy, virile and inspiring in British political life, is the result of the party system. Political philosophers have expatiated on the nice balance of the political forces that the great party organisations have achieved and on the natural evolutions of two different sets of ideals, mutually complementary, which are necessary for the administration of the affairs of a commonwealth. If all this is true it is incredible that any responsible British statesman, subscribing to a definite political creed, should be prepared to swallow his principles when dealing with Indian affairs. Are Conservative and Liberal ideals mere political claptrap for securing political power? If there is to be a definite policy in the governance of India, it must have some definite ideals to render it practical and alive. To make Indian affairs a non-party question is to leave India to drift on according to the whim of the moment, without any definite and settled policy. This perhaps explains to some extent the vague Ministerial utterances in regard to the future of this country. Mr. Montagu said that everybody in India had a policy of his own, therefore the Viceroy also thought it expedient to have one. That is why paragraph 3 of the Government of India Despatch came to be written. Well, there have already come to light serious differences of opinion in regard to the meaning of that paragraph, and the leaders of the anti-partition agitation have already declared from the housetops how their energies are to be employed in future. The net result of the changes has so far been this. The methods of political agitation employed in Bengal have received official consecration, loyalty and contentment have been found to be no effective safeguard against neglect, the changes, though claimed to have been initiated in response to the "new policy," have appeared to be a concession to a very dangerous agitation. The "new policy," in the meantime, hangs somewhere in the cloudland.

"ASIATICUS," who is no other than Mr. Lovat Fraser, in the course of his article on "Greater Britain and India" in the National Review, finds occasion to express some concern regarding the present state of Moslem feeling in this country. He thinks that "all is not well with Islam in India. The waters are troubled, and Moslems are not quite so silent and acquiescent as they were wont to be a few years ago." He recalls Sir William Hunter's book on "The Indian Mussalmans" in which the author had sought to prove that the whole Moslem community was seething with discontent and even sedition. But "Asiaticus" forgets, or perhaps is not aware of the fact that the late Sir Syed Ahmad Khan had given a crushing reply to Sir William Hunter, who was himself forced to acknowledge that his statements were far-fetched and inaccurate. It was the same Sir William who afterwards, as President of the Education Commission of 1882, praised the loyal character of Aligarh education in the most glowing terms. The Aligarh movement started by Sir Syed Ahmad determined the character of the educational and political ideals of the Mussalmans, and it was due to his "wise and prudent and patient leadership," long before the Aga Khan came out as a public man, that they came to be regarded as "amongst the most loyal and dependable communities in India." The Mussalmans still hold steadfastly to the political faith of Sir Syed, and H. H. the Aga Khan, whom "Asiaticus" praises so deservedly, has not thought it necessary to initiate a new policy for his co-religionists. There can, however, be no denying the fact that they have been passing through an anxious period as the result of untoward events both at home and abroad. The affairs in Tripoli and Persia have caused them the deepest distress, which has been not a little "accentuated by the Imperial Announcements." His Highness the Aga Khan, in whose resignation of the presidency of the Moslem League "Asiaticus" saw more than "met the eye," feels as strongly as any other Mussalman about Tripoli and Persia. The Mussalmans may not know exactly what England ought to have done to prevent the Italian movement, but they fear Great Britain has not made it clear that she had done nothing that encouraged Italy. They appreciate what the British Government has done in Persia, and regret that it should have left so much undone. It is their unquestioning faith in the sense of justice of their rulers as well as their consciousness of belonging to a free empire that accounts for their trustful appeals to the British Government to help their brethren abroad by restraining the hand of the aggressor. "Asiaticus" says that "the Government of India cannot feel very comfortable about the present trend of Mahammadan opinion." If that is so, then there is hope for the Indian Mussalmans, for when Government feel comfortable about a community, there is reason to believe they do very little for that community.

As we had stated in an earlier issue, we intended to send a COMRADE PARTY to Tripoli for the relief of war sufferers. But failing to get any estimates of the cost from the British Red Crescent Society, and fearing that the funds collected by us would not go a long way if such a Party was sent, we decided at last that we should wait no longer, but send another instalment of £600 to the Grand Vizier at Constantinople. We are making inquiries about the statement, which we were led to publish some time ago on good authority, that funds sent from Turkey to Tripoli had seldom reached its destination on account of money being contraband and the Italians intercepting even the funds of the Red Crescent. We hope to publish, before many weeks are over, a clear statement on the subject. In the meantime, our second instalment—sent, as before, as a Draft of the Deutsch-Asiatische Bank of Calcutta on the Deutsche Bank filiale Constantinople, by the Bank of Bengal here to the Imperial Ottoman Bank in Constantinople—is on its way to Turkey, making the total amount forwarded hitherto by us the round sum of £1,000. But clearly this is a drop in the ocean. For, although good rains have fallen this year in Tripoli after a four years' drought, the response of Heaven being equal to that of the Moslem fighters—and by June ample crops would reward the patience and fortitude of all those engaged in this civilized warfare, in which women and children, the infirm and the bedridden, have to suffer even more than the able-bodied males, there must be money enough for these destitute and hapless creatures wherewith to buy something to nourish themselves. India's contribution has been far smaller than that of other Moslem countries, notably of Egypt. Great Britain, which has contributed perhaps more than a quarter of a million for the relief of the relations of those who lost their lives in the sinking of the Titanic, has hitherto contributed not even £500 for those who have suffered even more terribly from the brigandage of Italy. But if British "humanity" is so narrow and circumscribed, there's all the more reason why that of the Mussalmans should be more intensive. We would emphasise the fact that in this matter there are no restrictions imposed by Government. His Excellency the Viceroy has already made that clear enough by kindly wiring to us on the 7th October last, that there is no objection to our raising funds for such a purely humanitarian purpose. This applies to Government servants as well, for there is no loi administrative in England or India which disables public servants morally and makes them "inhuman." There is nothing in such charity which is against the laws of neutrality, and if any Government servant feels a doubt about it, we would suggest his referring his doubts to his superior officers in the proper official manner. We however, confess we have no prescription for those weaklings who, like the rat, fear not the cat so much as her "Mew." All we can say is that the cat is as harmless as it is necessary, and the feline bark is wholly incommensurate with the feline bite. No official dare interfere illegally in the private concerns of his subordinates, specially when they are of such a humanitarian character, and if one does bear a grudge, well, then, something must be risked and something must be endured. After all what is their risk and their endurance to the risk and endurance of their brethren, aye, of their sisters and their little ones out there in Tripoli. This is nothing but the literal fulfilment of the trial of which we have all been duly warned by Allah, "And we will certainly test you with a little of fear and hunger and loss of moneys and lives and produce, and carry the good tidings to the patient that say, when a calamity befalls them, 'Verily we are for Allah, and verily unto Him we are to return.'" Their trial is only of a little needless fear, at the worst, and not even of hunger, while the Turks and Arabs are being tried with loss of lives as well as of moneys and produce. To them we would, therefore, say —

صفت بلند دار که نزد خدا رخلق *

با عدد بقدر صفت تو القدار تو

(Keep thy courage high, for with God and the world, the measure of thy courage is also the measure of thy value.)

THE great undertaking begun by the Moslem community with an unusual display of energy and enthusiasm in the beginning of 1911 has almost reached completion as far as it concerns the initial, the most necessary and the most difficult work, of raising the funds required for the purpose. Only about a lakh more is needed to complete the necessary minimum of 35 lakhs of rupees for the creation of the University. Even this deficiency may be taken to have been practically made up, inasmuch as we have reason to believe that that large-hearted lady, Her Highness the Begum Sahiba of Bhopal, is contemplating to add one lakh more to her already generous gifts in the cause of Moslem education. Nothing can be more fitting and graceful, indeed nothing would go more directly to the hearts of her grateful co-religionists than that Her Highness should come forward to finish the work which she was the first to help so liberally at the outset. We must also record our appreciation of the manner in which the Mussalmans of every class and station in life have on the whole acquitted themselves in their great communal undertaking. It is barely 16 months since the idea of making practical efforts for the creation of the Moslem University was broached by H. H. the Aga Khan, and to have collected Rs. 35 lakhs in the interval from amongst a community by no means superabundantly endowed with riches is not an unworthy achievement. His Highness had shown some dissatisfaction with the progress of the work before his departure to England. However, after surveying the results so far achieved by the University workers, the difficulties they have had to meet, and the colossal nature of the task itself, we are fully persuaded that there has been hardly anything serious to justify pessimism. The response to the appeal has been throughout ungrudging. Our wonder is not that the response has been so generous—no one who knows how lovingly the ideal of Sir Syed had been cherished by the community can be surprised at that—but that the money should have been so speedily realised. Those amongst the University workers to whose silent and steadfast devotion the present success is mainly due deserve the special thanks of the community. We may also note here that a considerable number of the promises yet remain to be realised. We hope efforts to collect these will not be relaxed, if indeed they are being made at all, even though the minimum has been subscribed, for no one can honestly believe that a great University requires no more than 35 lakhs of rupees. The Hon. Mian Mohamed Shafi in detailing the work done in the Punjab has said that the amount promised on behalf of the Province has been already collected. He, however, includes in his calculations the donation of the Bahawalpur State, which, if we remember aright, was distinctly excluded from the promise when it was made at the University meeting held at Lahore. He that as it may, there can be no questioning the fact that a considerable amount yet remains unrealised in the Punjab and elsewhere and it would be much more to the purpose if organised efforts are made even now to collect it. The most important work now lying ahead of the University Committee is to move the Government to undertake necessary legislation as soon as possible. We hope the Hon. the Raja Sahib of Mahmudabad will speedily call a meeting of the Constitution Committee and arrange the necessary consultation with the Government with a view to introduce the University Bill in the Imperial Legislative Council in its Simla session. Now that the required amount of money has been collected, the Government would, we trust, lose no time in helping forward the project at its present stage. The frank and very distinct pronouncements of the Hon. the Member for Education, particularly at the last annual Session of the Mohammedan Educational Conference at Delhi, leave no room for doubt that the Government will promptly and whole-heartedly co-operate with the Moslem leaders in their efforts to bring about a speedy realisation of their great educational scheme. The Bill should be ready for introduction in the Simla session. We think it would be altogether unnecessary to refer it to the Local Governments for opinion. It does not embody an administrative measure for the consideration of which local knowledge and experience are necessary. Besides, the Government of India and the Secretary of State have approved of the creation of the Moslem University in principle and it would be a waste of time to invite Local Governments to express their views on a matter already settled.

The decision of the Turkish Cabinet to re-open the Dardanelles in spite of the immense risks involved in such a step may not have been arrived at with a sole regard to the military exigencies of the situation. Indeed, there are ample grounds for thinking that European diplomacy has been at work at Constantinople to induce the Porte to make light of the perils threatening the safety of the Turkish shores in the interests of European commerce. It is impossible to believe that the Powers would have dared to interfere with any other country in the exercise of its unquestioned right to concert measures for self-preservation. As the Statesman rightly observed the other day, it is Italy that has broken her pledge by her wanton attack on the Dardanelles; let the Powers therefore exercise pressure at Rome if they desire to keep the Straits open. Interference at Constantinople is exactly what Italy desired to bring about by her naval demonstration. And even if we for the moment disregard the cynical injustice involved in this act of coercion to which even European diplomacy can hardly supply a parallel, the success of the Italian coup in this particular puts an entirely fresh complexion on the mediatory efforts of the Powers and their solicitude for honourable peace. The last shred of faith in the proposed mediation being disinterested and fair has disappeared now that the Dardanelles question has revealed the true character of the motives that inspire those pacific professions. "Now that Italy has wantonly provoked the closing of the Straits," wrote the Statesman, while commenting on the situation a few days ago, "it would be monstrous for any Power to attempt to force Turkey into re-opening them without proper guarantees." But the Straits have been re-opened, doubtlessly at the requests or representations of the Powers and without any guarantee having been supplied. This eventuality was clearly foreseen by the Empire on the 2nd instant in its brief but fair-minded and admirable survey of the situation. "The Italian game in the Dardanelles," said our contemporary, "is being played with loaded dice, but the chances are at present all in Italy's favour, unscrupulous as she is. The closing of the Dardanelles must inevitably bring about the interference of the Powers—one can almost see Sir Edward Grey being pulled into the struggle in spite of desperate efforts to keep his footing. Yet if Turkey opens the Dardanelles in response to a requisition of the Powers, what is there to prevent the Italian fleet from making another dash at the channel and perhaps squeezing through?" In spite of this patent danger to Turkey the Dardanelles have been opened, and no one in his senses can believe that Turkey has opened it of her own free will. We should like to know what the share of our own Government under Sir Edward Grey has been in this melancholy business, but Lord Morley's reply suggests that it has not been in considerable, nor such as would please the Turks. Is that how a Liberal Government would broad base the Empire on the people's will? And is this British neutrality?

CONGRATULATIONS to Democracy! The unspeakable Turk was said to be manipulating elections to his Chamber, and Liberalism—and, for the matter of that, Toryism even more than Liberalism—was wroth. But in Persia our British Democracy and Russian Autocracy or Oligarchy or whatever else they call the negation of right and justice—are jointly advising the Persian Cabinet "to remove the Extremist element from the Democratic party whose action is not consistent with patriotism at a time when Persia desires to be on friendly terms with Britain and Russia and when the united action of all parties is necessary." We wonder whether more jests have been perpetrated in the name of Democracy, or of Patriotism or of Civilization. Any way, "remove" is good and "united action" still better. But the best is the Democracy of Sir Edward Grey. Who says Democracy cannot govern an Empire? The man who said that did not know the pale grey Liberalism of British Democracy.

ONE of the knottiest problems which stare both East and West in the face is the question of woman's position in the world, and although man has hitherto believed that man is not only man, but also master of her fate, this question will have to be solved by allowing woman to have a preponderating voice in the settlement of her destiny. It is her economic slavery which has reduced her to her present position and when Islam gave woman as complete a control over her property as to man, it indicated the direction which her emancipation was to take. Europe boasts a lot about the status it has given to woman in society, but a cynic would have a certain amount of justification in declaring it as the result of his analysis of woman's rights and privileges that she is only a glorified housekeeper and a sanctified odalisque. It is certain that European women are not content with their present position, and however much one may regret that freedom is only too often abused and turned into immoral license, and that some very silly tactics are used by the militant section of women in pressing their claims, it is undoubted that the Rights of Man are often the Wrongs of Women. Mrs. Pankhurst and Miss Christabel Pankhurst believe window-smashing would sundry their chains, but Mr. Justice Beaman, who published the other day in the Times of India a brilliant psychological study on the situation created by the Titanic disaster, would like woman to hug the chains and spare the windows. Professor Dicey says in his classical work on the British Constitution that Parliament can do everything except make man a woman or woman a man. We wonder whether the judiciary in India has the powers that are denied in England even to a Radical parliament, for, if so, Mr. Justice Beaman's glowing account of woman's privileges would make a world of men rush to the Bombay High Court to be unsexed. It is Mr. Justice Beaman's contention that the eight hundred million women of the world—or whatever else their number is—should thank their stars that God created them women, and remain in economic bondage, because once in a blue moon—we hope the blue moon would seldom occur in the calendar—some sixteen hundred men will go down to the bottom of the Atlantic, giving women and children and the Director of the shipping company the monopoly of life-boats. It does not occur to him that many of these privileged women—left without the prop on which womanhood has leaned for so many centuries that it has lost the strength to stand erect without it—would soon yearn for death rather than live a life without the bread winner. No; there are only too many women who would willingly change places with men rather than rejoice in the possession of all the privileges which Mr. Beaman would continue to them. However, it was not for such reasons that some women changed their attire and vocation in Tripoli. A message received in Rome stated that a legion of one hundred women armed and mounted have arrived in one of the Turkish encampments. We hope Rome has also received a message from America stating that one of Mr. Justice Beaman's disciples dressed in woman's attire warrant the most rational costume for the occasion—arrived—though not with a flourish of trumpets—in the lifeboat full of women and children that the officers of the Titanic had lowered when the disaster occurred. Here was a Feminist of a somewhat unusual character, though we learn that others among the steerage passengers of the Titanic were so anxious to follow his noble example that they would have jumped into the boat as they were being lowered even without the appropriate make-up. Of course, both he and they hailed from gallant Italy. Perhaps the Italian Chamber and the Senate, that annex countries with little ado, have more powers than the British Parliament, and can also turn men into women, even though we have not yet heard of the reverse process.

REUTER informs us once more of the outcry against the "Black Peril" in Johannesburg and Natal on account of a number of outrages on white women.

Dusky Decalogue. An outrage is a sin as well as a crime, and, black or white, the same Decalogue and the same code of human laws apply to both. But, as we wrote once before quoting a candid and far-sighted Colonial official who was both a European and a Christian, the Whites in the Colonies do not set a very Christian example to the Black savages. Not only are their own lives among themselves often unclean, but many a Black home has been ruined by the forcible intrusion of some White bird of passage who could not afford the price of a White marriage and had no horror of sin. Be that as it may, we would like to ask two questions of Mr. Munnick of the Transvaal who moved a resolution in the Senate advocating that "the minimum penalty for such outrages should be hanging." Our first question is if hanging is to be the minimum penalty, what is to be the maximum? And our second is, which does Mr. Munnick object to, the crime or the colour?

We publish elsewhere a letter from the Hon. Mr. Jowett of the East Africa Protectorate, whose cause is our own and with whom we have naturally every sympathy. But we would, in passing, like to inform him that the Jawa was not such a poll tax as the one now being introduced into East Africa. It was a graduated tax, and was levied in lieu of military service by Islam, just as conscripts can now buy themselves off by means of commutation money in European States. We publish in the news of the week a telegram stating that Germany is anxious to get the Indian hewers of wood and drawers of water to develop Damaraland just as British Colonies have done, and that where her Colonies have already been developed, she is following the British Colonial example of disapproving of the presence of Indians there. Lord Cromer must no doubt find himself in a tight corner in the Damaraland indentures question, but the German logic about East Africa is absolutely unanswerable. Said General Fiebert: "The English Government which itself took measures against Indian immigration could not complain if Germany did likewise. Very true, indeed. We can all stretch ourselves to the full British measure, fill out our chests, clear our throats, and proudly say, 'Ceteris Britannicis Sum' (I am a British Citizen!)"

We had received numerous inquiries about Enver Bey as our contemporary the Empire has mentioned in a kind paragraph, before we were able to publish the foreboding of Field Marshal Shevket Pasha's cablegram, and were thus assured soon enough that what little rumour we showed was justified even from a business point of view. But we must confess our own anxiety about the fate of the gallant Ottoman was no less than that of our readers, and it was in a great measure with a view to remove our own suspense that we had cabled to the Field Marshal. Now, Reuter must know that out of 70 million Mussalmans in India some at least—and that several thousand—subscribe for daily papers and thus fill the Baron's pockets, and had his agents looked at the matter in a business-like way, they would have anticipated us and themselves cabled the truth from Constantinople. But it appears that they know nothing of the intense feeling existing in India on the subject of the war, and think it would interest India more to know how a boxing contest was decided in England than to learn how the Italians had led in killing one whose name first became familiar to us through the pargyics of Europe and Reuter. We may add that on receipt of the news from Turkey we immediately communicated it to the Associated Press, whose agent wired it all over without delay. A similar communication was made to Reuter's Agency, but they had no use for the information. Evidently they think that because all roads at one time led to Rome, to-day all wires must issue from Rome. So far as India is concerned, almost all newspapers published the information, and some, like the Empire, did it as prominently as possible. But that dear friend of the Mussalmans, the Pioneer, had perhaps the excuse of the overfed—too much pressure on space. Instead of publishing the news of Enver Bey being in good health it electrified its readers with the all-important news that Arnst, the champion sculler of the world, had arrived in England for his match with Bearly, and that some one who had organised the Indian business of some one else was dead. Well, we do not quarrel with the Pioneer. Its silence is exceedingly eloquent to Moslem ears, and the Services whom it represents will not be overjoyed when the bill of costs is presented some day. But our Lahore contemporary, the Tribune, has selected the best method of appropriating the warmest corner in Moslem hearts by telling us that our cabled inquiry was "too much ado." We hope it will permit us to correct it as to the facts and say that the news from Rome was never "contradicted." Had it been so we do not love the Telegraph Company sufficiently to have wasted our money. Our contemporary falls foul of us for our note on Enver Bey and italicises its concluding portion in this manner—"Were he to die there, how many of us would not envy him such a death in preference to all we have here." It then comments with that masterly sarcasm which we have learnt to associate with it, "We did not hear before that the Comrade's household was so extended and that the Comrade in particular was so full of martial spirit, neither is it quite clear how Enver Bey belongs to 'us' of India. Great is Pan-Islam." We have yet to understand the allusion to our household, but if it refers to any interest that we may be taking in Turkish affairs, we can only say we are humble followers of our contemporary's zeal for freedom from China to Peru. As for "Pan-Islam," we would suggest the dropping of the "Pan" as well as of "ism," for Islam, plain and simple, has hitherto served the same purpose for Mussalmans equally well. It is an article of every Moslem's creed that all Mussalmans are brothers, and if some of 'us' in India claimed Enver Bey as a brother it should not have startled the Tribune. If we are not mistaken, its own brotherhood is also expanding, and one of its pet politicians included "my brother the sweeper" in its extensive "household." These are early steps, and we have hopes that before long the Tribune would recognise that the world is wider than the portion of earth contained in a circle with a 4-inch radius from the neiter extremity of its nasal organ. We would suggest to it to persevere. As for martial spirit, who could escape the contagion of Bengal when even the far-away Tribune could envy the death of Khudiram Bose and Kanharlal Dut? Great is "Pan-Islam," but oh, how ever so much greater is the "Nationalism" of Bengal as transplanted in the Punjab!

Now that the Secretary of State's sanction has been received to the principle of the Bill introduced last year by the Hon. Mr. Jinnah in the Imperial Legislative Council, we hope the promoters of the Bill will try to get it passed into law at any date in the next winter session of the Council. We have already discussed in some detail the provisions of the Bill. It is intended, in brief, to remove the disability created by the decisions of their Lordships of the Privy Council that militate against the Moslem Law of Waki, and render it unlawful for a Mussalman to create a waki of his property in favour of his family, children, and descendants. The Moslem law on the subject as expounded by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had given birth to a widespread feeling and agitation amongst the Mussalmans, and the Bill now before the Council represents an overwhelming volume of Moslem opinion on the subject. We are glad the Government of India and the Secretary of State have recognised the necessity of legislation in order to bring the existing law into conformity with the spirit of the Moslem Law of Waki. There is room for amendment in the minor provisions of the Bill which, of course, will be fully considered at the Committee stage. The main consideration is to preserve the principle of the personal law of the Mussalmans. The measure is only of a permissive character and it is, therefore, not likely to be opposed by the few Mussalmans who have somehow or other failed to approve of its principle. We may also urge on the Mussalmans in response to whose wishes the Bill has been framed to study it fully in every detail and in all its bearings now that its enactment has been practically assured. A measure depends for its success mainly on the working of the details and it not seldom happens that a minor detail, badly conceived and ill-considered, vitiates the utility and purpose of the whole measure. We would suggest that the title of the Bill be altered into the Waki Declaratory Bill and that it should be confined to a bare statement of Moslem law.

The Comrade.

Morocco.

MORE than twelve centuries after its contact with Islam, Morocco, the Maghrib-ul Aqsa or Farthest West of the Mussalmans, has passed into the hands of a Christian Power. France acquires a country which—even after the French usurpation of Figg, Igli and Tunt oases as part of Algeria, in 1900, when England was busy in the Boer War—exceeds in area the whole of France. Morocco is estimated to be 219,000 square miles, or almost exactly the size of Upper India, including the United Provinces, the Punjab and the N.-W. Frontier. It exceeds Algeria—for which Abdul Qadir, the persevering, brave and chivalrous hero of Islam, had fought against France for 30 years—both in population and area. It is a third of Persia in size and maintains, according to one account, more than half, and according to another, a little more than the whole population of Persia. Morocco is now lost to Islam as a world power, and to the coloured races, and yet Europeans and Christians continue to talk of the Black Peril and of the Revolt of Islam. The Peril is all the other way, and when the international "deal" of Christendom continue to be so manifestly unrighteous and un-Christian, it becomes difficult to deprecate Pan-Islamism even if it means what Europe has so often pretended to believe.

The footsteps of Islam were first imprinted on Moroccan soil in 682 when Arabs came under Uqaba. Twenty years later, Musa ibn-Nusair made a successful expedition as far as Tafilalt and the Dra'a. In 710, a force of 10,000 Arabs and Egyptians under the great Tariq held Tangier, and so rapid was the effect of these pioneer enterprises of Islam that a year later 20,000 Berbers were enrolled for the invasion of Spain in Europe. But the foundation of the Moslem Empire of Morocco was laid by Idris, a fugitive descendant of the Prophet, in 788. For 200 years this Arab dynasty ruled the north of Morocco, but was displaced partly by the Miknasa in 925, and wholly by the Maghrawa in 988. Both these were Berber, and Arab rule then ended in Morocco to be restored after the lapse of no less than five or six centuries. But the touch of Islam was enough to transmute the Berber, and the fame of the Murabbits and Muwahhids, the "Almoravides" and "Almohades" of Europe, overspread the whole civilized world. The rule of the former lasted from 1061 to 1145, in which period they conquered the rest of Morocco and most of Spain and Portugal. Under the "Unitarians," who ruled from 1145 to 1242, the Empire of Morocco in Africa included Algeria, Tunis and Tripoli, and Egypt escaped only through the prowess of Saladin. They have left many architectural monuments of theirs, including the towers of Seville, Rabat and Marrakesh, the Torre de Oro at Seville and the Ghiblatai Castle, besides the towns of Rabat and Alcazar. With the fall of the Almohades, the Moorish Empire of Spain dwindled to the kingdom of Granada. Two other Berber dynasties ruled in Morocco, the Beni Marin for two centuries, and the Wattasi for half a century or more. During the rule of the latter, the Amir of Granada returned with the Moors who were treacherously expelled by Charles V. from Spain, and built the city of Tetuan.

But early in the sixteenth century a new power began to gain strength in the South. This was the Sa'adi or Hasani dynasty of Arabs, who had originally come from Yambio and had settled in the Dra'a district. They too were the descendants of the Prophet, and laid the foundation of the Sharfiar Empire of Morocco, which was now fallen into the hands of France after a rule of nearly four centuries. Although Spain was no longer a Moorish kingdom, the Moors still possessed a great status in Europe. Ahmad IV, the "Golden," entered into friendly relations with Elizabeth and other European potentates. His son Zidan twice obtained assistance from Charles I. in order to subdue rebellions. The best indication of the position of Moors, however, is not to be obtained from historical but from literary sources. Othello, the Moor of Venice, when he marries Desdemona—the daughter, as Iago reminds him, of a "magnifico" who "hath, in his effect, a voice potential as double as the duke's"—replies without any attempt at boasting

"I fetch my life and being
From men of royal seige; and my demerits
May speak, unbanneted, to as proud a fortune
As this that I have reach'd."

Again, Portia is wooed by the Prince of Morocco as well as by the Prince of Arragon, and talking of his deserts apropos of the silver casket, which bears the legend, "who chooseth me shall get as much as he deserves," the Prince of Morocco says—

"I do in birth deserve her, and in fortunes,
In graces, and in qualities of breeding."

Such, indeed, was the pride of Moors that Ismael wanted a daughter of Louis XIV. in marriage.

This, then, was the position of Morocco and her Princes when modern European States began to make themselves felt beyond Europe also. But the people of Morocco were also building up fame for themselves through the terror they inspired in Europe by their daring piracies. The Moorish rovers had a sort of State subsidised navy of privateers, and in their descents on European coasts they went as far as Devon and Cornwall, carrying off the population of whole hamlets. Sali, Mehediya, Larache, Tangier, Ceuta, Tetuan, and Badis were their principal rendezvous. They flourished throughout the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries, and reached the zenith of their power during the latter part of the 17th century. That was just the period of British and Spanish naval enterprise, and it is something to have put Europe in fear at a time when Drake and Frobenius flourished and Spain could send out an Armada, or when Cromwell had developed the navy of Great Britain and made it a power in Europe. The States of Europe were compelled to pay large ransoms for their captive subjects, and later on purchased immunity for them and their vessels by paying annual tributes, some countries continuing the payment well into the 19th century.

But while Morocco was levying this chant on the high seas, European traders were settling in the country, and paving the way for diplomatic negotiations and treaty privileges. Foreign trade was encouraged by the State, and thus originated all the rights enjoyed by foreigners in Morocco which have now resulted in the Moors' loss of the Empire itself. The Sa'adi or Hasani dynasty ruled till 1658, when another branch of the Arab Sharifs, the Filali, overthrew it, and is now in its turn subdued by France after a rule of two and a half centuries. Under the reign of Suleman II. (1795-1822) piracy was abolished, but the policy of having as little as possible to do with Europeans, which lasted for a century, was initiated. It cannot, however, be said that this policy succeeded. For when Moroccan rovers ceased to trouble Europe, Europe began to trouble the Moroccans. There was a brush with Austria in 1828, and when France stepped into Algeria in 1830, a war had to be waged over the partition of that country, and again, in 1844, over the terms of peace arranged after the first war. Sali, whence the rovers used to sail out, was bombarded in 1851, and the French secured the settlement of many claims.

More recently, Morocco had difficulties with Spain. When in 1859, Abdul Rahman died, and his successor, Sidi Mohammed, had to defend himself against other candidates for the throne, some raids by Moroccan troops upon Spanish and Franco-Algerian territory gave to Spain the not unwelcome opportunity of taking up the sword against her old opponent in the Islamic world. War was declared, and in the following year, the Spaniards, advancing southwards from Ceuta towards Tetuan, and gained a victory in the vicinity of the latter city. The peace negotiations which followed this defeat of the Moors led to no result, but another defeat forced them to accept an amnesty which led to the peace of Tetuan on 26th April, 1860. A small tract of land was surrendered, Spanish missionaries were allowed to pursue their vocation throughout Moroccan territory, and the war indemnity of 100 million reals was imposed. In the reign of Mulai Hasan, in 1880, a Conference was held at Madrid to determine the extent of the protection which may be afforded by foreign Consuls to Moroccan subjects. In 1893, a Spanish fort near Melilla was attacked by the Kabail, and when they had been finally reduced to submission by the combined Spanish and Moroccan troops, Morocco concluded, in 1894, a treaty with Spain, whereby the Sultan pledged himself to punish the Kabail, to establish a neutral zone round Melilla, and to pay a war indemnity once more of 20 million pesetas.

But in spite of the troubles with France and Spain, the Sultan retained his power almost unimpaired. For centuries the treatment of foreign envoys in Morocco was most humiliating, the presents which they brought being regarded in the light of tribute. It was not till 1900 that the custom was abolished of mounted Sultans under umbrellas receiving European ambassadors on foot and barcheaded. But Hasan III. was the last of the great rulers of Spain. Although mild in disposition, he succeeded in subduing one by one the Berber centres which had revolted against the Sharifian authority. He died in 1894, and left for Abdul Aziz, a minor son by a Circassian slave, the heritage of a great but greatly coveted Empire. So long as Si Ahmad-bin-Musa, the Chamberlain who had become vizier, had the control of affairs, things are said to have gone on fairly well. But he died in 1900, just as his ward gained majority, and the last decade has seen the ruin of Morocco by those methods which are associated, in the language of the Tartuffes of Europe, with the civilizing mission of the West.

If report speaks true, Abdul Aziz had in him the making of a good and amiable ruler. But that was not what Europe wanted. With the lies of a sanctimonious civilization on its lips, it pandered to his worst traits and squandered his treasures. The process of "peaceful penetration" was not peculiar to Morocco. It is typical of modern European diplomacy,—and its various steps have been well described by Thrasymenes—"just returned from Asia" and "a good deal of an expert in this business of Imperial expansion"—in a Socratic dialogue on "Integrity and Independence," which was recently published by that brilliant Radical journal, the Nation. So well has the history of Morocco in recent years followed these steps that we venture to give a long extract from the dialogue. Says Thrasymenes:—

So the first steps are in no sense political. Indeed the Imperial power is careful to keep quite out of sight. It simply allows or encourages some of its citizens to enter the country it has marked down for ultimate absorption, as traders for their private profit, as explorers, or as missionaries. And when the country is a little better known, and sufficient confidence of its rulers has been won or bought, other citizens obtain permission to work mines or plantations or to lend money to the rulers of the inefficient State.

But are not these commercial and other dealings very dangerous for those who undertake them?

Why, yes, indeed, but these private dangers are the very seeds of Imperialism.

How do you make that out?

Well, you see, it works like this. In a simple, backward people, each of these intrusions makes for general disorder. The traders, who bring guns and strong drink, foment intestine feuds, new trade routes act as a demand for brigands, the miners and other foreign settlers get at loggerheads with the inhabitants, and, best of all, generous loans stimulate extravagance and make for bankruptcy.

Best of all, indeed! But how can the noble fruits of civilization grow from such hateful seeds as these?

Ah, it is just here that we enter the arena of our art. The disorder thus produced becomes intolerable. The property, nay, the very lives of our valuable subjects are imperilled. These cry out to their government to save them. And so the government, which has been waiting, has then to intervene.

You mean it annexes the country?

Why, no such thing! Nothing could be further from its action or professions—at this stage. It merely intimates that compensation must be made to its injured subjects, and that better order must be kept than an inefficient government is capable of keeping. And next, as the disorder continues, it offers its disinterested advice and assistance to enable the rulers to perform their duties in a more satisfactory manner.

But does not this move arouse the very suspicion which you said just now it was so desirable to allay?

Why, yes, it does. And this is where the moral capital of an efficient Imperial race comes in so useful.

What exactly do you mean, Thrasymenes?

I mean the faith or confidence which the rulers of the backward state will naturally repose in the pledged word or declaration of a great civilized state. For the stage we have now reached is one that requires this pledge.

What pledge do you mean?

I mean a bold, uncompromising undertaking to maintain for ever the integrity and independence of the backward state. For only by this means could an open rupture of relations be avoided and the game of peaceful penetration be continued.

I quite realise the value of such a pledge. For this I apprehend is the precise point where the political process of absorption really begins.

Yes; and that is why the pledge should be given with full formality. And if there should happen to be two Imperial Powers alike devoted to this civilizing mission who will jointly pledge themselves to this sacred duty, so much the better, for the moral security is doubled.

But may they not find it inconvenient at a later stage to keep this pledge?

That indeed, O Socrates, may well happen. But in that case they will redeem it by another pledge of greater value.

But what can be of greater value than independence? broke in Eubulus.

Nothing, perhaps, for you with your narrow nationalism. But others would hold that a larger, truer liberty is found in forming part of a great civilized Empire.

In Morocco the first result of "the generous loans" that "stimulate extravagance and make for bankruptcy" was the revolt of the Berber tribes of the Algerian frontier under Er-Roghā, nicknamed Bu Hamara, and the vicinity of the domains of France to the disturbed area creates a suspicion and other evidence proves to the hilt, that these troubles were "the very seeds of Imperialism" that were sown by France. Abdul Aziz was too busy with the toys of his new civilization, his bicycles and gramophones and things far worse than these childish gew gaws, to be able to deal with these troubles, and France offered its "disinterested advice and assistance" to enable him to perform his duties "in a more satisfactory manner." A French loan was obtained for the reorganisation of the army, with the result that more bicycles, gramophones and cameras were purchased, and Fez became a little more Parisian in its night's entertainments. Raisul, a local Sharif, became master round Tangier and created a false impression abroad as to the state of the Empire by capturing people and holding them to ransom. This, then, was just the opportunity when "the moral capital of an efficient Imperial rule comes in so useful" and he it said to the glory of Lord Cromer that it was he who showed the way of Imperialism to France. He persuaded Great Britain that a free hand in Egypt was worth more than any interests that could be acquired in Morocco. M. Cambon, who was representing France, and had twice visited Morocco to study the problem on the spot, completely outwitted Lord Lansdowne. If the entente cordiale was desirable enough in itself, there still remain to consider the questions whether it was worth what England was induced to give for it, and whether the greater part of the price was at all England's to give. We shall not, however, discuss here what Morocco means to England and to France, but proceed with the narrative. In fact, there was no talk of giving and taking. There was only "the pledged word or declaration," but not of one "civilized power" only. France and England both pledged themselves not to alter the political status of Morocco and Egypt. One pledge is already broken, and unless England is content to get the worst of a bad and an unrighteous bargain, the other must also go the same way to form a paving stone in hell. On the 8th April, 1904, the Anglo-French Agreement was signed, and Britain's astute ally—in this anticipating that other "great grey ally of ours" who brought Germany round to recognise her sphere in Persia—concluded a Secret Agreement with Spain also in the following October, with yet another in 1905.

A disturbing factor, however, now intruded itself on the scene, marring the peacefulness of this bartering of empires in the political market-place of Europe. That was the War Lord of Germany, who, desirous of "a place in the sun" for himself, sallied out to Africa with an open umbrella to shield Moslem Kingdoms and with the much advertised intention of being the Protector of Islam. On the 31st March, 1905, the Kaiser landed at Tangier and conferred with the Sultan's representatives. Veiled but easily intelligible promises of help led the Sultan of Morocco to reject the ample programme of reforms sketched out by disinterested France. He demanded a Conference of the Powers which M. Delcassé opposed strongly on behalf of France. Count Bülow, the German Chancellor, was, however, too menacing, and the French Foreign Minister resigned in June. France then agreed to the Conference, which met at Algeiras in Spain on the 16th of January, 1906, 13 delegates representing Morocco, the European Powers, and the United States of America. Russia had no direct interest in Morocco, but a Russian Legation was speedily set up at Tangier with all its appurtenances to give colour to Russia's claim to be represented, so that France could get another unrighteous vote in her support.

The result of the Conference was the Algeiras Act signed on the 7th April, 1906, and accepted by the Sultan on the 18th June following. After final ratifications it was deposited at the Spanish Foreign Office on the last day of the year 1906. Treaties in Europe have not always proved too sacred to touch, and it is too late in the day to complain of their violation. What is astonishing, however, is the indecent haste shown in tearing them up which is characteristic of the eventful first decade of our new century. It took even Russia half a generation to alter in 1871 the provisions about the Black Sea fleet and fortifications contained in the Treaty of Paris of 1856. The Treaty of Berlin of 1878 has been torn to shreds by Austria and Italy a whole generation later. But five years are enough for France to-day to accomplish that which it took Russia 15 and Austria and Italy 30 years, and which Great Britain after the same period has not yet attempted in Egypt. The provisions of the Algeiras Act could not have been forgotten so soon, but we recapitulate them for ready reference. Under this agreement a Moorish Police force, 2,000 to 2,500 strong, commanded by Moorish Kaid, assisted by French and Spanish instructors and officers, and inspected by a Swiss Inspector-General was to be formed and distributed among the eight Moroccan ports. This arrangement was to continue for five years. A State Bank with a concession for 40 years was established with the monopoly of the right of issuing bank notes, and to act as treasurer and paymaster of Morocco, and the financial agent of its Government at home and abroad. Its working was to be observed, but not directed, by four censors appointed by the Imperial Bank of Germany, the Bank of England, the Bank of Spain and the Bank of France. Provision was also made for the acquisition of land round the ports by foreigners, and, as a consequence, for the payment by them of regulated crab taxes. There was to be a more efficient control of customs. The authority of the State over public service and public works was recognised, and the Powers, suspicious of France, insisted on an impartial treatment of tenders for public works. Above all, the independence and integrity of Morocco were guaranteed by all the signatory Powers, and as the Anglo-Russian Convention guaranteeing the independence and integrity of Persia was not signed until more than a year after, the Eastern world, at least, understood that the dramatic intervention of the Kaiser had saved Morocco from the clutches of France and Spain. But in less than six years the triple principle of the sovereignty and independence of the Sultan of Morocco and the integrity of his States, on which alone, according to the Algeiras Act, order, peace and prosperity could be based, has been finally swept away. The pledge which Europe and America had given with due solemnity and full formality in which not only one Power or one Continent, but the whole of Christendom stood security, has been broken. Thrasymenes would call it "a redemption of the pledge by another pledge of greater value." "But what can be of greater value than independence," the East, intoxicated with the new wine of the West—would inquire like Eubulus, and the West—that had so long scoffed at the world-conquests of Alexander and Tamerlane, and the liberty-crushing rule of Nadirshah or Napoleon—having now described the complete circle of modern civilization, from barbarism back to barbarism, would answer with Thrasymenes, "an expert in this business of Imperial expansion, just returned from Asia," "Nothing, perhaps, for you with your narrow nationalism. But others would hold that a larger, truer liberty is found in forming part of a great civilized empire."

Othello.

WE HAVE been lucky in Calcutta during the last six months in the way of receiving the visits of two good repertoire dramatic companies performing some thing more serious than the Chocolate Soldier and more tragic than the Count of Luxembourg. We had first a fairly long visit from Mr. Allan Wilkie, then one from Mr. Matheson Lang, followed by another from Mr. Wilkie, and now we have Mr. Matheson Lang and his company once more among us. Our readers would remember that we wrote in two successive issues of our paper somewhat lengthy and fairly exhaustive critiques on the performances of Mr. Wilkie and his company, and though we could not unfortunately find sufficient space during an exceedingly busy and eventful political season to note in equal detail on the still more interesting and artistic performances of Mr. Lang, nor find it easy to do so now that he is once more delighting crowded houses in spite of a very disintegrating weather, we are anxious to associate ourselves with the chorus of praise that greets him every night in the playhouse and every morning—including the afternoon of the Empire—in the press.

Mr. Lang's exquisite Hamlet, and his interesting Charles Rex in Sweet Nell of Old Drury, reminiscent of Mr. Fred Terry, had already captivated us when we went to witness his performance of "perhaps the greatest work in the world," according to Macaulay, and "the most pathetic of human compositions," according to Wordsworth. We of course refer to the greatest masterpiece of Shakespeare, namely, the Tragedy of Othello, the Moor of Venice. On the last occasion when we commented on Mr. Wilkie's performance of this play, we had stated as follows—"Our own conception of the Moor is that of a great volcano with tremendous passions dormant beneath many a thick stratum of self-control, or of a mighty river harnessed by the master mind of an engineer who knows the laws of forces and motion and has provided with his skill and art a dam even more powerful than the strength of the element for all foreseen contingencies. But Iago's villainy, being almost superhuman, is an unforeseen contingency. There is at first an occasional rumbling below that is in marked contrast with the idyllic scenery of the hill-top. The water at flood time breaks through the dam here and there which is instantly repaired. But at last the 'self-government' of the Moor fails in its sustained struggle against the fiendish perfidy of the Venetian. The crater bursts and a lava stream of passion, an avalanche of hot blooded rage rushes down. The dam bursts and the surging flood sweeps everything before it. The force of the onward rush is all the greater for having been checked so long. The castle that had defied the cannonade so long begins to crumble at last, and the very strength of its adamantine walls increases the loudness of the report when they fall and leave it a majestic and even a beautiful ruin."

But while praising the magnificent rage of Mr. Wilkie and his splendid passion in the love scenes, we had occasion to confess that the picture as painted by him lacked definiteness. The light and shade were not brought out as clearly as they should have been. The outlines were not sufficiently distinct. Although there was no monotony, the whole gamut was not played. The expression of feeling was superb, but the repression was not fully brought out. What the Moor did we all saw. But what he had resisted we did not see equally clearly. We do not wish to make odious comparisons, but for the benefit of those of our local readers who saw Mr. Wilkie's performance and have not seen Mr. Lang's, we should like to mention that the defects which we had noted above were almost wholly absent in the latter's impersonation of the Moor. There is a good deal of light and shade in the performance of those magnificent third and fourth Acts which show the ruin of a grand personality and make the triumph of vice over virtue so phenomenally artistic. But for an ideal performance much more time is needed than even the four hours which Mr. Lang required, interrupted as the performance was by frequent and fairly long intervals. It is by unduly hurrying over these two acts that even the best of impersonations may be spoiled, and convictions so reluctantly formed by the noblest and most unsuspecting of natures may be mistaken for a fit of jealousy. What we want are long silences interspersed with the well timed and diabolically subtle hints of Iago, which visibly change the settled convictions and firmly held beliefs of Othello, as a chemical re-agent changes the colour or consistency of a solution under examination in a test tube. Mr. Lang, we have no doubt, is the last person to call Othello jealous, and he laid clear emphasis on that beautiful exclamation which escapes the self-restrained Moor. "But yet the pity of it, Iago!—O Iago! the pity of it, Iago!" There is no more pathetic wail in the whole field of literature than this which is wrung from the heart of one of the noblest and manliest of men. The pathos is not the weak sentiment which usually goes under that name, but contains in it a world of tragedy, the tragedy of intense love and abiding despair.

But, as we stated on the previous occasion, the forces of evil in Othello's case, unlike those of other heroes of Shakespeare's tragedies, are wholly external to him, and resemble the indiscriminating and inexorable destiny of the ancients, against which he struggles to the last, blindly, incoherently and vainly, "a Laocoon amid the ser-pent's coils." The unrelenting character of that destiny has to be brought out in the performance of Iago. The impersonation of Othello has this disadvantage that as his character, unlike Hamlet's, is not entirely formed from within himself, and as he is not the sole interest of the drama, no Othello, however excellent himself, can succeed on the stage unless there is an equally excellent Iago to bring out the gradual transformation of the Moor in the very sight of his poisoner. It would be possible for Mr. Forbes Robertson to act the ideal Hamlet with a fifth-rate company to assist him. But Othello cannot be rendered satisfactorily with one-star company, even if the star is most resplendent in the whole firmament. The unrelenting serpent with its coils is no less necessary for the picture than the writhing form of the Laocoon. Such is the importance of the character that Sir Henry Irving is said to have played the characters of Othello and Iago on alternate nights. Well, Mr. Vane is not an Irving, and we hope he will not take it ill if we suggest that a character to which Irving alone could do full justice was beyond his powers. He has the fault of the rest of the company, barring Mr. Lang, that he is only too often indistinct.

Among the men, Mr. Holloway as the Duke was exceedingly good, and we would suggest his tying the role of Iago. Mr. Thorndike's Roderigo was an equally good impersonation of the habitual dupe as contrasted with the Moor whom an Iago alone could deceive. But Brabantio was frankly horrid, and we would request him to redeem his own natural voice from the pawnshop instead of speaking in those awful accents which he seems to have borrowed. Mr. Vigors' Cassio was good, but it could have been better and more Southern in its loving for loving's sake. Among the ladies, Bianca was inexplicable, but the Emilia of Miss Marion Lind was very good and exceedingly clear, even if a trifle melodramatic. We wish we could praise Miss Hutton Britton as highly as some of our contemporaries have done. The part of Desdemona needs little elocution and much expression, but the little it needs must be there. In this case, however expression had to do duty for elocution also, because Miss Britton was seldom distinct, specially in the bedroom scene. And the expression, too, was far too angelic for the part, for Desdemona is not a shy, retiring damsel, but as sparkling as she is innocent. She is more startled than meek, but Miss Britton did not bring that out clearly. In the earlier scenes, however, she was excellent, but in the later scenes she became inconsistent.

We should also like to add that we were no less puzzled than "A Presidency College Undergrad," who writes to the Statesman, by the topsy turvy scenes as arranged by Mr. Lang. There is neither a warrant in Shakespeare for Act V scene 1 preceding Act IV scene 3, nor is the new arrangement artistic. It is, in fact, manifestly absurd for Emilia to be present at the scene of Cassio's attempted murder and thereafter to assist calmly at unrobing Desdemona for the night and discussing the infidelity of women in the way of a pay yet good Venetian matron. "Merely A Soldier"—and a silly one at that—who replies to the "Undergrad," asks him if he has ever seen the death of Desdemona in any other but the last act in any production. Nobody has, and nobody says it should occur anywhere else, but Shakespeare never arranged the unrobing of Desdemona in the last act and Mr. Lang has. This is all that the "Undergrad" and we object to, and while we are prepared to accept the Pharisee's confession that he does not presume to be a "student" of Shakespeare like the "Undergrad," we are also prepared to doubt if he is, as he claims, even "a humble reader." There is nothing of humility about him; and little of reading—unless we include in that term a vast but not too wise reading of "up-to-date novels" which commence new chapters with, "We will now take our reader back, etc." We trust he will also take the "reader" back, and try to become a student before he bursts out as a critic.

While on this subject, we would, however, like to dispute the statement of the "Undergrad" that "Othello was a Venetian in everything except his birth and name." As for the name, we do not think that Othello occurs in the Heccolomithi of the Italian novelist, Giraldi Cinthio, from which Shakespeare is said to have borrowed the plot. Stevens first pointed out that the name "Othello" is found in Reynold's God's Revenge against Adultery, standing in one of his arguments as follows—"She marries Othello, an old German soldier." Mr. Rawdon Brown, on the other hand, maintains that a certain Cristophal Moro was the original of Cinthio's Il moro di Venezia, the word "Moro" signifying in Italian either a blackamoor or a mulberry tree, and he points out that three mulberries were part of this Moro's insignia. It is, at any rate, clear that whether the mulberry tree and Moro were mistaken for a blackamoor, or whether Othello was a German soldier, it was certainly not a Moor's name and does not sound like one's at all. By birth Othello, as we know him, was a Moor, and he is proud of fetching his life and being "from men of royal siege." But he was evidently a Christian, and bore not even as much love for "a malignant and turban'd Turk" as the Balkan Committee or even the Times. But, as for his culture, we have no warrant for saying it was characteristically Venetian, even though "Merely A Soldier" assures us that "doubtless Shakespeare intended us to believe that Othello was a Venetian in everything but birth." "Undergrad" only objects to Mr. Lang's "radically Oriental mannerism—from his profound salaam to the uncouth gestures of a noble savage." But "Merely A Soldier" goes further than mere manners, and does not mean to be very complimentary to Othello and to non-Europeans when he alludes to the old saying, "what's bred in the bones," etc. All the same, "Merely A Soldier" has happened for once to "strike oil." We detest sweeping generalisations such as Oriental habits and the Eastern mind, but if there is any distinction at all between East and West—vague and unscientific as these expressions are—then Othello leans more towards the East than the West. He is what the name of the play signifies—of Venice, yet a Moor. In this connection we would draw the reader's attention to a remark of Othello's in Act IV., scene i., that has not perhaps received notice in this connection. When Othello spies on Cassio and overhears his laughter, he, believing it to be a jest of Cassio's about his easy conquest of Desdemona, exclaims bitterly "Do you triumph, Roman? Do you triumph?" Now Michael Cassio was not a Roman but a Florentine, but in Morocco the men of the West are in general called "Romans" to this day, and in his distress Othello's inborn racial prejudice finds expression in this epithet.

It is certainly more artistic to dress Othello as a Moor and give him the manners and gestures of the East. It is not of this that we should like to complain. In fact, we would have complained if Mr. Lang had appeared in doublet and hose and had manners even remotely suggestive of a Venetian fop. What we complain is that the "profound salaams" were too stiff and mechanical, and irresistibly led us to think of Hamlet's description of those actors who, like the creations of Nature's journeymen, "imitated humanity so abominably." Othello's gestures were also uncouth, and even though "Undergrad" has chosen in "noble savage" an equivocal expression, they resembled in one instance, the "sprint" of the savage in Act III. scene iv., those of a savage more than those of a nobleman. It must not be forgotten that the Moors had ruled Spain and civilised Europe, and unless Mr. Lang wished to convey the idea that Othello ran away from the temptation to strike a woman which did not clearly appear—we should think Mr. Lang's "bolting away" was more like the flight of a blackamoort than of the a Moor of Venice.

Then comes the colour question. We think Mr. Lang was fully justified in treating the expressions quoted by "Undergrad" as due to the most deeprooted and ancient prejudice of mankind, that based on colour, which magnifies the slightest difference in the pigment of the skin. Surely an Indian student need not go very far in search of this phenomenon. At one time colour distinguished the Aryan from the non-Aryan in India, the land of the Varna Dharma, and to-day that ancient prejudice often makes a European Aryan call an Asiatic Aryan a "Nigger" with an expletive. When Lord Salisbury could call Mr. Dadabhoi Naoroji a "black man," surely Brabantio and Roderigo, Iago and Emilia could have done the same four centuries earlier. The last criticism of the "Undergrad" was that Mr. Lang's Othello did not actually die upon a kiss, and Mr. Lang's martial defender interprets the failure as a suggestion that Othello, the murderer, was not worthy of a kiss and would have sullied Desdemona's lips. The price of a good woman is, indeed, above rubies, and Desdemona was a truly good woman. But how much higher Othello is in moral stature cannot perhaps be realized by such soldierly critics. In fact, the remarks of "Merely A Soldier" show that he too is labouring under the colour prejudice of Brabantio and Roderigo, and thinks that Shakespeare wrote this magnificent tragedy all about the falling out of an Indian student who had married a Bayswater "slavery" on pretence of being a live Raja.

Sonnet.

I stood before my buried youth and called:
Come back! come back! now have I found the truth,
I've found the worth of many verdured youth
On this sad crag whereon I stand appalled
To view its barren veins and fruitage bald;
Come back my summer days! for age uncouth
With noisome weeds has sown the garden smooth
Where erst I held my rarest blooms unwalled.
Too late! too late! you reap as you have sown,
You should have cared in spring for winter needs,
But now is summer waned and autumn flown,
Half hoar with early frost on upland meads,
'Tis late to turn, my loitering friend, move on,
Nor leave behind your weary load of weeds.

CORRESPONDENCE

Poll-tax on Indians in East Africa.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—When a few weeks ago, I published my little pamphlet "An Appeal of the Indians in East Africa" describing in detail the various disabilities which my countrymen there are labouring under, I little dreamt that I should be called upon so soon to protest against a piece of proposed legislation of the Government of East Africa, highly unjust and injurious to the interests of the Indian Community residing there. I learn that the Government have on their legislative anvil a bill for imposing a poll-tax indiscriminately on all the "non-native" population in the Protectorate and that it has been even read a second time. Shortly put, the bill contemplates a levy of Rs. 15 annually from every "non-native" male of eighteen, whether he be rich or poor. The term "non-native" in the bill means all outsiders including the Europeans and the British Indians. So, if the bill be passed into law, as it probably will, considering the present constitution of the Legislative Assembly there, every male British Indian in East Africa shall have to pay Rs. 15 on every April 1st. In default of payment the defaulter is liable to be prosecuted, fined and even imprisoned. Not only that, his property will be attached and sold, if necessary. But into the details of these I need not enter here.

Now it is true that this bill professes to make no invidious distinction between the Europeans and the Indians, and the Indians, therefore, have no sentimental ground to oppose the bill. But when we remember that the number of British Indians affected by the levy of this new tax is nearly 25,000, while the Europeans can count scarcely 2,000, it will be clear that, in effect, the whole brunt of this tax will fall on the Indian section of the population and it is the Indians alone who will have to pay by far the largest portion of the proposed tax.

Again, most of the British Indians in East Africa are labourers and artisans and their monthly incomes vary from Rs. 15 to Rs. 45 only, whereas the Europeans form a wealthy class; they earn fat salaries. To the latter a yearly payment of Rs. 15 is not a burden. But to an Indian, whose monthly wages do not amount to more than Rs. 20 or 25 (the number of such Indians is very large) a poll tax of Rs. 15 means an unmitigated hardship. I cannot do better than quote from a memorial, submitted to the Governor of East Africa by the British Indian Community, protesting against the proposed tax.

"In the first place we would state that His Most Gracious Majesty rules over no subjects more dutiful, more faithful or more law-abiding than us your humble petitioners, and that we fully recognise that it is a duty incumbent upon us to bear a fair share in the cost of the administration of the Government of this Protectorate. In times past, we and our fathers before us have done our duty in opening up and developing the country and thus it is not now our desire to shirk responsibility in the future."

It will be noticed that while protesting as they do emphatically against the poll-tax, the British Indians are most willing to pay any other reasonable and equitable tax that Government may levy. The Memorialists further urge.—

"Your Excellency needs not to be informed that the British Indian Community is at least ten times more numerous than all the European population combined, so that consequently our fellow-countrymen would have to pay a greatly heavier percentage of the proposed tax, and this although we are denied equal rights and privileges as enjoyed by other communities.

"If wealth were equally distributed among all the members of the non-native population this might not be inequitable, but it is unnecessary to argue that such is not the case for it is a well-known fact to your Excellency, that the large majority of British Indians in the Protectorate are drawn from the poorest classes consisting of labourers and artisans, a class of the greatest importance at this time to the country, while on the other hand among European population few are to be found belonging to this class."

It is needless for me to say how odious and unpopular the very name of poll-tax is. It has got the most unsavoury historical associations. It at once calls to our mind the names of Richard II and Wat Tyler the rebel, of Aurangzeb and his Jazia. Historians, ancient and modern, have with one voice condemned a capitation tax levied in any country and in any time. Indiscriminate taxation is always fraught with possibilities of a serious mischief and cruel oppression on the population concerned. In East Africa the Indians are already struggling against the grave difficulties and disadvantages, resulting from a policy of unequal treatment and colour distinction. But this atrocious measure, if passed into law, will further reduce them to a state of utter poverty and starvation. It is understood that the third reading of the bill has been postponed till the next session of the Council, probably in deference to the opposition of the European Community, who oppose the bill on the well-known principle of "no representation, no taxation." They refuse to pay the tax, which is levied by a legislative council, where their interests are not represented. The Indians, too, have got the same ground to oppose the bill, though, in addition to it, they plead inability to pay such a heavy tax. I hope the East African Government will realise the disastrous consequences with which the bill is fraught and will drop it like a hot potato. It is a measure which is unpopular both with Europeans as well as the Indian element of the population. Its introduction has caused widespread unrest and deep anxiety among the Indian Community. It will lead to a strenuous opposition on the part of the people in future. I have, therefore, thought it necessary to enter an emphatic protest against the bill and bring the injustice to the notice of the Indian people and the British democracy. We can only wait to see whether the East African Government carries the outrageous bill in the teeth of such a strong popular opposition.

I have the honour of being the Indian Member of the local Legislative Council; and one would naturally ask why I should not attend the Council and there oppose this hateful measure. In fact one of the white papers "The Leader of B. E. A." has, while criticising my Appeal as a misguided one, actually accused me of shirking my duty by my continued non-attendance at the Council Chamber. To those who do not know the conditions in East Africa it would appear strange that instead of fighting within the Council I should have chosen to absent myself from the scene and to work for my countrymen either in England or in India. To such people I may say that my past experience does not encourage me to attend the Council. It is a hopeless task for a single Indian member to fight against tremendous odds. The Council is packed with a Government majority and European representatives. I found it to be a sheer waste of time and energy to fight against an interested majority who refuse to be convinced and to consider any other interests than their own. Hence, my absence from the Council Chamber.

Police Court Buildings.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE"

SIR,—If there is any one matter which calls for the immediate attention, indeed I should say, action of the Government, it is the unhealthy condition under which the Presidency Magistrates work from year's end to year's end. The rumour that the Police Courts were about to be transferred to the buildings where the Military Department was located was received by the Magistrates with satisfaction, by the practitioners with joy, by the public with approval. Hitherto the Chief Magistrates, who have been working under high pressure in a room devoid of ventilation, have suffered grievously. They have suffered in health and have had to seek a more healthy environment. The present incumbent, hard worked as he is, has borne the inconvenience so far, but is it possible for him to continue for long under circumstances so obviously adverse? The Chief Magistrate's room is crowded to suffocation from 10 A. M. to 12 noon, that is, till he has distributed the cases to his subordinates. Ought not he to have a room more spacious than the one he now occupies? But if the Chief Magistrate's room is had enough, what must one think of the rooms in which the 3rd, 4th and 5th Magistrates work? Only the other day I happened to be in the room where the 5th Magistrate dispenses justice. It is a dark, dingy room—cell would be the proper word for it. Nor are the 3rd and 4th Magistrates better off in this respect. It is perfectly scandalous that such things should be suffered to go on without being remedied at once. Is it any wonder that the Health Officer has declared the building to be absolutely unhealthy and unfit for human habitation? We have a number of public buildings to spare now. Why can the Police Courts not be transferred to one of them?

Objections have been raised to the removal of the Police Courts to the Military Secretariat buildings. They seem to be purely fanciful. It is suggested that the Curzon Park would become a den of thieves and pick-pockets and it is suggested that the fair face of Chowringhee would be polluted by the presence of the most undesirable sections of the community of Calcutta, viz, the criminal classes. It is suggested that we shall have cigarette sellers, betel sellers, biri wallahs roaming about the streets ad libitum. Indeed objections of a multitudinous character have been raised. But if Lall Bazar has not become a den of thieves and pick-pockets, why should we assume that Chowringhee will?

No! there is a reason for this protest which is made in the fair name of the public. The landlords will suffer. The rents might go down. It is this which is haunting the critics of the transfer of the Police Courts to the Military Secretariat buildings. Their selfishness is much too thinly veiled not to be detected and we trust that the Government will not be dissuaded from a measure which public policy imperatively demands.

Essays: Indian and Islamic

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE"

SIR,—In spite of our extensive knowledge, we, educated Indians, have not learnt the art of criticism and when we stumble over this field, we commit as many mistakes as are expected from a man who does not know what he is talking about. Mr. Ghulam us Saqlain's criticism gives us a typical example. Khwaja Saheb is famous throughout India owing to his historic war against the Moulavies. But I am afraid, he is better suited for gladiatorial combat, with the antiquated Lucknow Ulemas than for a fight with a poor business-like barrister, who, unlike Moulavies, has not the advantage of an Ulema.

Khwaja Saheb dislikes the use of the expression, "the founder of Islam," and denounces the idea that many Islamic dogmas were borrowed from Judaism and Christianity, because, in his opinion they refute the doctrine of وحي و الهام. But Mr. Saqlain forgets that the author is writing an historical essay and not a religious tract. It is not the province of history to enter the psychological regions and show how Mahomed was inspired, but to narrate plain statements without concerning itself with supernatural agencies. That many dogmas of Islam were taken from the earlier Semitic religions, is only too true to be denied and I do not think it is justice to abuse a man for his candour.

Another cause of Khwaja Saheb's annoyance is, that it may not pass for the average Muhammadan opinion. I do not think my esteemed friend, Mr. Salah-ud-din Khuda Baksh, presumes to express the opinion of the Muhammadan world. His essays are the result of his own reflection and judgment, which, fortunately, he is not sparing in imparting to the world at large.

The basis of Khwaja Saheb's criticism is a thing of the past. His contention is not on the historical ground, but on the religious.

Before denouncing the author in such strong terms, I think Khwaja Saheb would have done well to go through the book carefully.

News of the Week.

REUTER wires from Tangier on the 26th —One hundred and seventy-five of the Shereefian Cavalry encamped at Arcaona under the command of a French Captain have deserted with their arms and horses.

It appears that 51 Jews were killed and 36 wounded during the revolt at Fez.

Reuter wires from Paris on the 26th —Seven thousand Jews who escaped from the Fez massacre are completely ruined and have taken refuge in the Sultan's garden. The only shelter they can find is provided by empty cages in the Sultan's menagerie. Tents are being erected for those unable to find shelter.

Both France and Spain are largely reinforcing their troops in Morocco, where there is undoubtedly serious ferment, as exemplified in the rising at Fez, disaffection among the foreign drilled Moorish troops and a marked revival of activity among the Rifians.

Reuter wires from Paris on the 27th —General Lynskey had been appointed Resident-General in Morocco.

Despatches from Fez show that before signing the treaty with France granting that country a protectorate over Morocco, Mulai Hafid insisted on abdicating, declaring that he became Sultan as defender of Morocco against foreign intrusion. At the instance of the French Consul, however, he decided to await the arrival of M. Regnault in order not to show disrespect to France. When M. Regnault arrived, Mulai Hafid repeated his wish to abdicate, declaring that the French had deprived him of all power. Finally M. Regnault succeeded in gaining the Sultan's confidence and induced him to sign the treaty, pointing out that international necessities were involved.

Paris, April 1.

A telegram of yesterday's date from Uda states that at daybreak on Tuesday a force of about 2,500 Beni Warin Berbers made a fierce attack on a French reconnoitring party under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Feraud at Mahir Idza, on the Hannan river, to the west of Beni. Lieutenant-Colonel Feraud at once delivered a vigorous counter-attack and repulsed the Harka, pursuing straggling parties of fugitives for about six miles. The Harka left behind a large number of dead.

On the French side about 20 men were killed, including one officer and four non-commissioned officers and 61 wounded, including three officers and a non-commissioned officer. —(Reuter.)

Madrid, May 6.

In well-informed circles the belief is held that though the Franco-Spanish negotiations with regard to Morocco may suffer a temporary interruption, owing to the nature of the French demands, there is no fear of a diplomatic rupture. Spain knows that she has an impregnable position in the Treaty of 1904, and the tacit support of the Powers, who could hardly desire to see Morocco completely absorbed by France. Out of the 185,000 square kilometres recognised under the Treaty of 1904 as Spanish territory in Morocco, France demands the cession of 140,000 kilometres, and rather than submit to such a demand Spain would invoke arbitration.

Paris, March 26.

It is announced that the Minister for War has drawn up the following scheme for the composition of the Shereefian Army:—

The Shereefian Army will be under the command of a General or Lieutenant-General who will be subordinate to the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of occupation in Morocco and eventual Minister for War. The Army will consist, first, of the Shereefian Guard stationed at Fez and responsible for the security of the Sultan, and, secondly, of the Moroccan Army, which will co-operate with the French Army of occupation. The Guard, which will be commanded by a French officer assisted by a Kaid, will consist of the General Staff of the Guard, the Sultan's Band, two battalions of infantry, including one negro battalion of two companies, two squadrons of Cavalry, including one negro squadron, one mountain battery, and ambulance. The Moroccan Army will consist of nine Infantry battalions, five squadrons of Cavalry, four batteries of Artillery, one Engineer battalion, and commissariat.

Compulsory service will be imposed on the tribes as their administrative organisation proceeds in compensation for the advantages which they will obtain. In order to bring the Shereefian troops up to full strength by 1st January 1913, the enlistment of volunteers will continue.

(FROM THE "NEWCASTLE DAILY CHRONICLE.")

Confirmation has been received at the Quai D'Orsay of the report that Sultan Mulai Hafid has duly signed the treaty placing Morocco under the protectorate of France. The news is all the more satisfactory owing to the rumours recently circulated that the Sultan was in a strange mood, and that unexpected difficulties might be created by him and the Maghzen. M. Regnault has accomplished his task successfully and expeditiously, and it now remains for M. Geoffray in Madrid to complete his work. The Franco-Spanish negotiations seem happily to be taking a more favourable turn. France has agreed to renounce her claims to Cabo Agna, and the questions relating to the Spanish zone on the left bank of the river Lukkos and the basin of the Urgha are susceptible of arrangement with a show of good will on both sides. A satisfactory termination is, if not exactly in sight, not very far at any rate round the corner.

Paris, April 2.

It is announced that M. Regnault, the French Minister at Tangier, who has just obtained the signature of the Sultan of Morocco to the Treaty of Protectorate, has been nominated Commander of the Legion of Honour.

It is announced that the Treaty of Protectorate, while based on the Treaty of Bardo, also contains clauses analogous to those of the Convention of Marsa of 1883 and of the Decrees of 1884 and 1885, which explicitly established the French Protectorate in Tunis.

It is stated that the Sultan intends to have the Treaty explained and commented upon for the benefit of the principal tribes before it is formally published.

With regard to the reservation of the rights of Spain, it is said that as the situation is as yet uncertain, both as concerns the relations of Spain with France and of that Power with the Sultan, the French Minister has informed Mulai Hafid that the question will be decided by a later arrangement.

Madrid, April 2.

El Mundo to-day states that the French and Spanish Governments have reached an agreement regarding the bases of the Morocco Treaty now being negotiated between them. Spain, adds the newspaper, will renounce her claims in the plain of Urgha, and will also cede to France a broad belt of country on either side of the route of the proposed railway from Tangier to Fez. In exchange for these concessions, Spain obtains fresh territories to the north as the result of which the Spanish zone will be extended as far as Tetuan. —(Reuter.)

Paris, April 2.

Great satisfaction was felt in Paris the other day when news was received that Mulai Hafid, the Sultan of Morocco, and M. Regnault, the French Minister, had signed the Treaty whereby France assumed the protectorate of Morocco. Since the signing of the Treaty Mulai Hafid has granted an interview to the Matin's special correspondent at Fez. Referring to the question of the protectorate, Mulai Hafid expressed the joy he felt in collaborating in all sincerity in the task which France is about to undertake in Morocco.

"France," declared the Sultan, "will fulfil her task in Morocco with gentleness, persuasiveness, and benevolence."

"Certainly France is a powerful nation, which could impose her régime by force; but what would happen if she acted in that manner? She would dominate the people by fear and terror. Now that method would involve great sacrifice of men and money, and, in addition, when, for any reason whatever, there was a diminution of the forceful action, all those who had been kept in restraint would revolt."

"As for myself, I have the consciousness of having acted not only in the interests of my people, but also in accordance with the prescriptions of the Prophet. Mohammed has said, indeed, that everything that might improve the lot of the Mussulmans ought to be done."

(FROM THE "DAILY MAIL" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, April 3.

The Franco-Moroccan Treaty signed at Fez on Saturday contains eight articles placing Morocco under the protectorate of France.

guaranteeing respect of the natives' religious convictions and the prestige of the Sultan, providing for the military occupation of certain points by the French if deemed necessary, and defining the powers of the French Resident-General and the basis of financial re-organisation.

Breaking through all traditions of the Moorish Court, the Sultan insisted on signing the Treaty in person after the seal of the Empire had been affixed by the Hajib, or Minister of Justice. Although the Hajib was ill in bed on Saturday, he was made to get up, says the Matin's special correspondent at Fez, and, bearing an inkstand, a new pen, and the State seal, was escorted with great pomp to the presence of the Sultan, with whom were M. Regnault, the French Minister, and El Mokri, Moroccan Minister for Foreign Affairs.

In the evening the Sultan, who was in the best of humours again broke traditions by making his début as an after-dinner speaker at a grand banquet which he gave at the palace to the French Mission. There was a French menu, with champagne, and M. Regnault asked the Sultan if he would allow him to propose His Majesty's health. The Sultan smilingly assented, but reproached Ben Chabrit, one of his entourage, with not having remembered this important formality and with having allowed His Majesty to be caught unawares.

M. Regnault made his speech, and then, to the amazement of Moors and foreigners, the Sultan responded. He remained seated, but otherwise his impromptu speech, in which he remarked that he was unaccustomed to public speaking, was worthy of the best European traditions. After dinner, the company took coffee in an adjoining room to the strains of a royal orchestra and the French Traill band. Yesterday the Sultan invited M. Regnault and the French Army officers to a falcon hunt, which was a great success.

The Matin publishes to-day an interview with Mulai Hafid, who is reported to have insisted on the importance of France pursuing a policy of friendly persuasion. "Of course," he said, "France is a powerful nation and could impose the new régime by force, but the result would be that she would only assert her dominion by inspiring terror in the people. This method of procedure would cost her dear in men and money."

The Sultan declared that to ensure success France must utilise the Maghzen as her intermediary without delay. The Maghzen, he said, would be guided by the French Government, but, thanks to its knowledge of the customs of the country, it would be able to avoid much friction. France had already proved her generosity and her sympathy with Islam, and it was for this reason that he considered that he was acting not only in the interests of his country but in conformity with the words of the Prophet, who said that everything was right that made for the welfare of Mussulmans.

With regard to the attitude of the Moroccans Mulai Hafid is described as saying that the Arabs proper, who dwell in the plain would soon recognise the advantages of the new organisation as the tribes of the Shawia had done, but that the Berbers of the mountains, who had never acknowledged the authority of any Sultan, would only accept the French régime under compulsion. "It is for this reason," he concluded, "that I repeat that that task which France is undertaking is a task of organisation and of patience, and can only be the work of time."

Paris, April 4

The full text of the Protectorate Treaty, signed by the Sultan of Morocco, is published here to-day. An analysis of its provisions has been already published. The first clause states that the French Government and the Sultan "have agreed to establish in Morocco a new régime, entailing such administrative, judicial, educational, economic, financial, and military reforms as the French Government shall consider it desirable to introduce into the territory of Morocco." The protection of the Mussalman religion is guaranteed, and "a reformed Shereefian Makhzen" is to be organised.

The position of Spain and that of Tangier is summed up as follows: "The Government of the Republic will come to an agreement with the Spanish Government as to the interests which belong to this Government, in view of its geographical position and its territorial possessions on the Moroccan coast. Similarly, the town of Tangier will preserve the special character which has been recognised as belonging to it, and on which its municipal organisation will be based."

The second clause empowers the French Government to occupy with its troops, "after giving notice to the Makhzen," such portions of Moroccan territory as it may consider necessary, while the third clause promises the Sultan and his heirs the support of France, in case of any danger threatening the Throne.

The word "Protectorate" occurs only the fourth in clause, in which it is stated that in the measures necessitated by the new Protectorate régime will be promulgated on the proposal of the French Government by his Shereefian Majesty or by the authorities to whom he has delegated this power."

The fifth clause deals with the powers of the Resident Commissioner-General, who will be the Sultan's sole intermediary in all foreign relations. In particular he will be charged with the settlement of all questions concerning foreigners in the Shereefian Empire.

The sixth clause provides for the representation of Morocco abroad by the Diplomatic and Consular Agents of France, and the seventh for a financial reorganisation, of which the bases will be decided by common agreement, and which will guarantee the rights of the creditors of the Shereefian Empire, while enabling the Treasury to collect its revenues regularly.

In the eighth and last clause the Sultan undertakes to contract no loan of any kind without the authorisation of the French Government.

The Débats, in examining the Treaty in detail, remarks that its first and second clauses have obviously been influenced by the Franco-German Agreement of last November. It regrets that the organisation of a reformed Shereefian Makhzen should be included in its provisions, inasmuch as it should be the object of France to replace the authorities of the Makhzen by honest and competent officials and to extend by degrees the zones in which, as in the Shawia, it will be possible to organise a regular administration with the invaluable co-operation of the military element. After approving the clauses relative to the Spanish zone and Tangier, the Débats concludes: "There is every reason to hope that after the dangerous vicissitudes and troubles, due in the main to the blundering policy of the two last Cabinets, the international settlement of the Moroccan question will, thanks to the wisdom and firmness of M. Poincaré, be accomplished to the honour, if not to the complete satisfaction of France."

(FROM THE "PAUL MALL GALETTE" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Madrid, April 5

The final scenes connected with the passing of the "Empire of the Setting Sun" have been almost ludicrous.

At the last moment Muley Abdul Hafid has appeared to hesitate before signing a document which handed over Morocco lock, stock, and baggage to a European nation. His scruples, so we are told in Madrid, were overcome by the intercession of one of his official wives, daughter of his Minister, El Mockri. The latter, it should be remembered, has borne the brunt of the long-drawn-out negotiations in Paris and the Act of Algeciras.

Thus France has accomplished through Mulai Hafid's inter-mediation what she never could have obtained from his elder brother, Abdul Aziz—the Sultan's signature conceding a Protectorate.

Hafid is not without his misgivings regarding the effect that the publication of the news will produce throughout the Empire. He has already tried to throw on El Mockri's shoulders the blame for all that has happened since Algeciras authorised French intervention in certain circumstances. A stormy interview is reported to have taken place when the Minister arrived at Fez to prepare the French Minister's reception. At the end of the quarrel Hafid said to El Mockri: "Remember El Roghi. Would to God I could treat you in the same way."

It will be recalled that El Roghi was paraded through Morocco in a cage, and conveyed to Fez, where rumour says he was burnt alive.

For the present the Sultan professes great friendship towards the French Mission, and in a speech from the Throne expressed his belief in the future of his country and the benefits which would be conferred by French protection.

The proceedings wound up with a day's sport, in which M. Regnault saw how falconry is practised at Fez, a sport which, if we are to believe Dumas, began to decline in France about the time of Louis XIV.

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

A telegram to the Daily Chronicle from Constantinople on the 26th states that the Italian bombardment of the Dardanelles destroyed Kumkaleh Fort, killing 300 Turks.

Chartering business in consequence of the closing of the Dardanelles continues disorganised. A number of vessels en route for the Black Sea to load grain have been diverted elsewhere. Indian rates, in particular, are higher in consequence.

In the Duma, M. Sazonoff, Foreign Minister, delivered his maiden speech. He said, that the basis of Russian policy remained the French Alliance, assuring the peace of the world. The understanding with Britain had borne the best fruit. Russia also held fast to her traditional friendship with Germany. M. Sazonoff welcomed Lord Haldane's visit to Berlin as he welcomed every effort to improve Anglo-German relations.

He laid stress on the friendly relations between Russia and Italy. Russia, he said, did not see any danger of a general conflict in the Near East in Italian conduct in the Turco-Italian war. The bombardment of the Dardanelles was not accompanied by acts showing that Italy had departed from her idea of restricting operations and so did not affect the interests of neutrals. The closure of the Dardanelles had materially affected Russian commercial interests, and Russia had remonstrated at Constantinople.

Turning to Austria, M. Sazonoff said that, notwithstanding the strain to which Austro-Russian relations had been put, both Governments had succeeded in furthering the interests of peace by laying down guiding principles to be observed in the event of interests clashing. M. Sazonoff did not anticipate any immediate result from attempts to mediate in the Turco-Italian war. He regretted that the Cretans were attempting to bring about union with Greece by revolutionary methods. The Powers had determined, if necessary, to take stronger measures.

In conclusion M. Sazonoff said, there was no danger to peace in the near future.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on the 30th - The Foreign Minister has informed the Ambassadors that the Porte regrets that it is unable to comply with the request to re-open the Dardanelles in view of the possibilities of further attack by Italy, unless the Powers granted the security of the Straits.

The position is regarded as serious by diplomatists.

The Porte has replied to the Russian Memorandum of the 23rd instant asserting its treaty right to close the Straits and claiming that Turkey is the sole judge whether the Straits are menaced.

At question time in the House of Commons to-day, Mr. Mark Sykes suggested, that a local armistice should be arranged between Italy and Turkey in regard to the Dardanelles and so give an opportunity for the egress of detained ships into the Mediterranean. Mr. Acland said that Sir E. Grey had consulted the Powers regarding such a temporary measure being resorted to if the channel were not opened soon.

Reports received from Aden by last mail state the blockade of Hodeida by Italian warships has now extended to Saliff Camaran and the Farsan Islands. It is also said that an Italian warship is now going to blockade Korfudah which is the principal port of Osir. According to news just received from Perini by the Petim Coal Company's steamer two Italian cruisers are now again bombarding Dhuhah which is some distance from Mokha and also Shaikh Said which lies on the Straits Bab Al Mandeb.

Reuter wires from Smyrna on the 30th - The local steamer Texas struck a submarine mine yesterday evening at the entrance to the Gulf of Smyrna. The ship sank and 140 were drowned.

A message to the Times from Constantinople on the 30th states that 99 foreign merchantmen are now detained in the Dardanelles and the neighbouring waters. The value of their aggregate cargoes is estimated at four millions sterling. It is said that the vessels laden with maize may have to discharge their cargo owing to danger from heating.

Reuter wires from Vienna on the 30th - Count Von Berchtold, Minister for Foreign Affairs, addressing the Hungarian delegation to-day delivered a pacific speech emphasising the unchanged character of the Triple Alliance. It would be the Government's sincere endeavour to cultivate good relations with Great Britain now that the misunderstanding which had arisen for a moment over the annexation of Bosnia had passed away.

With reference to the Dardanelles he pointed to Italy's assurance at the beginning of the war that she intended to maintain the status quo in the Balkans and he had every reason to believe that Italy would not depart from these assurances. In the meantime Government had intimated to the Porte that they hoped that the Dardanelles would be re-opened as soon as imminent danger was over.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on the 30th - The estimates of loss of life on the steamer Texas vary. It appears that many were injured by the explosion.

In the House of Commons, Mr. Acland announced that Government was very much concerned at the loss to shipping owing to the closing of the Dardanelles. Sir Edward Grey had made urgent representations with a view to reaching an arrangement for freeing traffic. It was impossible, Mr. Acland said, in time of war to protect neutral commerce from all loss or to procure compensation in all cases, but Government would make every effort to prevent further loss.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on the 1st that the Cabinet decided to re-open the Dardanelles, reserving the right to close them again in case of necessity.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on the 1st - While a tug was inspecting the buoys in the Dardanelles, it fouled a mine and was blown to atoms. Four officers, twelve soldiers and the crew were drowned. The disaster has created a profound impression and subscriptions have been opened in aid of the families of the victims.

The Vah of Smyrna reports on the 2nd that the battery fired two blanks, warning the steamer Texas that she was deviating from her proper course, but the vessel took no notice. Consequently seven shells were fired, dropping round the Texas, which then struck a mine and sank in two minutes. The Military Commander says that 69 were drowned and 15 injured.

In the House of Lords, Lord Newton asked if the Government had addressed any representation to Italy on the subject of the closing of the Dardanelles?

Lord Morley, in reply, said he did not deny the disastrous situation in the Black Sea and the Dardanelles. The Government had been in constant communication with the Turkish and Italian Governments with the result that, after no unreasonable length of time, considering the difficulties of the Porte, the Straits would be re-opened. It was unreasonable to ask the Government to prescribe the limits in which Turkey and Italy should carry on operations. That would be going beyond anything ever conceived in international law or diplomatic usage. The Government had thoroughly performed the duties of a neutral Power. Lord Lansdowne asked if it was true that the Porte would only re-open the Straits if Italy promised not to re-attack the Dardanelles? Lord Morley replied - "That assertion is quite inconsistent with the words used to the British Ambassador."

Constantinople, March 31

The Sultan has conferred the Grand Cordon of the Osmanieh Order upon M. Tcharykoff, the retiring Russian Ambassador, and the First Class of the Nishan-i-Shefakat Order upon Mme. Tcharykoff. The Ambassador will leave Constantinople to-morrow.

Cairo, April 6.

Edhem Pasha, hitherto Turkish commander at Tobruk, has arrived at Cairo. His Excellency is not in good health and intends to stay in Egypt some time, but hopes ultimately to return to the seat of war. He left his post about a fortnight ago, travelling hither by way of Sollum, where he embarked for Alexandria. During his absence the command at Tobruk devolves upon Nazim Bey.

The Turkish commander takes a most optimistic view of the Turkish position in Tripoli and Cyrenaica. In the course of conversation he informed me that at present the total number of Turkish troops engaged at Derna, Tobruk, Bengazi and Tripoli is 10,000, and they are assisted by some 200,000 Arabs. The latter, who have in many cases brought their wives, are under the orders of their respective sheikhs, to each of whom a Turkish officer is attached. All possess rifles and ammunition, taken to a great extent from the Italians. They are fired by an implacable spirit of revenge against the Italians; consequently few prisoners are taken. Edhem Pasha estimates the number at less than 100. With their present stock of provisions the Turks reckon that they are able to hold out for a year at least, but in addition they have been favoured with exceptionally good crops.

While paying the highest tribute to the behaviour and courage of the Italian officers, the Turkish commander has but a slight opinion of the men, while an enormous quantity of ammunition is expended by the guns of the fleet with very little effect. Much use is apparently made in reconnaissance of aeroplanes which drop bombs; recently one of the bombs narrowly missed Edhem's tent. On the other hand, the Turks succeeded in bringing down an Italian aeroplane at Benghazi a few days ago. For some time past little beyond skirmishes has taken place at Tobruk, where the Italian and Turkish lines are 12 kilometres apart. The Turco-Arabs are said to be longing to fight, and in hopes of bringing about a battle Edhem recently sent a letter to the Italian commander taunting him with inaction.

During the past six weeks the position of the invaders at Tobruk has been rendered more difficult in consequence of a fear, which appears well founded, that poison has been thrown down the artesian wells which have been sunk. The Italians there are said to be now obliged to bring all the water for animals and men from Italy. The hot days are at present relieved by fresh nights, but the approaching summer is looked forward to by the Turks as an additional weapon on their side.

In regard to Senussi assistance, Edhem Pasha states that camels and horses have been sent to Kufra to bring the Sheikh el Senussi to Jaghub, but it is not known whether he has left.

Enver Bey's wound appears to have been very slight, and the Turkish commander at Derna is believed now to be in the best of health.

Shortly after his arrival at Cairo Edhem Pasha paid a visit to Lord Kitchener.

The Avanti reports from Piacenza that an anti war demonstration took place in the chief open space there, got up by the reservists of 1889, who are just being mobilised. The men shouted "We want to go to our homes! Down with the war! Down with Tripoli!"

The Tripoli correspondent of the Vossische Zeitung, writing on April 4, says that gladness and jubilation reign in the Turco-Arab camp at Funduk Ben Gasir on account of the arrival of a numerous deputation from Tunis bringing with them money, provisions, arms, and ammunition which have been collected in the Regency.

Salonica, April 11

With all customary pomp and sacrifice David Bey, Minister of Public Works, this afternoon laid the foundation stone of the long-awaited central station. It is anticipated that the station will be completed in two years.

In private conversation, the Minister stated that he hopes speedily to complete arrangements for the construction of the line to the Greek frontier.

It is evident from Mail news that Italy made an attempt to force the Dardanelles with the object of bombarding Constantinople immediately. Before the House of Commons rose one night in Mail week, Mr. Lloyd George made the following statement: "A telegram received from His Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople states that he is informed by the Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs that an Italian squadron attacked the outer parts of the Dardanelles and the Minister states the action is still continuing. Telegrams received from Constantinople state that Turkish forts replied to the bombardment which lasted two and a half hours, and that the Italian fleet afterwards sailed away with one ship put out of action. Owing to this action on the part of Italy, while the Powers were awaiting the reply of Turkey to peace proposals which they invited three days ago, the Turkish Government has liberated the mines in the Straits which are now closed to all shipping."

A Constantinople telegram asserts that the Turkish losses are only one soldier wounded and one horse killed.

Salonica, 31st March

The Committee of Union and Progress has been upbraided on all sides for not having effected a great revolution in all the Departments of the Ottoman Government immediately after it took the reins of power in its hands and not having built Rome in a day. But even assuming these charges to be true, cannot all that the members of the Committee are doing in Tripoli to-day be a sufficient expiation of even the blackest sins of a political party?

What devotion can be more acceptable than self-sacrifice for a patriotic cause, and not only to man but to God also, who loves nothing more than justice. When the Italian ironclads had first opened fire in pursuance of a brigandage in the shape of war, what was every Ottoman seeing but wild visions of despair? But now the meaning of those visions is the victory of the victim and the depression of the aggressor and the aggrieved. Have not the members of the Committee in the main been the instruments of this change, who were but till yesterday called the betrayers of their nation and the enemies of their country? When the war was declared Enver Bey left Berlin with these words — "Europe will presently be surprised to have a new experience of the Ottoman spirit and Arab valour," and now he seeks the justification of his boast in the Ottoman camp at Derna. The reader may remember that immediately after the declaration of the war that famous member of the Committee, Ali Fethi Bey, had started with a party en Tunis. It was rumoured that he had been stopped by the French Government, but after a few days he was seen in the theatre of war and with his arrival there occurred a decided turn in the course of the war. Like him Omar Naji Bey, Mustafa Kamal Bey, Nuri Bey, Abdul Karim Bey, Osmar Bey, and several other prominent members of the Committee continued reaching the seat of war one after the other, and it is they who have by their doings thrown the world into amazement. The story of the difficulties that they had to encounter in reaching Tripoli and of the strange ways they have had to adopt in saving themselves from detection or capture will be considered as one of the wonders of the twentieth century. Although the enemy is the virtual master of the sea and the doors of Egypt and Tunis are closed, still there are hundreds of Ottoman officers and members of the Committee of Union and Progress in Tripoli at the present time.

Mr. McCullagh and an Italian Duellist.

MR. FRANCIS MCCULLAGH, the war correspondent whose exposure of the barbarities of the war in Tripoli caused some stir at the end of last year, has been challenged to fight a duel by the poet Marinetti, the leader of the Futurists.

"The duel will not come off."

A few afternoons ago a motor-car with the poet and two other men in it was driven up to Mr. McCullagh's solitary house, which stands in an isolated spot on the Surrey Downs, quite three miles from the nearest police station. Mr. McCullagh was busy at the time on his forthcoming and frank book, "Italy's War for a Desert."

The three men approached the house and told the maid they wanted to see Mr. McCullagh. Descending from his study upstairs the war correspondent found his visitors in the hall. Said one, who afterwards proved to be the correspondent of an Italian newspaper, speaking in French: "We have some very painful business with you." "Let us discuss it inside, whatever it is," answered Mr. McCullagh in the same language, and he led the way into the drawing-room where all seated themselves.

No sooner inside than Marinetti, a tall, well-set-up man, produced a copy of The Nation, pointed to an article, and asked Mr. McCullagh, with a threatening air, if he wrote it.

"I did" was the reply.

The poet seemed to have expected a denial. He repeated the question several times, and meeting with the same answer each time jumped suddenly to his feet and began tearing about the room, waving his hands above his head and saying fiercely, "I must have a duel with you."

"Don't you agree with the things I have said in the article?" asked Mr. McCullagh.

"I don't," said Marinetti, and he went on to deny that Mr. McCullagh had ever been in the oasis at all during those terrible events, which he described in his own language and words as "il dramma sinistro della repressione" (The sinister drama of repression). The oasis, by the way, is not more than a quarter of a mile from the only hotel in the town, the Hotel Minerva, where all the war correspondents stayed.

The war correspondent invited the poet to write to The Nation explaining his point of view. Upon this Marinetti threw The Nation to the ground, stamped on it, and said there was only one way to answer the article. He left no doubt of his meaning that Mr. McCullagh was to expiate his offence in a duel.

The third man, who proved to be a well-known Futurist painter, chimed in "If you don't fight a duel," he said, "we shall attack you now."

Mr. McCullagh for a moment thought wistfully of the Browning he brought back from Russia (he bought it during the revolution there). It was in its case in his study upstairs. But his ready wit came to the rescue and he began to dissemble.

"This is not the right way to go about arranging a duel," he protested. "You ought to have sent some friend to me, and I would have named a friend, and they could have discussed the matter together."

Marinetti threw down his card with his Milan address printed on it and the name of his London hotel in pencil.

Marinetti's last words, uttered with the air of a villain in grand opera, were "In any case we shall meet again."

The Futurist painter ground his teeth. Mr. McCullagh rang the bell. The maid, alarmed out of her life by the hullabaloo of men speaking in loud and angry tones and in a tongue unknown to her, opened the door for them.

Next day Mr. McCullagh called at the hotel. Marinetti had left London.

"It was a pathetic incident," said Mr. McCullagh yesterday to the Daily Sketch, "because they made such asses of themselves. But there is a serious side. It was an attempt to extend their war censorship to England."

"Some people think that there is a temptation for war correspondents to rush into print with atrocity stories but it is quite the other way about. It is to the interest of journalists to have free entry into every country and to be greeted in friendly manner by all the local correspondents and local associations of the Press. But in this case it would be dangerous for anyone who has criticised the Italians to go back to Italy, and some correspondents have been expressly warned never to attempt to come back. The actual expression used to one distinguished German correspondent who criticised in quite a moderate way their method of conducting the campaign was 'You must not show your face in Rome again.'"

"This war is a war largely brought about by Futurists and Impressionists, and that is why it has been so gigantic a failure. In the early days of the campaign you couldn't throw a stone in Tripoli city without hitting a Futurist or an Impressionist. They were acting as correspondents for Italian newspapers."

In spite of this dramatic warning Mr. McCullagh means to say what he knows in "Italy's War for a Desert"—Daily Sketch.

Turkey and Peace Proposals.

TURKEY'S attitude with respect to the overtures made to her with a view to ending the war in Tripoli is outlined in an interview which the Daily Chronicle's special correspondent at Constantinople recently had with Assini Bey, the Turkish Minister for Foreign Affairs:—

"I will tell you, and you can tell the world," said the Turkish Minister, "why Turkey has been unable to make peace. Speaking on behalf of my country and of the Government, I say no one regrets the outbreak of this war more than we do. We regard it as a blow to civilisation and to human progress. Turkey, unjustly and wantonly attacked, relies upon the moral support of the people of Europe, being content to leave her cause to their impartial judgment. When I took office, the conflict had already begun, and Turkey had a powerful and unscrupulous enemy gripping at her throat."

"Some critics abroad are beginning to ask why we did not consider the Italian proposals and attempt to conclude peace. It is because the conditions submitted for our acceptance, as a preliminary to any discussions, were impossible and dishonourable. No Cabinet of to-day or to-morrow could ever entertain such a proposal as that embodied in the formal recognition of the annexation of Tripoli. Any Turkish statesman who gave ear to such a proposition would richly deserve whatever punishment his betrayed country thought fit to inflict upon him. This is why, as far as Turkey is concerned, peace at this moment is impossible. The Italian conditions preclude it. We do not wish for peace at any price. If I may point out to the Italian Government and the Italian Parliament, countries are not conquered by Royal decrees of annexation."

"I speak in no angry or provocative sense towards Italy, her Government or her people, but I say frankly she is in an impasse. If she seeks a way out and be sincerely desirous of peace the decree of annexation must first be torn up. After this pourparlers between the Governments of the two countries will be possible. The Great Powers have been very sympathetic towards Turkey, but even they cannot compel us to make peace against our will, and to accept terms which would cover us with shame and dishonour."

"I say to the civilised world, on behalf of Turkey, we are ready to treat with Italy, but it must be on an honourable basis. It is our ardent wish to be permitted to work in peace for the regeneration of our country. Turkey needs repose and tranquillity, but she has not been allowed to enjoy it. No one can truthfully say that Turkey has ever waged an aggressive war or coveted an inch of territory belonging to her neighbours. When our national prospects looked the brightest, we were suddenly attacked. The Turkish people have not, and never will, lose courage or hope. The Italians may imagine that our existence is at an end; but, if so, they are grievously deceiving themselves. Our people are patient, united, and determined in the present war."

"Turkey as a nation has not yet begun to fight. I regret that a nation like Italy, with her splendid past and her heritage of civilisation, should have committed such an act of brigandage as the invasion of Tripoli. Italy now threatens to take sterner measures, and to carry the war into European Turkey if we continue to resist her unlawful and preposterous demands. Let Italy continue to bombard our fortified and defenceless town, let her, if she dares, attempt the passage of the Dardanelles. Let us admit the impossible—that she forces the Straits and even bombards Constantinople. What then? When she presents her dishonourable conditions afresh we will fling them back in her face. For never! no, never!" added His Excellency emphatically, "will any Turkish Government accept them."

"Turkey has no fleet, it is true; but she has an army. The day Italy invades our European provinces we meet on equal ground. Judging by previous Italian campaigns, we need have no fear of the result of the encounter when her army meets ours. No Italian soldier who sets foot on the soil of European Turkey will ever leave it again unless by permission of the Turkish army."

"We have our faults, as have all nations, but our bitterest enemy never charged us with lack of courage. We have been accused of being an unenlightened race, and the enemies of progress, as recognised in the West. This is one of the reasons why Italy felt compelled to annex Tripoli. What enlightenment, and what progress does she talk of implanting in Tripoli? Can it be those which prevail in Calabria and Sicily? With our slender revenues and poor resources, we have done our best to regenerate the country and to build up a strong and enlightened nation."

"How do our attempts compare with those of Italy? Her splendid resources and vast revenues have been devoted, not to the moral uplifting of the masses of Calabria and Sicily, but to the raging of a war and conquest more shameful than the civilised world has ever before seen. This is the nation that has undertaken to carry the blessings of civilisation into a Turkish province. We need no Italian civilisation. We respectfully recommend her to try it on her own people at home. Turkey has been magnanimous to the Italian subjects in Turkey. I wish I could say that Italy treated ours equally as well. Any nation worthy of respect would not dream of suggesting harsh and dishonourable terms to a valiant and unbroken foe."

"I want to make it quite clear to Europe and to the world in general why we cannot listen to the Italian demands. We are sworn to protect and maintain the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. The cession of Tripoli is a religious as well as a national question. Were we to hand over Tripoli the Khalifate, in the eyes of the Moslem world, would become a thing of derision something that stood for the betrayal of the cause of Islam. In justice to our country, our people, and to that army which is so nobly fighting the invader, we cannot discuss the cession of a Turkish province. What is more, we will not. This is our final word on the subject."

"What would the English people say if its Government engaged in a war in one of its distant possessions and with its army still unbeaten and the rest of the empire unconquered handed its possession over to a Foreign Power? This is our position to-day. This war is a great danger to the peace of Europe, but that is entirely the affair of Italy. Europe must judge her accordingly. As Italy has sown, so must she reap. We have the greatest sympathy with the Italian people. In speaking thus, I do not do so in a vindictive and bellicose spirit, or with the intention of wounding Italian national pride. I speak fearlessly and firmly, as I hope to act fearlessly and unflinchingly, because I believe it to be the duty of my country."

"In the future, as in the past Turkey relies on the right and justice of her cause to ensure her the support and sympathy of the civilised world. With her own trusty sword she will defend her shores, her liberty, and her national integrity, now seriously menaced. War is a terrible evil. Attacked as we were, we would have been detestable cowards, unworthy of the Osmanli name, if we did not defend ourselves. Turkey has been much touched by the disinterested sympathy of representatives of certain Great Powers which proffered friendly counsel with a view to ending the war. I can only say, now, as the Turkish Government has said from the beginning, in reply to these overtures: 'We thank you, and are very grateful. But please do not suggest to us terms which you yourselves, as men of honour, would be unable to accept on behalf of your respective countries.'"

Situation of the Italians.

REUTER'S representative has had an interview with Mr. G. F. Abbott, who has been with the Turkish headquarters in Tripoli since December last. Mr. Abbott left the Turks on 12th March, and after an adventurous journey on foot, in the course of which he was lost in the desert, was robbed by Arabs, and finally imprisoned by an Arab garrison, reached London by way of Tunis. Mr. Abbott said:

"I have spent about four months with the main Turkish and Arab forces in the desert round the town of Tripoli, with a view to writing a book on the war. When my work is published the world will hear a good many things it will find hard to believe; for the Italians have, as I have discovered since I returned to Europe, succeeded in creating an entirely false impression as to the real situation. Meanwhile, I can only give you a brief summary of my own impressions.

"Had the Italians followed up their occupation of the town of Tripoli by a vigorous advance along the coast and into the interior, I have no doubt that they would have been able to possess themselves within a month of all the territory as far south as the Ujbal (mountains). The Turks had lost their prestige among the natives by evacuating the capital. The Arab recruits had deserted them en masse. The Arab population was ready to submit to the invader without striking a blow. Indeed, in several places, like Azizia and Zenzur, which now are Turkish camps, they had hastened to hoist the white flag. For a few weeks the small Italophile party of influential natives in the town of Tripoli had it all their own way. No resistance seemed possible. Unfortunately for themselves the Italians missed the psychological moment. As is clear from their subsequent behaviour, they had come to Tripoli prepared to annex and not to conquer, and they wasted their time in changing the status of the country on paper instead of occupying it with garrisons.

"The blunder of the Italians gave the Turks and the Arab patriots time to rally. Fervid appeals were made to the population to rise in defence of their country and faith. The population responded with admirable spirit. The white flags were hauled down, and the first contingents of Arab volunteers began to arrive from the interior. Then came the massacres at Tripoli to fan the Arab spirit into fierce flames. From that moment submission became as impossible as resistance had at first seemed to be. From that moment, too, the position of the Italians has been growing weaker and that of their enemies stronger. More and more volunteers, some on horseback, most on foot, are daily flocking up from the south to fight under the Sultan's flag, and week after week I saw these warriors, who at first had little besides bravery to qualify them as soldiers, learning the rudiments of discipline and tactics and the use of modern rifles. The attitude of these men can be summed up in one sentence, which is constantly on their lips: 'We shall go on fighting as long as there is one drop of blood left in our veins.' That this is not an empty piece of rhetoric I am convinced by repeated personal experience. I have seen Arabs wounded two, three, four, or five times, and each time immediately the wound was healed, returning to fight again.

"From the material point of view also the position of the Turks has been steadily improving and that of the Italians as steadily deteriorating since the beginning of the war. At first the Turks had neither money nor provisions—a piece of bread or a handful of stale dates was about all they could find to eat, and a packet of twenty cigarettes that normally cost twopenny had to be bought for two shillings. Gradually contributions from all over the Mahometan world—Turkey in Europe and Asia, Egypt, Tunis, Algeria, and so forth—began to come in, and caravans of all sorts began to cross the frontier. Even volunteers from Tunis, Algeria, and the desert beyond Ghadames came to join us, shouting 'Allah yansur es-Sultan!' (God save the Sultan). The French authorities cannot arrest this stream without running the risk of a rebellion of their own subjects, so profound is the enthusiasm aroused by this last attack of the Cross on the Crescent.

"Besides help from outside, this year's rains, after four years of drought, have been of immense benefit to the fighting Arabs. I saw the desert rapidly transforming itself into a beautiful meadow under my eyes, and for some months past the flocks of sheep and goats that abound in Tripolitania have been fattening on luscious grass, with the result that I ate better mutton in the interior of Tripoli than I had ever tasted in the best restaurants of London. And that is not all. The Italians have given time to the Arabs of the various oases to till and sow their fields, and when the crops are harvested in June they will afford a supply of food that will make the forces of the Crescent independent of provisions from outside. On the other hand, the Italians, penned up in the town and its immediate environs, have, since all communication with the interior is cut off, been all this time obliged to rely entirely on supplies imported from Europe. From the point of view of health also, to one sick Arab you will probably find ten Italians, for while the former are in the open desert, the pure air of which counteracts in a large measure the causes that make for disease, the latter are doomed to breathe the polluted atmosphere of an insalubrious and congested Oriental town. All these conditions will be accentuated as the months creep on and the summer with its terrible heat and the suffocating sirocco succeeds to the comparative coolness of the spring. Had the Italians advanced during the winter when the climatic conditions were in their favour, and when, owing to the calls of agriculture, most of the Arab volunteers were obliged to stay at home, they might conceivably have done something. The fact that they have not quitted their fortified trenches has not only made advance now impossible but has induced the Arabs to believe that the Italians are lacking in courage.

"In the circumstances the struggle, so far as the Arabs are concerned, can continue indefinitely. Even if the Porte is compelled by troubles nearer home to conclude peace, they declare that this will make no difference to them. 'We will never submit to this invader,' was said to me a few days ago by a venerable old sheikh of 67, and he concluded his passionate speech with a solemn appeal to 'Allah, up there,' pointing to the blue heavens above. Personally, I have seen enough of Arab valour—a gallant disdain of death such as I do not expect ever to see among Europeans—to believe in the absolute sincerity of this declaration. A similar spirit prevails among the Turkish officers. Many among them have assured me that, in the event of peace between their own Government and Italy, they will simply throw up their commissions and go on fighting."

National Unity in Turkey.

SENATOR SULEIMAN-EL-BUSTANI BEY, who is visiting the capitals of Europe and is now at St Petersburg, has granted an interview to a representative of the Avocat du Peuple with whom he frankly discussed the situation in Turkey. He has no official mission, but he has seen M. Sazonoff and submitted to him the views prevailing in political quarters in Constantinople. Speaking about the war, he said, "We, the Turks, will not cede a single inch of our soil, and will fight to the last drop of blood. Of course we have to reckon with the wishes of the Powers and should they put the question squarely we should go to arbitration and be prepared to negotiate for the settlement of the complicated business. We should perhaps be prepared to make economic concessions in the two provinces which form the object of the unjust aspirations of Italy, but under no circumstances will Turkey cede the Sultan's suzerainty over Tripoli and Cyrenaica. I am not speaking of the religious suzerainty of the Sultan; the whole of Europe could do nothing in this direction. I am speaking of the administrative position of the Sultan in the provinces, and I can tell you that as against Italy's usurpation in this direction we are all united and will fight to the utmost limits of our power.

"Much has been said about the internal situation in Turkey. I can tell you that in my opinion Turkey, on the termination of the war with Italy, will have to erect her a commemorative monument and celebrate her service to our country. We must do what has never been done before in the history of nations. We must glorify the enemy with whom we have fought for life and death. Indeed, Italy has accomplished within the space of a few months what we ourselves could have achieved only in the course of many, many years. Italy has united all the various nationalities of the Ottoman Empire, and has inspired them with the great idea of unity and the consciousness of their duty. Had we, the Turks, possessed a great navy we should have been in a position now to send to the African provinces a million volunteers from all parts of the Empire, who would have been ready to die for their country.

"I draw your attention to the fact that it is I, a Christian, who say all this, and therefore my words may be taken as expressing impartially the temper of the masses of the people."

In the course of a conversation with another journalist, the representative of the Reich, Bustani Bey also touched upon the domestic situation in Turkey. "Europe," he declared, "knows us insufficiently. Most of her information about Turkey reaches her from unreliable sources. Every insignificant event is transformed by the European press into a fact of the first magnitude and then all the world begins to talk about reaction, anti-constitutional conspiracies, and so forth. Of course not everything proceeds in our country as would be desirable. There is no doubt that we have in our midst a handful of reactionaries who are thirsting after the restoration of the old régime. But where, in what country, are not such reactionaries to be found? The majority of them have long since lost the confidence of the people and are but little noticed. All the efforts of the Government are at present directed towards one end—to place the country on the path of peaceful cultural development, and, thank God, we are moving already—slowly, it is true, but still moving. Gradually the old wounds which used to destroy the national soul are disappearing, and the pretext for national feuds, which caused the intervention of Europe in former times are being eliminated one by one."—Manchester Guardian

The Dardanelles.

TURKEY'S attitude in regard to the question of the re-opening of the Dardanelles must command the sympathy of all fair-minded people. She has replied to the Powers that she is unable to comply with their requests to re-open the Straits unless the Powers guarantee their security; and to Russia she has given a more emphatic answer, asserting her treaty right to close the Straits, and claiming, very rightly, that she is the sole judge as to whether the Straits are menaced. In the case of any other two Powers being at war and in similar circumstances, the action now taken by Turkey would have been taken at the very outbreak of warlike operations. That the Straits were not closed at the beginning of the war was due to Italy's assurance that she intended to restrict the scope of her operations with a view to avoiding embarrassment to neutral Powers. Now that Italy has wantonly provoked the closing of the Straits, it would be monstrous for any Power to attempt to force Turkey into re-opening them without proper guarantees. The suggestion made in the House of Commons, in regard to which Mr. Asquith said that Sir Edward Grey had been in consultation with the Powers, that a local armistice should be arranged between Italy and Turkey, so as to give an opportunity for an egress to detained vessels into the Mediterranean, is a reasonable one, and no doubt the Porte would agree to this. It is to be hoped, further, that Italy will offer guarantees which will enable Turkey to re-open the Straits permanently and thus put an end to a situation which can do Italy no good, and which is not calculated to increase her popularity in Europe. (Statesman.)

The Russian Foreign Policy.

The new Russian Foreign Minister was able to take a very optimistic view, from the Russian standpoint, of the situation in Europe in his maiden speech in the Duma. The French alliance, says M. Sazonoff, continues to assure the peace of the world. The understanding with Britain has borne the best fruit. Russia has held fast to her traditional friendship with Germany, and welcomes the attempted Anglo-German rapprochement while even Austro-Russian relations have successfully stood the strain of clashing interests. Stress was also laid on the friendly relations between Russia and Italy. Only Turkey and unhappy Persia seem to be excluded from M. Sazonoff's otherwise comprehensive benediction. The former has earned displeasure by the closing of the Dardanelles, but Italy, in provoking that act, it must be noted, has behaved, according to M. Sazonoff, with perfect propriety. The bombardment of the Dardanelles, he says, was not accompanied by acts showing that Italy had departed from her idea of restricting operations, and thus did not affect the interests of neutrals. One does not know what further acts Italy could have committed in this respect beyond the actual bombardment, which sufficed, in itself, to produce the very natural reprisal on the part of Turkey of closing the Straits. Thus, the cause M. Sazonoff regards with equanimity, and for it he is prepared to give Italy a certificate of acquittal, but the effect, which was inevitable, produces remonstrances at Constantinople. This attitude towards the two combatants is highly significant. As for Persia, M. Sazonoff has the grace to admit that it is due to the agreement with Great Britain that no extraordinary complications need be apprehended and he attributes the unsatisfactory relations between Russia and Persia to the irreconcilability of the Nationalists towards Russia. It would be well, however, if M. Sazonoff could realise that this irreconcilability has been provoked by Russian action and that the situation in Persia would be far less satisfactory if that action had not been held in check by Great Britain. — The Statesman

Italian Action and Arab Sentiment.

(FROM A "TIMES" CORRECTION.)

Seneca's Burnt Alibi, March 27.

For the moment the only sign of activity on the Italian side is the dropping of 10-centimetre bombs from dirigibles. Four of their airships have just passed over the Arab camp and dropped 11 bombs, with which three men have been wounded, thus doing more damage than has been usual in such cases. However, such mischief is not likely to increase, for now when they see an airship approaching, the Arabs scatter immediately. It is not by such methods or such warfare as this that the Italians will ever conquer Tripoli. Bombs dropped from the sky, even when (as not often occurs) they do any damage at all, can have no practical effect upon a campaign, and do far more harm to the Italian cause than they do to the Turks or Arabs. They serve only to exasperate the bitterness of feeling with which the Arabs already regard their invaders. The former say that the Italians dare not come out into the open and fight them like men, hence, they revenge themselves in these small ways. They are under the impression that bombs are forbidden in civilized warfare and that Italy in making use of them is acting in a way unworthy of a civilized nation. The voice of every Arab you meet is raised in this chorus of condemnation. It is not for me to criticize the actions or policy of Italy, but I am here to write of what I see and hear. It is well also that people should know what Turks and Arabs say and think, since whether this be correct or incorrect it foreshadows the probable course of their action and resistance.

Public opinion in Tripoli—and since the Arabs are great talkers and news among them travels very rapidly, public opinion is formed there without a Press—public opinion in favour of Italy was not properly cultivated before the war began. Since then the actions and policy of Italians, at any rate as reported, have not been such as to repair the mistake. From Tunis to Aziziah the country rings with tales of wanton destruction committed by the Italians, of the massacre of defenceless men, the slaying of women and small children, even children at the breast. Give a dog a bad name and you may as well hang him. Military operations may have required the cutting down of the orange and other fruit trees round Tripoli. The Arabs regard it, however, as petty revenge. As to whether the tales of bloodshed referred to are true, partly true, or wholly false, is a matter of no importance from the point of view of their effect upon the war. The point is that the Arabs believe them implicitly, that these tales have now penetrated into the ends of the desert and the Sudan (whence reinforcements are consequently beginning to arrive in larger and larger numbers), and that they have aroused in their believers undying hatred of the Italians.

There is another very strong motive which incites the Arab to regard an Italian occupation of Tripoli with disfavour. It is the widespread belief that Italy is poor. An Italian here or in Tunis will work for as little as an Arab. The Arab is no fool in what concerns himself personally. He thinks that a people as poor as he believes his would-be conquerors to be would not respect his title to his small possessions, and would create a killing competition for him in all those occupations wherein at present he gains a meagre existence. The Arab is perhaps not much concerned with patriotism in its broader aspect. Guarantee him his reasonable freedom, the security of his wife and children, and of his little possessions, and it may not affect him greatly who rules the country. But for home and family he will fight to the last. The leaflets dropped by the Italians from their aeroplanes stating that France and England were anxious to divide Tripoli, that Italy was the greatest, the strongest, and the richest power in Europe, that she was anxious to befriend and teach the Arabs, etc., are laughed at. Among other beliefs the Arabs hold is one that the Italians themselves are far behind the rest of Europe, and many of them quite as much in need of civilization and instruction as the Tripolitans. Whether public opinion in Tripoli has been cleverly cultivated by the astute Turks, or whether it results from prejudiced imagination and chance, it is not worth while to discuss. For Turkish interests it could not have been better formed by the cleverest and best organized department in the world. It has arrayed the people like one man against their invaders, and quadrupled Italy's difficulties.

The longer the struggle lasts, the more men will flock to the Crescent from the interior. The Arab version of the massacre, and of other reported excesses upon the part of the Italians, has now travelled into the desert and the Sudan. Recruits and reinforcements, with promises of more, are daily pouring into camp. El Senussi, the mysterious Sheikh, who wields such power in the interior, has formally declared war against the Italians, inscribing his proclamation in a thousand words upon a silken banner. A small contingent of the advanced guard of the forces he is sending arrived two days ago in Aziziah—a useful looking lot of fighters—tall, lithe fellows, brown and muscular. Their Sheikh led them brandishing a naked sword. In the middle of the front rank of some 80 men marching abreast two men bore a large tom-tom, which they beat to mark time to the chant, "We are the sons of the Lion," etc., broken occasionally by a chorus of cries intended to imitate the shrieking of the women at their departure. Each man carried a rifle and bayonet. Arrived within a hundred yards of headquarters, they broke into a wild rush, and uttering piercing yells charged forward until they halted beneath the balcony from which the Mushir witnessed their approach. These men are now here, ready to do and die. They are soon to be followed by El Senussi's nephew with a further detachment of 3,000 or 4,000. Meanwhile, El Senussi himself is preaching a crusade against the Italians which will most certainly result in large reinforcements for the Turkish cause. The pay and rations issued to the Arabs may not be extravagant, but with them they are delighted. Few of them have ever been so fed or paid. They are having the time of their lives.

Anecdote.

MARK TWAIN did not cherish a fondness for the average office boy. He had an idea that the genus was insufferable, and invariably when the humorist sallied forth into some business office there was immediate armed hostility between him and the boy. One day Mark went to see a friend at his office, and the office boy on guard, in icy tones, said:—

"Whom do you wish to see?"

Mark mentioned his friend's name.

"What do you want to see him about?" came next from the boy.

Mark Twain immediately froze up, and then with a general smile he said:—

"Tell him, please, I want to ask him how to get on."

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

A message to the Times from Teheran on the 1st states that serious disorders have occurred at Kerman and that the opponents of Government are threatening the town.

Reuter wires from Teheran on the 1st that by virtue of the powers conferred on the chief of police by the Cabinet to arrest the opponents of Government, sixteen persons have already been arrested. They include Suleiman Mirza, democratic leader in the last Mejlis. This action interprets the desire of the Government to prepare for the election of a phant Mejlis.

A message to the Standard on the 26th from Ahwaz states that Lord Lamington's camp at Alar Korshid has been pillaged by Bakhtiari brigands. Colonel Williams, who accompanied Lord Lamington, lost everything he possessed including his medals.

Lord Lamington has arrived at Ispahan. He requests Reuter to contradict any exaggerated reports that may have reached London concerning a trifling robbery in his camp at Alar Korshid. He leaves for Teheran on the 30th instant.

Trouble has been brewing for some time between the Bakhtiaris and the Sheikh of Mohammerah. The former have now seized Shushtar against the Sheikh's wishes.

The Persian Minister in London presided at a lecture on the literature of Persia by Professor Browne at University College. Professor Browne said that one of the most remarkable things in Persia was the sudden appearance of an admirable press. The style and tone of these papers were excellent.

M. Sazonoff in his Maiden Speech in the Duma said that the situation in Persia, thanks to the agreement concluded with Britain, should not cause any extraordinary complications. Unsatisfactory relations between Russia and Persia were due to the irreconcilability of Democratic Nationalists towards Russia. He assumed that the present Persian Cabinet, with Anglo-Russian support, would succeed in pacifying the country. The question of Turkish occupation of Persian territory could be decided at The Hague if the Frontier Commission at Constantinople did not agree.

Reuter is informed that the Persian Government has resolved to reassemble the Mejlis at the earliest opportunity, but before ordering elections the Government considers it necessary for the welfare of Persia, and in the interests of good relations with Foreign Powers, to remove the Extremist element from the Democratic Party whose action is not consonant with patriotism at a time when Persia desires to be on friendly terms with Britain and Russia, and when the united action of all parties is necessary. These Extremists will be released after the elections. The Government also intends to create a Senate in accordance with the Constitution.

Teheran, April 5.

I understand that the British pronouncement regarding the withdrawal of troops from Shiraz and Ispahan definitely states that it will take place after two months if the tribes show a friendly disposition and the Gendarmerie promises well.

A complete calm now prevails at Meshed.

Odessa, April 6.

It now transpires that the purport of one of the objects of the autograph letter recently despatched by Mohammed Ali (the ex-Shah) to the Tsar by the hand of his Russian adjutant, Captain Khabaef, was to obtain permission and a safe-conduct for his wife to make a brief visit to Teheran in order to see her eldest son, the reigning Shah.

No reply has as yet been received to this request. The ex-Shah's wife remains here with her consort and two younger sons, boys of about 9 and 12 respectively.

The Odesski Listok to-day states that it has authority for the announcement that Mohammed Ali, with his family, will leave here for England about the middle of May.

(FROM "THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

The International Socialist Bureau at Brussels has issued some fresh documents on the Persian question. We reproduce the following account of Russian proceedings at Resht from the Berlin Pariser—

"M. Nekrasoff, the Russian Consul-General (at Resht) appointed the notorious reactionaries Mufakhr-el-Mulk and Hadji Mirza Riza to act as intermediaries between the Consulate and the population. Mufakhr-el-Mulk rules in the name of Russia and visits the Consulate every evening in order to give in his report and to receive instructions. When M. Nekrasoff began sending his false reports to Teheran in order to mislead public opinion in Europe, a number of Persians waited upon the British Consul, Mr. Rabino, and the Ottoman Consul, Khalid Bey, requesting them to communicate the true facts to their respective Governments. The detailed report of the deputation was approved of by the British and Ottoman Consuls, who gave the Persians the assurance that they had already informed their respective Governments of the true state of affairs and would continue to do so in future. The Russian Consul-General got wind of the action of the two Consuls and sought to procure false documents showing that they were intriguing against Russia. He caused some of the prisoners under arrest to draw up a statement charging the British and the Ottoman Consuls with inciting the population against the Russians.

Constantinople, April 8.

I have reason to believe that the Porte has called the attention of the Persian Government to the recent attacks on Ottoman Consulates in Persia, notably the attack made by partisans of Salar ed-Dowleh on the Consulate at Sibe, near Kermanshah, and requested it to take prompt and energetic steps to safeguard Ottoman interests.

St. Petersburg, April 9.

An official communiqué on Persian affairs is issued here, which, after contradicting at length various Press reports, declares that Russian policy in Persia has only one aim: the earliest possible termination of the disturbances which are so unfavourable to Russian economic interests and threaten to lead to further complications.

A number of telegrams from the Russian Minister in Teheran are appended giving an account of the internal situation in Persia and the recent actions of the ex-Shah. (Reuter.)

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

St. Petersburg, April 10.

The Foreign Office has published extracts from diplomatic and consular despatches from Persia showing the utter hopelessness of Mahomed Ali's attempt to recover the Throne. The publication has been called forth by a recent interview published in the Novoe Vremya with the ex-Shah's brother alleging that Mahomed Ali abandoned the attempt solely on account of pressure from St. Petersburg and that without such interference his success was assured. The Novoe Vremya for some months past has been criticizing M. Sazonoff's policy, especially in Persian affairs. The campaign was the result of the uncertainty and doubt produced by Russia's attitude during M. Sazonoff's absence, and gradually led to considerable bitterness, which should after to-day's publication be eschewed with profit to both sides.

From the British point of view the communiqué affords further gratifying evidence of Russia's straightforward determination not to support political adventures in Persia.

The Desecration of Meshhed.

To the Editor of the Manchester Guardian.

Sir,—To the abominable deeds wrought by the Russians in Tabriz and Resht must now be added their wanton desecration of the most venerated sanctuary in Persia, that of the Imam Riza at Meshhed, which for more than a thousand years has been one of the holiest shrines of the Shia Muhammadans, and to quote the expression employed of it by Major P. Molesworth Sykes, the British Consul at that place, "the glory of the Shia world." The buildings of the shrine, which no unbeliever's foot might profane, and in particular the great gilded cupola, were famous for their beauty, while the library and treasury had been enriched with invaluable treasures by the piety of many generations of devout pilgrims and worshippers.

About the same time that the Russians began to pour fresh troops into Tabriz and Resht, at the end of last year, they also sent a number—I think about 2,000—to Meshhed, and since their arrival the Russian Consul-General, Prince Dabija, like his colleagues at Tabriz and Resht, has been eagerly seeking a pretext for active intervention. As the Persians carefully avoided affording any reasonable pretext, he proceeded to create one, using for this purpose an adherent of the ex-Shah named Ydusf Khan of Herat, who spent his time partly in sanctuary at the shrine and partly at the Russian Consulate, with which he was in close touch throughout. Having collected round him a number of other mischiefmakers, he finally succeeded in creating some considerable disturbance, whereupon the Russians, having disarmed the Persian police (naamsyysa), assumed complete control of the city. In this they were apparently aided by the Governor of Khurasan, Rukn-ud-Dawla, whom the Persian Government wished to dismiss, but the Russians would not allow them to do so.

On Saturday, March 30, the Russian troops surrounded the shrine and about two hours before sunset opened fire upon it. About sunset they forced their way into the mosque, driving out, killing, wounding, or arresting those who were in sanctuary there. They also arrested the custodian (Mutawalli Bashi), who is the representative of the Crown within the sacred precincts, but afterwards released him. The number of Persians killed is not accurately known yet, but forty or fifty bodies have been already recovered. As regards the sanctuary itself, the great cupola and most of the shrines, dormitories, and other buildings have suffered grievously from the cannonade, while all the doors have been or are being broken down. The courtyard of the mosque is full of Russian soldiers and Cossacks, whose horses also are stabled there, and of the precious things with which the munificence of many kings and great men of past time had endowed the sanctuary many are missing or destroyed. We must go back six centuries to the savage Mongol invasion of Persia by Chingiz Khan to find a parallel to these acts of vandalism and violence, or to the earlier devastations of the Ghuzz Turks, of whom the poet Anwar wrote in words singularly appropriate to the present time:—

The mosque no more admits the pious race
Constrained, they yield to beasts the holy place,
A stable now, where dome nor porch is found
Nor can the savage for proclaim his reign,
For Khorassania's criers all are slain,
And all her pulpits levelled with the ground!

General Yermoloff, the conqueror of the Caucasus, is said to have boasted to the then Shah of Persia that he was of the race of Chingiz Khan and equal to him in ruthlessness, and this evil boast the Russians are still doing their best to justify. There is nothing astonishing in this to anyone who knows the history of the Russian Government and the nature and methods of its agents. What is both astonishing and horrible is that England, under a Government called Liberal, should be a consenting party to their deeds, and that the British press with only a few noble exceptions, like the Manchester Guardian, should either condone or ignore the abominable deeds of that evil Government with which we are so unhappily and unequally yoked. Meanwhile the Times which refuses to accept testimony or letters which do not accord with its pro-Russian policy, continues to criticise and mock the unhappy Persians, and in the same breath to assure the Indian Muhammadans that Great Britain is deeply concerned in giving all possible consideration to their religious convictions and would not willingly suffer any violence to be done to their sentiments. Unfortunately the Russian guns speak more loudly and plainly than the Times leaders, and are more likely to influence Muhammadan opinion as to the effects of this ill-starred entente.—Yours, etc.,

EDWARD G. BROWNE, F.B.A.

The Reign of Terror in Persia.

THE wave of indignant protest occasioned by the seizure of Northern Persia by Russia has subsided. The miners' strike has monopolised the public interest. Besides this the papers have given us hardly any news of the doings of Russia for the last few weeks. Is there a conspiracy of silence?

According to reports received in Brussels, the Persians are being treated much as the Arabs were in Tripoli. They are rebels in their own country. The Russian General, Nekrasoff, has assumed the rôle of dictator: he has appointed, as governors of the different towns, notorious opponents of the National Party and tools of the late Shah. Supporters of the Persian Government are thrown into prison, and their property confiscated. Newspapers are being suppressed, and the editors flogged and imprisoned. The least suspicion of active opposition to the Russian occupation leads to imprisonment and perhaps death. All the schools founded by Europeans have been closed; the best and largest school in Tabriz is now occupied by Russian soldiers.

The International Socialist Bureau has received a letter from some Persians from Tabriz, giving the following facts:—

Up to now 280 persons have been executed, 3,000 have been killed in fighting, and 300 thrown into prison. The inhabitants do not know whether they will see the morrow, as the brigand chief, Samad Khan, who has been installed by the Russians, orders executions without let or hindrance. Eighteen hundred persons have fled from the town and thousands of women and children are left without any means of existence. Tabriz now represents one huge prison; no one is allowed to leave, and the unarmed inhabitants are absolutely at the mercy of the brigand governor and the Russian soldiers. The prisons are full of people chained together, hourly awaiting execution.

This is but one instance of the horrors which are being perpetrated in Persia in the name of civilisation, and for which the British Government is largely responsible.

A. H. S. in Labour Leader.

Persia in 1912.

THERE could hardly be a more serious misapprehension than the comfortable confidence, genuine or simulated, of the British Foreign Office, that events in Persia at this crisis only affect our local interests and that we can afford to treat them as detached from our Imperial policy as a whole. The very weakness and insignificance of Persia constitute their greatest claim to our attention. Of course, we are not dealing with Persia at all. The other players in this great game are Russia and Islam, and the rest of the civilised world has gathered round the table to watch the fall of the cards with the keenest interest and sense of the importance of the issue, which we do not seem to share. There is, however, a salutary anxiety abroad in England. She does not know much about the course of events, but she is coming to understand that British affairs in the Middle East have been entrusted to unskilful hands, and that we have been used as a catspaw in a manner to which we are not accustomed.

It is not so much that as a result of this bungling we have lost ground in Persia: it is the growing certainty that we have thereby lost weight at the council board of the world that is at the bottom of the uneasy feeling at home. And England is right. As is generally the case in the long run, the people have shown a better understanding of the essentials of the case than the Foreign Office. Manifestly it is our national standing, not our interests in Persia, that should be our first concern. But that is a very different thing from agreement with the Foreign Minister when he assumes the augur's mask, and mutters platitudes about the superior claims of wider Imperial policy, the plain man is asking whether those claims could not best have been satisfied by strong and farsighted action in regard to those very interests in Persia. In announcing the impossibility of reconciling the two, the Foreign Office has merely announced its inability to grasp the movement of affairs in the Middle East.

The protection of our Indian position and the maintenance of friendly relations with all Mohammedan peoples have been postulated as the primary aims of our Asiatic policy. It surely need not be explained that the efficiency of our Asiatic policy as an essential of our existence is second only to our supremacy at sea, a principal with which our Indian dominion can never come into conflict. What, then, is that wider policy that calls for the sacrifice of our Asiatic interests? It does not exist, and it is disingenuous to make such an appeal to the credulity of Englishmen.

The maintenance, ultimately, of Persian independence and, for the moment, of our equal voice in the guidance of its affairs—for just so long as may be necessary and not for an hour longer—is directly necessary for the material prosperity of India, and as her guardians we have no right to assent to anything less. If the underlying motive of the present series of graceful concessions to Russia in this matter is a conviction that British and Indian interests in Persia and her trade routes are not worth defending, and if the policy of maintaining buffer states is to be abandoned by us, at least it is right that such pronouncements should be openly made in Parliament. Short of such a declaration, the House of Commons can hardly acquiesce in these prolonged and secret communications, of which the course is punctuated by another and yet another assent on our part to the encroachments of a Power that is not in the least concerned with either our Indian dominion or the vindication of our good faith with Mohammedan countries.

The immediate requirements of India in this matter are obvious enough. What is not perhaps so clear to English eyes is the importance to us of keeping faith with Islam. We have little to complain of in the general attitude of Mohammedans towards ourselves, and it would in particular be an act of foolishness as well as ingratitude to forget the unwavering loyalty of our Moslem subjects in India during the stormy months of 1906, 1907 and 1908. But this patience has its limits, and it seems that those limits are being approached. The Moslem is beginning to wonder whether it is merely want of will that is at the root of our continual acquiescence in the aggressions of European States. He is becoming suspicious that it is lack of power as well.

There is at this moment a means whereby Persia may escape from final servitude and at the same time render us a service of which it is difficult to estimate the importance. If the English Government encourages her to do so it can be done. If she does not, Persia has become a mere antiquarian memory. PERCEVAL LONDON in the Daily Telegraph.

Persian Foreign Trade.

Writing before the decision of the Persian Government to accept the Anglo-Russian Note, the Teheran correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung discusses the probable commercial effects of the installation of Russia in Persia. "As the Anglo-Russian Convention," he says, "in spite of the promise of the 'open door,' completely excludes third parties, all non-Russian commerce will soon feel the consequences and perceive that Persia has virtually become a Russian possession. Even as it is, her favourable position as a neighbouring Power gives the commerce of Russia certain advantages over that of other countries. But Russia will in addition find enough opportunities for so manipulating freight rates as to strengthen her privileged position still more. One already hears rumours to the effect that Russia will in the future allow goods up to a weight of ten poods (360lbs) to enter Persia at postal rates—naturally when coming from Russia. On the other hand, constant difficulties are being placed in the way of postal packages coming from other European countries, though they all have to pass through Russia. The greatest danger, however, threatens from the revision and increase of the Customs tariff. As Persia stands in need of money such an increase is indeed inevitable, but the coming tariff will certainly be made still more disadvantageous to European countries than the present tariff is, and it will be made entirely to fit in with Russian needs. As an example, it may be mentioned that vodka, a Russian spirit, which comes almost exclusively from Russia, pays only four krans per three kilos, whereas kummel, a German spirit which is scarcely if at all manufactured in Russia but is little different from vodka, pays 12 krans for the same weight."

The writer then draws attention to the unceremonious way in which Russia is already making herself the economic mistress of Persia. He points out that by the treaty of Turkmanchik of 1828, which forms the basis of the commercial relations between Persia and Russia, as well as other countries, no foreigner may acquire in Persia real estate except a dwelling-house or a place for offices and business. In no circumstances, however, may foreigners acquire landed estates. The Russian Discount Bank has never been very scrupulous in observing this law. Whenever estates which were held by it as mortgages on loans advanced to their proprietors had to be sold under the hammer it invariably acquired them through men of straw—chiefly Persian or Armenian employees of the bank. Only a short time ago it discarded all pretence whatsoever, and has been openly acquiring land and houses wherever it could get them. "As the Persian Foreign Office," the correspondent adds, "has been sanctioning these acquisitions, the surmise is gaining ground that in the Note in which she demanded the dismissal of Mr. Shuster Russia also demanded, and obtained permission to acquire landed property," and he suggests that the other Governments might do worse than inquire in St. Petersburg whether their subjects could also be granted the same privileges, or whether it is restricted to the Discount Bank. — The Manchester Guardian.

Sir Edward Grey on Persia.

II.

In other words, England and Russia, hitherto rivals or confederates in preventing Persia from making moral or material progress, had composed their rivalries, and combined together in the far nobler task of assisting rather than of impeding the regeneration of Persia. And what they had undertaken would be faithfully observed and carried out.

One is inclined to rub one's eyes when reading afresh these passages after the lapse of four years. Time has its revenges, and no revenge could be more complete or more highly charged with bitterness than that which has overtaken these professions. We know that those circles which, after all, determine Russian policy construed the Agreement in a totally different manner to that in which it was viewed by our own Government. They had acquired "rights" in Persia under the Convention. The pound of flesh was theirs, and they determined to eat it. "What we have undertaken will be faithfully carried out." The words sound like mockery at the present time. We have been pulled over the line and pulled into the mud with all Asia looking on.

But a ray of light commences to penetrate the gloom. Not in Persia, it is true, but over here. For the first time in our recent history public opinion in England, and especially among the Liberal party, is becoming interested in foreign affairs. The Persian question is mainly responsible for this healthy revival. The disasters which have overtaken our policy in Persia are realized, and what they forebode for our future is appreciated.

Let us, however, return to the date of the signature of the Convention. We have seen that the Secretary of State for India made a special appeal in his speech, delivered five months later, to the "Amir of Afghanistan and other potentates," who were given to understand that what we had undertaken would be faithfully observed and carried out. Why was this appeal made? Because the consent of the Amir of Afghanistan to the terms of the Convention relating to his country was necessary in order to render them operative. Five months had elapsed and this consent was not forthcoming. Lord Morley expressed his conviction that within a given time we should obtain the Amir's acceptance, and his solemn assurances of good faith on the part of our Government in observing both the letter and the spirit of the Convention were calculated to hasten the event. Four years have now passed since these assurances were given: but the consent of the Amir remains as distant as ever. Who will blame him after what has happened in Persia?

I have alluded to the misgivings with which the Convention was regarded in England. They were shared by the Persian Government, and feeling ran very high in the bazaars and places of public discussion in Persia. The Convention was regarded as a betrayal by Great Britain and as a league between Great Britain and Russia for the destruction of Persian independence. Strong speeches were delivered in the anjumans. There was a moment when the danger of a popular rising against Europeans was felt by the Legations to be imminent. It was in such circumstances that the British Minister, Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, penned his now famous communication to the Persian Government. It was delivered early in September, 1907, in Persian. It was circulated throughout Persia on September 14 by the Persian daily newspaper, Hablu'l-Matin. It was translated by Professor Browne, first in the form of a pamphlet and later in his book on the Persian Revolution.

The despatch began by stating that information had reached the writer that the report was rife in Persia that the result of the Convention concluded between England and Russia would be the intervention of these two Powers in Persia and the partition of Persia between them. It went on to remind the Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs that the negotiations between England and Russia were of a wholly different character, and that the Special Envoy of the Persian Government, who had recently visited both St. Petersburg and London, had received from the Foreign Ministers of both Powers explicit declarations as to the objects aimed at by their respective Governments in Persia. It proceeded to inform the Persian Government of the substance of the conversations which had taken place between Sir Edward Grey and the Persian Special Envoy and also of the substance of M. Isvolsky's declarations, officially communicated to the British Government. Sir Edward Grey had explained to the Persian Special Envoy that he and M. Isvolsky were completely in accord on two fundamental points. Firstly, that neither of the two Powers would interfere in the affairs of Persia unless injury were inflicted on the persons or property of their subjects, and, secondly, that negotiations arising out of the Anglo-Russian Convention must not violate the integrity and independence of Persia.

The despatch went on to quote from observations made by Sir Edward Grey and from the declaration given to the British Government by M. Isvolsky. Sir Edward Grey's observations were practically identical with those contained in the passage of his speech of February 14, 1908, which I have quoted above. The object of the Convention, so far as Persia was concerned, was to prevent both Powers from interfering in Persian affairs and so to enable Persia to effect her own regeneration. M. Isvolsky's declaration, included the following important statement: "This Agreement between the two European Powers which have the greatest interests in Persia, based as it is on a guarantee of her independence and integrity can only serve to further and promote Persian interests, for henceforth Persia, aided and assisted by these two powerful neighbouring States, can employ all her powers in internal reforms." The Spring-Rice despatch concluded with the following summary: "From the above statements you will see how baseless and unfounded are these rumours which have lately prevailed in Persia concerning the political ambitions of England and Russia in this country. The object of the two Powers in making this Agreement is not in any way to attack, but rather to assure for ever the independence of Persia. Not only do they not wish to have at hand any excuse for intervention, but their object in these friendly negotiations was not to allow one another to intervene on the pretext of safeguarding their interests. The two Powers hope that in the future Persia will be for ever delivered from the fear of foreign intervention, and will thus be perfectly free to manage her own affairs in her own way, whereby advantage will accrue both to herself and to the whole world."

Now, anyone who will take the trouble to compare the language of this passage with that of the passage which I have quoted from Lord Morley's speech of February 17, 1908, will not only note the similarity of the argument, but will also be able to appreciate its true import. It amounts to this: England and Russia, having come to an agreement as regards commercial concessions in Persia, and being firmly resolved to maintain the integrity and independence of the country, would no longer have any excuse for interfering in Persian internal affairs. That was the official construction of the true meaning of the Agreement at the time when it was signed.

It was the construction placed upon it, not only by our own Government, but by that of Russia. The word of honour of Great Britain was given to the Persian people that this was what was meant and what would be observed. "What we have undertaken," again to quote Lord Morley's phrase, "will be faithfully observed and carried out."

The events of the last four years have signally belied these professions, given in the name of our own Government and in that of Russia to the Government and people of Persia. It is, to say the least, a serious reflection upon our diplomacy that the terms of the Convention itself were not made more clear, and that so much should have been left to official declarations received from the Russian Government. When you are dealing with a Government like that of Russia, which is scarcely master in its own house, you cannot be too particular in drawing out the text of an agreement. You are contending, and the Russian Government is contending, with powers behind the throne, in Russia, who often determine the course of policy, and whose proceedings are as equivocal as their conscience is dull. If you elect to sup with the devil, you must sup with a long spoon, and you must take every precaution which your ingenuity can devise to prevent your fingers from being burnt. However, the Convention is there, and so is the official interpretation. Mr Shuster has told us that it was principally his sincere belief in the good faith of those who signed and promulgated that document that finally decided him to go to Persia.* We know how that good faith has been kept as regards Mr. Shuster. Our future task must consist in requiring strict observance of its terms and interpretation by both the signatory Powers.

I have taken the trouble to set out at length this all important page in the history of the Anglo Russian Convention. Had it been forgotten by Sir Edward Grey when he delivered to the House of Commons his amazing speech of February 21 last?† On December 14 he had informed the House that he had never seen the Spring-Rice despatch. It was elicited that the Foreign Office did not even possess a copy of it. What is the explanation now given of these extraordinary omissions? That this was a document drawn up by the British Minister in an unofficial form. "On the face of it you can see," said Sir Edward Grey, "that it is in unofficial form. The British Minister regarded it as an unofficial document that he did not send it to me at the time, and that is why I never saw it. A few days after he had drawn it up, instructions were sent by me from the Foreign Office as to the explanation which was to be given to the Persian Government of the Anglo-Russian Agreement. Those instructions were the official authoritative explanation. They were given some days after that unofficial document. They were accepted by the Persian Government." The instructions sent from the Foreign Office are contained on p. 48 of the Blue Book, Persia No. 1, 1909. The communication to the Persian Government which was based on these instructions does not appear in the Blue Book at all. That it was accepted by the Persian Government, as Sir Edward Grey stated in the debate, has been shown by subsequent question and answer to be inaccurate.* The Persian Government merely received the communication, and made no comment upon it. Now, if we turn to these instructions, we find that they contain a declaration which was obviously calculated to allay Persian suspicions. It is as follows: "The two States have, in signing the Agreement, steadfastly kept the fundamental principle in view, that the independence and integrity of Persia should be respected absolutely. The sole object of the Arrangement is the avoidance of any cause of misunderstanding on the ground of Persian affairs between the contracting parties. The Shah's Government will be convinced that the Agreement concluded between Russia and Great Britain cannot fail to promote the prosperity, security, and ulterior development of Persia in the most efficacious manner." Here we have, at least, an admission by Sir Edward Grey in 1912 that the maintenance of the independence and integrity of Persia was the fundamental principle which underlay the Anglo-Russian Convention of 1907.—H. طلمس ہوش رہا

اس مہینے کے اردو رکارڈوں کی فہرست ضمیمہ گزشتہ گزشتہ گانوں کے لہا ہے۔ کون نہیں جانتا کہ محمدی جان۔ محمد حسین۔ جالکی ہائی۔ اپنے اپنے الاز میں مقبول خاص عام ہیں۔ مگر قاری عبد الہادی صاحب ایک مقدمہ بزرگ میں جانوں کے بڑے ذوق و عوق کی کیفیت میں حضرت غوث الاعظم عبد القادر گیلانی علیہ الرحمۃ کی شان میں ۲ درجہ گانے گائیں ہیں۔ ان کے ساتھ بے شمار پر ہوا اثر پڑا ہے۔ ہمارے گندھاروں کے گالے تو ایسے پسند ہوئے ہیں کہ ان کی تعریف لکھنے کی ضرورت ہی نہیں۔ طلسمی رکارڈ کو ضرور سنلیگا ورنہ آپ کی محنت میں رہیگی۔

pared to answer them. But he would ask a question in return. Mr. Balfour had said there was no exact parallel with the Transvaal. But the Transvaal had been mentioned not as an exact parallel but simply to show that the prophet of evil was not always right even when he was the leader of the Opposition. He would ask Mr. Balfour was there ever a parallel for the British Empire or for a monstrous over-concentration of business in the Commons? The present system had been proved to be unworkable. Devolution was required not for Ireland alone and the present plan was admittedly not complete. The Bill did not lay down a pattern of a federal system applicable universally to the United Kingdom. Perfect similarity was unnecessary. He admitted the Ulster difficulty, but if Ulster defeated the solution proposed, it would be impossible to continue the present state of affairs. Some other solution must be found to free the Commons and to put the control of Irish affairs into Irish hands. Sir E. Grey believed, however, that the present animosity in the different parts of Ireland would disappear when for the first time they had a sense of joint responsibility.

On the recommencement of the Home Rule debate in the House of Commons on the 7th, Mr. Austen Chamberlain denied that the Bill was a remedy for congestion in the House of Commons, which, he said, would have continually to thresh out questions settled in Dublin with the added complication that the action of the House of Commons would mean the reversal of the decision of the semi-independent Irish Parliament. The military danger, added Mr. Austen Chamberlain, was profound and the financial danger great. He was not prepared to advise others to run the danger which he in England did not share, but if Ulster resisted then public opinion in England would not allow Ulster to be dragged. "You will have your Bill," said Mr. Chamberlain, "and then go and wreck yourself in the storm you have caused."

Mr. Samuel, replying for the Government, defended the financial provisions of the Bill. It was only just, he said, to provide for a deficit at the outset. When the Irish revenues increased the deficit would be covered and then the case would be reopened, and Ireland would be given larger financial control. Mr. Samuel said he was glad that Mr. Austen Chamberlain had repudiated the frenzied appeals of Ulster to resort to violence. He declared all the larger arguments had been in favour of the Bill and only the petty ones against it.

Mr. Robert McMordie, Mayor of Belfast, said it was absurd to belittle the movement in Ulster to raise an army. The trouble would start before the Bill was enacted. Every man in Ireland able to afford it possessed a rifle or a revolver. There was a hundred thousand revolvers in the hands of the Unionists in the north of Ireland, while the Nationalists had between two and three hundred thousand.

The most notable of the other speakers on the Home Rule question were Mr. Neil Primrose and Mr. William Gladstone, both of whom supported the Bill.

China.

Sir Edward Grey in the Commons replying to a question concerning the China Loan which the British Government approved,

The Week.

Home Rule.

On the resumption of the Home Rule debate on the 2nd, Mr. Balfour said that the restrictions laid down though necessary were absolutely inconsistent with the contention that the Bill gave Irishmen an opportunity for developing their own affairs on their own lines. Equal control in Irish affairs was written large all over the Bill. Such control would never give protection to the minority or enable Englishmen to get the advantages which they got at present from connection with the United Kingdom. Moreover, it would prevent Irishmen of public spirit and wide views from entering the Irish Parliament. Inferior men would come in and the status of the assembly would be lowered. The Bill threatened to destroy the House of Commons and did not give Irishmen an assembly which they could regard with pride and respect. In conclusion, Mr. Balfour asked a series of questions designed to show that the Bill was opposed to all principles upon which history had shown that the Federal system could be built up and that Government were pursuing precisely the opposite course.

Sir Edward Grey dealt especially with the advantages of the Bill in collecting the Imperial Parliaments of the present composition of business. A reply to Mr. Balfour's questions, he said, would require prolonged historical research and he frankly said, he was not presaid that nobody wished to infringe upon the independence of China in any way. If China borrowed money, it was for the leaders and Government concerned to fix conditions affording proper security.

Tibet.

A Mongolian pilgrim reports that there are two Tibetan political parties in Lhasa, one favouring the Dalai Lama's return and the other against. Even if the Dalai Lama returns to resume his powers there will be civil strife and dissension.

The Kambas, who come from a different stock, are at loggerheads with their Tibetan leaders. The former are only fighting for revenge for the deaths of their parents at the hands of the Chinese soldiers under the late Chao-er-Feng, and to safeguard their business interests, while the latter are fighting for the cause of reinstating the Dalai Lama.

The circumstances surrounding the struggle for independence in Mongolia and Tibet, he said, are quite different. Mongolia is backed up by Russia, whereas Tibet cannot get any assistance diplomatically or financially from Great Britain, because the hands of the British Government are tied by treaties between Russia, China and herself. The neighbouring Powers must take the neutral stand under Treaty conditions or involve themselves in international wars over the white elephant of China.

Only one-half of the Lamas in Lhasa monasteries attended the annual general synod, whereas in previous years at least 97 per cent. have been represented. It was considered expedient by the powers that only half should attend, the others remaining in their respective Lamaseries to resist Chinese attacks.

The Chinese in Lhasa, he continued, had little to fear yet, as they had any amount of supplies, with the exception of firewood, which they easily obtain by dismantling houses. He spoke of the rigorous measures adopted by Tibetan guards at important passes for searching travellers, irrespective of nationality, for Chinese letters.

The Dalai Lama has no official news regarding the result of the sortie, except that there is a daily fighting going on in Lhasa.

A new phase in the situation at Lhasa has come to light. It may be remembered by those familiar with Tibetan events before the expedition that the Dalai Lama had his Regent punished so severely that he died and his property was confiscated. It appears that this regent's "incarnation" (a boy of ten named Tenggayling) has been re-instated by the Chinese. The Tibetans say that Tenggayling's friends are now actively helping the Chinese at Lhasa. This throws some light on the groundless rumour circulated lately regarding the death of the present Regent. The truth is that the Chinese have tried to depose him so as to appoint their own nominee, Tenggayling.

Referring to the recent contradictory reports with regard to the situation in Tibet, the Times hints that the irresolution of the Dalai Lama and his continued lingering at Kalimpong are due to the report of the advance of a strong Chinese relief force on Lhasa from Batang. The Times fears that if the relief force succeed in reaching Lhasa, there will be severe reprisals. Rebellious Lhasa has not to fear Chinese troops alone but also the Eastern Tibetan tribes whom the Chinese are said to have raised. The Times says that the chief responsibility rests on the unhappy refugee at Kalimpong whose intrigues and breaches of a treaty brought a British force to Lhasa and paved the way to the substantial restoration of the Chinese suzerainty. If the Tibetans will not now accept the domination of China, we can do nothing to help them, says the journal. If, on the contrary, they succeed in emancipating themselves from Chinese control, we will certainly not repeat the involuntary aid given to China by the Lhasa expedition. "We went to Lhasa to redress our own grievances, not to destroy the qualified independence of an ancient and not unkindly race."

Baghdad Railway.

Mr. Asquith replying to a question in the House of Commons said. Britain was carrying on negotiations with respect to the Baghdad-Bama Railway with Turkey who in return for compensations elsewhere had bought out the Company from this section subject to certain conditions relative to German participation.

Orissa Tenancy Bill.

The Legislative Department has issued the following Press communique:—With reference to certain statements made at the recent meeting of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce in connection with the Orissa Tenancy Bill, the Legislative Department is authorised to state that the decision of His Excellency the Viceroy to withhold his assent to the Bill as passed was solely due to obvious political and administrative considerations. The Bill was passed by the Bengal Legislative Council at 1 P.M. on the 27th March and was brought on the same day for His Excellency's assent immediately before his departure from Calcutta. In view of the contentious nature of the Orissa Tenancy Bill, of the opposition raised to it in Council by the representatives of Bihar and Orissa and in view of the fact that in four days time the Province of Orissa would be separated from Bengal and would become incorporated in a province that is shortly to have a Legislative Council of its own capable of dealing with its own provincial legislation in accordance with the requirements, the Viceroy in consultation with his constitutional adviser decided to withhold his assent to the Bill and to leave to the newly formed Government of Bihar and Orissa the task of passing such legislation as might be necessary to meet the local needs. The decision of the Viceroy was at once communicated verbally to the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal with the reasons upon which it was based. The action of the Viceroy in this matter is not without precedent.

Afghanistan.

The latest news from the Khost Valley confirms the report that the Mangals are massing for an attack on Fort Matun where the Afghan Governor is shut up with 500 troops and some tribal levies. The Mangal Lashkar is put at varying strength from five thousand to fifteen thousand and its attack was to have been delivered on the night of the 2nd instant. Other tribes in the Valley have shown a disposition to negotiate with the Governor, but they were unable to do anything in face of the determination shown by the Mangals as there is still no sign of relief columns from Ghazni or Logar.

No news has yet been received of the attack which the Mangals were said to have planned upon Matun fort in Khost Valley.

Indians in Canada.

A message to the Times on the 8th from Toronto states that at a mass meeting of Sikhs in the Sikh Temple at Vancouver, an appeal was despatched to Lord Crewe to prevent the deportation of the two Sikh ladies with their children as ordered by the Dominion Government and declaring that the deportation was a gross breach of Imperial unity. The women should have sailed last week on the steamer Monteagle but Counsel applied for a "Habeas Corpus," declaring that the arrest of the women by Immigration officers was illegal on the ground that the husbands having secured domicile the wives had also acquired domicile.

Moslem University.

At a recent meeting of the Committee held at Aligarh it was announced that H.H. the Nizam of Hyderabad, in addition to his donation of Rs. 5,00,000, had made an annual grant of Rs. 12,000 to the Moslem University Fund. H.H. the Nawab of Janjira has made an annual grant of Rs. 1,200. These grants raise the total amount promised to Rs. 45,26,428-6-10. Of this sum Rs. 14,98,402-6-8 have been actually collected, making with the capitalised value of the grants mentioned above and the interest accrued, a total of Rs. 29,00,125-5-10. The expenses of the Committee up to the 28th April amounted to Rs. 34,476-13-0.

Shia Conference.

The All-India Shia Conference has been registered under Act XXI. of 1860, and the Sixth Sessions will be held on the 18th, 19th and 20th October 1912 at Patna.

Anecdote.

In his entertaining book, "Patrollers of Palestine," the Rev. Haskett Smith tells the story of a Bedawi who was much puzzled by the appearance of a "New Woman" who, with a rabble of cheap tourists, turned upon the banks of the Red Sea, garbed in a knickerbocker suit and double-peaked cap. The unsophisticated descendant of Ishmael was informed by the dragoman of the author's party that this apparition was "a female soldier," and as such he in turn explained the prodigy to his friends. Some of the pictures in the cinematograph display at El Obeid given on the occasion of Lord Kitchener's recent visit gave rise, it appears, to similar doubts in the native mind, which were solved in much the same fashion. The African World films of the King and Queen's visit to Port Sudan and Sinkat were highly appreciated; so were those representing the consecration of Khartoum Cathedral. But in regard to the latter pictures the natives could not make up their minds what the surplised figures were. Were they women, or were they prisoners? A sheikh settled the question by declaring that they were representatives of the British Army!

Once at a dinner Henry Ward Beecher told his sister, Mrs. Harriet Beecher-Stowe, that her "Uncle Tom's Cabin" had been translated into Italian by a monk; and that a letter full of adulation had been received from him in which he stated that if he could kiss the woman who wrote the book he would die happy. Mr. Beecher then added:—"Well, I sent him a portrait of you, Harriet, and nothing has been heard of him since."

TETE À TETE

LAST week we published a letter of the Hon Messrs Mazhar-ul-Haque and Sachchidananda Sinha contradicting the statement which we had published in our issue of 27th April that they had gone "on a fugitive pilgrimage of assurance to Cuttack on the suggestion of His Excellency the Viceroy." So far as our present information goes, His Excellency did not suggest such a journey, and we do not know how to express our deep regret that we should have been led to publish incorrect information relating to anything which His Excellency had or had not done. And that regret is made all the deeper now that His Excellency's name has to be mentioned in the course of a controversy of such a character. But it is obviously impossible for us to avoid this now because two men—"these were honourable men in their generation"—have seen fit to deny the statement which they had themselves made. Their contradiction seems to have been sent to us for publication in sheer desperation, and after a good deal of racking of legal brains. The issue of 27th April must have been in their hands on the morning of the 28th, and the contradiction was drawn up and posted to us on the 1st May, evidently as a last resort. That tells its own tale, but we shall not labour that point as our lack of legal training has made us hopelessly incapable of splitting hairs such as the Behar loves. (Vide the distinction drawn between giving assurances to and seeking the co-operation of the Uriyas.) To us it is enough that one of the honourable gentlemen should have made to us the statement that we published. Although we are much humbler than this brace of Imperial Councillors, we do not think we need go about in search of evidence to corroborate our own and to rebut the contradiction. Nor did we do so. But a correspondent, whose name we do not publish, sent us unasked a communication for publication in which he stated that he had heard from another honourable gentleman that not one but both the Imperial Councillors had made the identical statement to him also. We have verified this, and publish both the corroborating statements in our correspondence columns. Two other letters are also published, and they come from gentlemen of the same profession as Messrs. Haque and Sinha, and it cannot now be said that this evidence is less reliable than the unsupported ipse dixit of the Imperial Councillors. This does not leave even the loophole of a misunderstanding on our part, and the two honourable gentlemen stand condemned of action which we can leave our readers to characterise. We have no desire to pry into the motives of such an action. But it seems that when it was not His Excellency who made the suggestion—though we ourselves see no harm in the Viceroy making such a suggestion, and, in fact, consider that His Excellency would have been well advised in desiring to cement in this manner the various parts of a new province which he has created—His Excellency's name and position were abused by the two representatives of Bihar merely to enhance their own importance. As plenipotentiaries of His Majesty's representatives in India they could make a travelling show in Behar and Orissa, and the value of such "travelling" cannot be ignored when elections are nigh. But whether they did this for its own sake or with an eye on the main chance at the polls, there's no getting rid of the ugly fact that they did this, and—what to them is a more serious matter—for once they have been caught! They stand there in the pillory before the rude gaze of the public, and they will need all the dignity that at least one of them used to display so profusely on the Council Chamber to avoid looking extremely foolish and ridiculous. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright!"

WE ARE glad that our subscribers and others are responding to our call for the Hamdard Debentures so zealously; but there are many yet who have not sent in their formal applications, and we would request them to do so without delay.

The form of application was published in the issue of 27th April and copies are also being sent out under separate covers to all who had promised informally. The reason why we are in a hurry is that orders cannot be placed for the Press unless deposits amounting to Rs. 17,500 have been duly received by us. That sum has not yet been received. We shall close the list immediately after having received that amount, and thereafter call in the balance from the applicants.

BY THE death of Shams-ul Ulama Dr. Nazir Ahmed, L.I. D., passes away one of the giant figures of Urdu Literature who by their great intellectual labours have helped to span the gulf between the old order of things and the new. Born and bred in the lap of a society whose hopes and fears, and intellectual and moral standards, were essentially cast in the mould of ancient culture, he grew up to see the final extinction of its political power and the sudden shifting of horizons in art, literature, politics, thought and social purpose. The impact of two different cultures invariably lets loose immense revolutionary and destructive forces. The men who happen to be born into this welter of things undergo a severe test of character and intellect. The weaker natures spend themselves in fury and pass away into silence. Those, however, who are cast in the ampler mould, whose intellect is capacious and whose character strong and virile, speedily rise to the occasion and confidentially go forth to ride the storm. Delhi, the home of ancient culture as well as its tomb, has been justified of her children. The message of Sir Syed Ahmed has become the message of hope for 70 millions. Amongst those who preached that message far and wide, and brought it home to the rich and the great, the poor and the lowly, Dr. Nazir Ahmed held a pre-eminent position. Nature had endowed him with extraordinary gifts of the mind; and his vast learning, ready wit, a wide range of dialectical powers, a facility of thought and utterance that was as remarkable as the style in which it was cast, and a complete mastery of language made him a great power in popular assemblies. When his indignation was moved he was never very sparing of epithets, and his opponents had reason to dread his rollicking wit and the sledge hammer of his phraseology. Dr. Nazir Ahmed was not merely the platform missionary of a new intellectual movement. He was also a poet of some merit. But above all he was an author of great eminence some of whose works have become the classics of Urdu Literature. No student of Urdu can think without great delight and admiration of the works he must have read more than once, of "Taubat-un-Nasoo," "Banat-un-Na'sh," "Mirat-ul-Urus," "Roya-i-Sadiqa" and others, most of which break new ground in Urdu Literature, and everyone of which owes its inspiration to a propagandist who is yet a literary artist, breathes the spirit of change and gently takes the reader out of the traditional ways of thought into new vistas of hope and endeavour. They are not exactly what is termed the modern novel, for the missionary is only too apparent. But they have laid the foundations of the serious Urdu fiction, which has unfortunately not yet grown into an independent art. These works have secured for their author a permanent niche not only in Urdu Literature but also in the hearts of the women of India. Dr. Nazir Ahmed rendered a great service to the Moslem community by translating the Quran into idiomatic Urdu. The translation has some defects of style, the expression in some place lacking the dignity of the high theme, but it has on the whole served a useful purpose by making the Word of God accessible in easy language to the Indian Mussalman who cannot understand Arabic. Dr. Nazir Ahmed was one of the oldest trustees of the Aligarh College. The Muhammadan Educational Conference is much indebted to him for its early success as an institution of educative value. In the Punjab his influence has been great and he had become a name to conjure with. He was one of the few survivors of the gallant band whom the late Sir Syed Ahmed had inspired and who have since then spent their lives in the service of their community. He was a great intellectual link between the present and the past. His career summed up not simply an influence but a type. His passing away, laden with honours as well as years, is a great loss to Urdu Literature and scholarship, to the Moslem community and, in fact, the whole country. He spent his years in the forefront of battle and made use of his gifts to the full. He may not have initiated any new ideas himself, but he gave to the teachings of his master a powerful popular expression. We offer our heartfelt condolences to the family of the deceased.

FOR reasons best known to itself, the Reuter's agency refrained from supplying even the broad details of the Meshed Outrage. The Meshed Outrage to us in India; and it is only through the papers received by the English mail that the full enormity of it has been brought to light.

It appears that the disturbance which the Russians attributed to the intrigues of the followers of Mohamed Ali was in reality created by the Russian troops who had marched in force into Meshed. Immediately after their arrival, they began to practise the familiar methods of terrorism to overawe both the officials and the inhabitants. The people naturally took fright; the bazars were closed; there was a general cessation of business; and the disorderly elements of the population were encouraged to acts of lawlessness. The Russians took the law into their own hands and began to disarm the population. Even the Government police and officials were forced to surrender their arms and the constituted authority was torn up by the roots. These acts of coercion naturally gave birth to a deep feeling of resentment, and some of the more patriotic and courageous Persians began openly to say what they thought of the Russians. And when they found they were in imminent danger of meeting the fate of their Tabriz compatriots, they took sanctuary in the shrine of the Imam with many others who had fled thither for their lives. The Russians, thereupon, trained their Maxim guns on the sacred building and began the bombardment of the "Glory of the Shia World" and an object of reverence to Mussalmans of all sects. These are the main facts of the outrage which has sent a shiver of horror throughout the Islamic world. The myth about the ex-Shah's followers was quite worthy of Muscovite genius, and its grim humour could not be lost on those who still remember the incidents connected with Mohamed Ali's escapade, particularly the story of the "the mineral waters." Some of the English papers, notably the Manchester Guardian and the Pall Mall Gazette, have written strongly in condemnation of the Russian atrocities in Persia, and even the Times cannot find it in its heart to justify the bombardment of what it calls only an "ancient historical building." In reply to the protest of the London Moslem League, Sir Edward Grey said that he fully realised the gravity of the Russian action and had made representations to the Russian Government on the subject. We wish his representations would bear fruit. If Persia has to know no peace within her own borders, if her subjects are to bear continuous indignities and maltreatment and witness the most shocking outrages committed against all they hold most dear by the most brutal and tyrannical power in modern history, the sham of integrity and independence may well be torn aside and the country partitioned, that the sufferings of the people may cease.

A COUPLE of months ago it was our painful duty to draw the attention of the Government to the Hoti-Mardan case. We had not rushed to impetuously formed conclusions, but had confined ourselves to a statement of the facts of the case as disclosed in the Bombay High Court. As for comments, we contented ourselves with a lengthy extract from the judgment of Mr. Justice Davar, who had presided at the Bombay Criminal Sessions. In fact, although we were aware of the judicial "aside"—which was as severe a comment on the methods of the Northern India police and general administration as any agitator could make—we refrained from publishing it. We believe we were right in considering that this was enough so far as the case itself was concerned, though the Chief of Hoti-Mardan and his many friends would have liked our dilating on this and making severer comments on our own behalf. Very strong, and, prima facie, very plausible insinuations had been made against the local authorities, but we did not feel inclined to go into all that. We wrote at the time that "there are not wanting those who suggest that it was the independence and manliness of this important and extremely rich Chief which actuated the local authorities to humble his pride and shower great indignities upon him", but we added that "in the absence of accurate data we shall not discuss such suggestions at all." We were, however, led to ask that if such a person as the Khan of Hoti could be treated in this manner, "what chance is there for a less fortunate, a humbler and a poorer person who has only a limited number of legal practitioners in the Province to choose from, and whose fate is in the lap of the same District Magistrate of Peshawar who ordered this cruel arrest." We then deplored the system of rigorously keeping down the number of legal practitioners in the N.-W. F. Province and of licensing them on payment of a fee as if they were members of a criminal tribe let out on parole. We also showed our disapproval of the firga system of doing justice—or injustice—when there is not enough evidence to sustain a prosecution in a law court where alone legal practitioners can defend an accused person. As we were surprised at the total lack of response to appeals for the Turks, Arabs, and Persians, as contrasted with an unusual and sudden enthusiasm for an Islamic College for English education—which we heartily approved, as we had always done before—we stated that "judged only as symptoms, these facts disclose a state of affairs that is not without its dangers." We knew that discontent in the Province was acute, but that it was sinking deeper under ground because even the few outlets for its coming to the surface had been rigorously closed. We, therefore, wrote:—

This reminds us that while a flood of agitation swept over the land after the Partition of Bengal, and its revocation too has left so a hazy controversy, nobody seems to mind in the least, another and an earlier Partition carried out by Lord Curzon which is still unrevoked. One would have thought that when the Government of India was in a revoking mood, this Partition too should have been annulled. But, then, there was no agitation against it, for it was the very first consequence of this other Partition that the voice of criticism should be hushed. We refer to the separation of the North-Western Frontier Province from the Punjab, and to the regulations which govern the sturdy, if also unlettered, men of Peshawar and its neighbourhood. Agitation of the familiar type there could be little among such people. But the laws which govern them, and still more the procedure, authorized and unauthorized, which has undisturbed sway in that region, preclude the possibility of frontier grievances providing food for thought at our breakfast tables. If any violence is heard of, it is generally attributed to the temper of the Pathan and the fanaticism characteristic of his faith. And thus we go on believing that all is for the best in the best possible of all frontiers, that God is in heaven, Sir George Roos-Keppl is on earth, and all is well with that part of the world. Things cannot be allowed to drift in this way, and although we think that the Punjab itself is far too bureaucratic, that its Judiciary has not as judicial a temper as it should have, and is too dependent on the Executive, which is itself too autocratic, and possesses a police which needs considerable reform, we nevertheless believe that the time has come when it should be seriously considered whether it is not desirable to annul this Partition also and re-unite the frontier to the Punjab.

We are conscious that we have yet much to learn of the temper of officialdom in the N.-W. F. Province, and it was our intention to acquaint ourselves more intimately with the conditions by a visit of some length. But it is clear that Sir George Roos-Keppl, for whom we have always entertained great respect and regard, knows nothing of the temper of Eastern India, its politicians and its Press. We are such modest sinners ourselves in agitation that in the presence of some of our contemporaries we have to be ashamed of our moderation. Among the tigers of Bengal we roar as gently as any sucking dove. But it seems that in spite of "aggravating" our voice so we have frightened the ladies of the Frontier out of their wits, and if Bottom the Weaver was a good prophet as well as a perfect actor-manager, we fear the Frontier authorities "would have no more discretion but to hang us." We have hitherto had on our subscribers' list practically every member of the Government of India and head of a Local Government, and in most cases these eminent personages subscribe for the Comrade privately in addition to receiving copies for use in their offices. We hope we are not snobbish in saying all this, but we would be something less than human if we did not feel gratified at this token of appreciation of a journal yet in its infancy. We do not despise the few shekels that come our way in this manner. But taking into consideration the peculiar circumstances of India, it has to be remembered that journals conducted by Indians in English are meant much more to advocate the popular cause at the bar of their rulers than to educate the people themselves, and that being the case, we are much more gratified at the inclusion of a high official among our subscribers because it gives us a chance of being heard, than because another twelve rupees get into our till. Sir George Roos-Keppl has been a subscriber of the Comrade since the paper was started in January, 1911, and it is needless to say we have been grateful to him for having given us an opportunity of reaching him in this manner. But a few weeks after the publication of our comments on the Hoti-Mardan scandal and the unrevoked Partition of the N.-W. F. Province, we received a letter informing us that we should discontinue sending him the paper. As he had already paid in the subscription for the whole year, we wrote back asking if the paper should be continued for the remaining 8 months of the year, for it was against our rules of business to refund subscriptions for the unexpired period. To our great surprise we hear now that "the Chief Commissioner does not want the paper and will forego the subscription already paid in advance." Now, this clearly shows chagrin, and we heartily regret it. But the blow was not such that the little dignity which we hope we possess could not have helped us to endure in silence. Twelve rupees more or less do not matter, or we would long ago have applied to Sir George for some of the largess he used to distribute to papers in his own Province. In our Province too we have never hankered after the loaves and fishes of the State, and strongly opposed the system of doles when the Sulav Samachar righteousness was first published to the world at the expense of the general taxpayer. But in the first place, we regret that in this case we have not even the consolation of dignity, for we would ourselves pay officials to read our views in the interests of our clients, and we cannot afford to lose a hearing. In the second place, we feel it to be our duty to speak out against the waste of public money, even if we be the losers, and even if it be only to the extent of Rs. 8-1-2. Had Sir George Roos-Keppl decided to forego any sum paid out of his private purse, we should only have laughed at his tactics. He would have benefited us when he intended to hurt us. But it is the Chief Commissioner of a Local Administration that does so, and we should like to know who authorized him to play ducks and drakes with Rs. 8-1-2? The paper was ordered by the Government, and paid for out of the taxes which we and our client

George Roo-Keppel to show his pique at our and their expense? We hope the Cerberus of Finance would take note and ask Sir George to refund the money out of his private purse. As for criticism of the administration of the Province, we have yet a good deal to say, and as the Mathias of the Frontier has rigidly closed his ears, there is no reason why the sleigh bells should not jingle as lustily as the law permits. Lord Morley has made us familiar with the phrase "sun-dried bureaucrats," but Sir George Roo-Keppel would amend it and would have us call them "thin-skinned." If they are all that sort on the Frontier, we would suggest their borrowing some of the pachyderm of us journalists. Our toughened hides have often to serve us just as well as a bomb-proof shed serves General Caneva.

IT HAS been said that coming events cast their shadows before; but in the world of diplomacy the art comes first, while the motive emerges out of the shadowland afterwards. We were told the other day that the Persian Government needed strength and unity and that for the purpose of strengthening its hands it would summon a sufficiently accommodating Mejliss by "removing" the extremists. We were left to surmise in doubt and could not grasp the inwardness of this fresh move to create sham forces of democracy as yoke-fellows of a pliant Government and harness them to the coach of State. The illumination has been vouchsafed to us sooner than we were led to expect. Reuter informs us that "during the past few weeks considerable progress has been made in the preliminary work of the Trans-Persian Railway. As a result of a series of conferences of the international groups in Paris, the statutes of the Société d'Etudes have been formulated. The Société will comprise French, Russian and British groups, each providing 750,000 francs for the preliminary work." After this it becomes easy to understand why a pliant Mejliss has begun to be thought of as a necessity of the situation. What Mulai Hafid has been through gentle persuasion led to do for France, a quiet Mejliss free from "the extremists," is expected to do for the promoters of the Persian Railway project. The acceptance of it can be forced on an unwilling country at the point of an ultimatum framed on the Russian model. But that might give rise to unnecessary fuss, and, besides, the soul of modern diplomacy loves nothing so much as a patent of legality. Railways are unquestionably needed for the development and efficient administration of a backward country. It is only the questions of control and safety in time of war that constitute the real issue. Were this not so, an under-sea tunnel would have bridged the English Channel long ago, and saved two nations the worries and sea-sickness of a wretched crossing. There is very little hope that the projected Persian Railway will be left in the control of the Persian Government; and under the circumstances the Persian patriot who still cherishes hopes of his country's freedom will be pardoned by the Englishman if he fails to welcome a railway, controlled by a foreign syndicate and absolutely independent of Persian authority, traversing Persia from one end to the other and reducing her to complete bondage and impotence. "Responsible opinion in Persia," says the Englishman, "is probably cognisant of the fact that there is now no question of the violation of the integrity of Persia, and the Russian and British Governments have more at stake in the railway than Persia itself." We may, however, remind our contemporary that there is not much of the Persian "integrity" left to be violated. The railway will take away the little that has been accidentally spared. After that "the stake" will indeed be divided between Russia and Britain, and the British "stake" will, of course, be heavier by as much as India is worth.

THE unfolding of the Italian scheme of "conquest," mad as it is in its futility, has not even the saving grace of method about it. The pirate fleet is busy creating fresh sensations every week to save the face of the Italian Government and supply diversion to the already distracted populace. The "conquest," in the meantime, has met with a grievous check in Tripoli. The senseless expenditure of shot and shell on the Turkish coasts, the Dardanelles adventure, and now the heroic landing of troops in Rhodes furnish an instructive commentary on the fate of the Tripolitan city, delivered as it was with the object of "vindicating the prestige of the Italian arms" and "wiping out the stain of Adowa." The stain seems, however, to have grown thicker and no amount of naval bootlegism in the Aegean can wash it out. The occupation of Rhodes cannot alter one jot the reality of the situation, nor can it effect in the least the determination of the Ottoman Government to preserve at any cost the integrity of the Empire. The vital parts of Turkey are out of the reach of any hostile blow; she will see Italian army ever land on Turkish mainland with any prospect of returning home alive. The temporary loss of Rhodes does, therefore, mean nothing to Turkey, although it would keep the entire Italian Division locked up in a distant island, which may have to be fed from Italy, and will thus add to her already enormous financial burdens. The Turkish garrison, 3,000 strong, has retired into the hills with abundant supplies of ammunition, and will conduct guerilla warfare to give some exercise to the army of occupation. The island of Rhodes has played a conspicuous part in ancient and mediæval history. It lies 10 miles off the coast of Asia Minor towards the north-east of Crete. It has an area of 560 square miles and a population of 30,000, mostly Greeks, with the exception of 8,000 Turks and 2,500 Jews. The physical features of the island are mountainous; a chain runs across its whole length, rising 4,000 feet above the level of the sea. The mountainous regions are finely wooded and endowed with countless streams. The history of the island goes far back into the Hellenic antiquity. It was famous for its art. The ancient Persians captured it in 490 B.C. but lost it to Alexander 150 years later. The Colossus of Rhodes, a giant statue of Apollo executed in bronze, that rose astride the mouth of the harbour a hundred feet high, was destroyed by earthquake in 220 A.D. On the fall of Rome the island formed part of the Eastern Empire, but was soon after conquered by the Arabs. The Knights of St. John of Malta recaptured it in 1310 and held it till 1522, when the Turks, after a vigorous siege of 6 months, took possession of it. It has ever since remained a part of the Turkish Empire. But whether it now remains Turkish or not, Tripoli will not be Italian, and if the Italian navy is distributed in this manner over the seven seas, that is just what the Turks desire to drive the Italians on the coast of Tripoli and Cyrenaica into the sea.

A CORRESPONDENT has supplied us with a detailed list of the grievances of the Sub-Registrars in the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh. In the first place, he says there are few prospects in the Service, the chances of promotion being very scanty and limited. Out of the 202 posts, there are only 13 carrying a salary of Rs. 100 or upwards. It would, therefore, be a rare good fortune for a man who starts at the lowest rung of the ladder to retire on a salary exceeding Rs. 70 per mensem, even though he succeeds in putting in full 30 years' service. Promotion to higher grades is not regulated by a time scale, but entirely depends on chances few and far between, i.e., when some vacancy is caused by death or retirement. Then, again, we understand that officers of the position of the Sub-Registrar are not allowed peons or punkah coolies, are provided with shabby accommodation, and are even grudged the use of decent furniture and stationery. Last of all, we are told, the rules hold them responsible for the safe custody of the records, while the moharrirs working under them have free access to those records without sharing the responsibility. All these grievances, can be easily removed if only the authorities take them into consideration. As regards the first, the most serious grievance of all, it is indeed necessary in the interest of the efficiency of the Service and to secure the contentment of the officers of the Registration Department, that their prospects as regards pay, grade and promotion should be regulated by more generous rules framed with a view to make the Service much more attractive to men of honesty and ability seeking a decent livelihood.

It seems that in publishing a fortnight ago our article on "Behar and the Behar" we have given mortal offence to our contemporary of the new Province. In the three consecutive leading articles in the issues of 3rd, 4th, and 5th instant, which occupy about eight and a half columns altogether, no portion of our article of less than two columns has been left untouched and uncondemned. But the main attack has been directed against our publishing the statement made to us by one of the two honourable gentlemen that the Hon. Messrs. Mazhar-ul-Haque and Sachchidananda Sinha went to Orissa at the suggestion of His Excellency the Viceroy. This one little statement has, for obvious reasons, enraged their defender in the Press so much that it has attributed to us "ill-will and rancour" towards Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque, and because we did not mention among those prominent men of Behar whose influence is likely to be directed to the "continuance of those happy relations which kept the Hindus and Mussalmans united," the name of any person of whom the Psalms say, "the words of his mouth were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart," it has accused us of ignoring the "strenuous labours of Mr. Sinha in the cause of our province," and of believing that "he has had no more to do with Behar affairs and her public life than the man in the moon." For these direct offences judgment has been pronounced against us in more than eight columns of the Behar, and it would be as easy to say who is the judge and who the accusers as it was in the days of the Star Chamber. The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau. We are accused of having lost our reason: of being "insolent," "malicious" and "scandalous"; of harbouring an "ill-disguised feeling of envy"; of "casting dirt" and "throwing mud"; of "patent vulgarity" and "latent mischievousness." According to the writer—or writers—we have been "grossly defamatory," and even "ungentlemanly," have been "circulating gross calumnies," and are "not likely to stick at trifles in tarnishing reputations." Reference is made to "the Comrade's grossly libellous statement—quite in keeping with its policy and line of work," and to our "usual habit of misstatement—we had said almost habitual disregard of truth." We do not know why this statement was qualified and whittled down to such venial proportions, for the writer, or writers, —who seem to have no better memory than that of the class to which they refer—had already said that "if liars had not—as the proverb has it—short memories, the Comrade would not have written as it has done." After this, who would wonder if we have been responsible for "a tissue of insinuations . . . the like of which one may look for in vain even in the most discredited and disgraceful paper." As the Beharee says, "that the Comrade should have stooped so low . . . is quite characteristic of the depth of meanness and low level of scurrility to which it is capable of descending to serve its nefarious ends." We do not know if it is Jacob or Esau, but whosoever the writer of these articles may be, the smell is not "as the smell of a field which the Lord hath blessed." It is more like the smell of a field at a particular season in the agricultural year, and we apologise to our readers for this outrage on their olfactory nerves. Our only reason for culling these fragrant flowers of vituperation and presenting them with this pony of Billing-gate phraseology is that we wish to explain why we intend to offer no reply to the Beharee so far as we ourselves are concerned. It has boldly challenged us in these words:—"The Comrade has traded too long on the assurance that those attacked by it will not perhaps care to teach it a much-needed lesson. It will be greatly mistaken, however, if it fancies that we are going to adopt such a course." We do not know how it was possible for us to make such a mistake, for even when we had once ventured to reply to the adverse comments of an amphibious contemporary that is edited from Behar and published from the United Provinces, the Beharee felt it to be its duty to commence an attack both fore and aft. Its editorial columns began the fray, and were followed by a writer igniting himself "Bottom." We know not whether this nom de guerre was selected for some self-confessed affinity to the Weaver of Shakespeare's creation who, at least once in his career, was "marvellously hairy about the face," "could munch your good dry oats", and declared in a musical mood that "good hay, sweet hay, hath no fellow." Whatever the motive for the choice of such a choice name, we must confess what had then emanated from "Bottom" had not made us devoutly wish for the repetition of the "much needed lesson." We have no language equally malodorous wherewith to reply to the batteries of the Beharee and confess ourselves silenced. We can conceive the bareback rage in which men may tear men to pieces with their teeth, but a dog that bites a man is not bitten back unless rabies take effect. In any case, we trust our constitution is strong enough to withstand the contagion. But even if we were to think that our readers wish us to treat the matter differently, all that we have to do is to bring before them the last of the many ineffective shots of this worthy imitator of Italian bombardiers. The Beharee says of us in its last friendly effusion "If but our contemporary had the saving grace of humour," etc., etc. Need we say anything in our defence—after that? We have only to repeat the words of our irresponsible and hedonistic colleague, Mr. Gup, who wrote of certain critics from Behar:—"This is an age of revivals, so our revivalists have resurrected the Whipping Boy, and the first of its kind is my dull and staid companion, the Comrade. When I am frivolous—and when am I not?—'tis my comrade that's whipped for want of dignity. When my wee little sting bores its way through hides too pachydermatous to mind being whipped even with scorpions, 'tis my Whipping Boy that has to feel the lash for a lack of savvy. When I am drunk with joy at the passing stupidity of men, 'tis my stable companion that is dug in the ribs with the spurred heel for want of sobriety. When I laugh at their follies and flourish, some Cassius with a lean and hungry look turns round and tells the world that my comrade is devoid of a truly healthy liberalism. When I refuse to tolerate the cant of the sanctimonious, it is the other rascal that is declared to be without catholicity of outlook. But these worthies mistook the identity, and while praising me for a judicious sensibility, have diagnosed in the Comrade an utter absence of sanity of judgment. As Bovril said to the Bull, 'Alas! my poor brother' . . . I mistake not a grimace for humour nor think that wit and malice can sleep in the same bed. I laugh and thrive, the world enjoys it, but when the cap fits, ridicule leaves a wound where indignation, however righteous, would succeed no more than water on a duck's back or a pellet on the hide of a rhino. 'No kind of power,' said Macaulay, 'is more formidable than the power of making men ridiculous.' He who has it owes it one part to himself and three parts to the man who is the butt of his humour. Ridicule is the best test of truth, and those whose dignity or humanity, patriotism or wisdom shrinks from this test, only show that the cap and bells which are a misfit for the fool just fit their pates." Our offence may be the unconscious exposure of a successfully advertised fraud, but it is certainly not what our accusers say. The reference to Cross Benches, or the relation of Jodhbal to contemporary history would better indicate the direction of our sins. If not, seek it, gentle reader, in those intricate mathematical calculations that show the exact height of modesty!

The Comrade.

The Hon. Law Member and Ourselves.

As we have said elsewhere, we cannot enter into a controversy with the Beharee when it has seen fit to use language which we would be wholly untrue to ourselves to imitate. We do not fear that any person for whose good opinion of us we care would be likely to draw from this any conclusion adverse to ourselves. In any case, we do not mind being misjudged occasionally, for none can always avoid it. But where others besides ourselves are concerned, we owe it to them no less than to ourselves to give no occasion for a misunderstanding. After this deplorable exhibition of themselves we have little regret that the two honourable gentlemen from Behar who went on a fugitive pilgrimage of assurance—or on some other mysterious errand—to Orissa have been quite unconsciously exposed. But they or their defenders need not have gone out of their way to besmirch the name of the greatest Beharee of our times for whom our respect, regard and—need we confess?—affection, are only too well known, and to none more than to the Beharee and its honourable protégés. We have to rub our eyes and pinch ourselves to make sure we are not in the midst of a nightmare when the Beharee wishes to exculpate the "less exalted people" among its Directors by accusing us of "circulating such gross calumnies" against the Hon. Law Member. However, there is no gainsaying that this grave charge has been made in all seriousness, and howsoever painful it may be to us to make him the subject of any controversy, we have no choice but to prove that we have the same respect, regard and affection for him to-day that we have always entertained in the past.

We had never felt that he needed constant expression of these feelings, nor has aught occurred to make us feel so now, and we believe his own desire must always be to be considered as merged in the Government of which he is a distinguished member. At the public dinner at the Calcutta Town Hall on the 18th February, 1911, at which his many friends, English, Hindu and Moslem, entertained him, he struck that note in saying that "he is first and above all a Minister of the Crown," and considering his antecedent public life, of which the outstanding quality was his absolute freedom from racial and religious bias, which was testified to on that occasion by the participation in honouring him of more than 150 gentlemen of many races and creeds, he was pre-eminently fitted to undertake the grave responsibilities of a Minister, and specially of an Indian Minister of the Crown. Having indicated that sufficiently at the time, we studiously avoided further references to his personality. Until recently, the only only occasion on which we had to refer to him was only a fortnight after this public dinner when we felt compelled to correct a grave error of the Madras Times which had said that the Law Member "is against the principle of Separate Electorates." We then reproduced in parallel columns his scheme of Moslem representation and that of the Right Hon. Mr. Ameer Ali to show that he was never against Separate Electorates, and that he was in no way opposed in principle in this matter to "the orthodox views of the Moslem League." But we had been careful enough to preface our remarks with the statement that "for five years at least party politics and he are poles asunder." "He may have been wrong," we continued, "or he may have been right, in this or that particular, as the leader of the Moslem community; but that chapter is now closed and no purpose can be served by referring to his opinions of some years ago when he was bound to consider certain questions from a point of view different from that of a Minister of the Crown."

We have had since then no occasion to change this view, and it is our firm belief that he is incapable of conscious injustice to any class or community, and it never occurred to us that when dealing with public questions he had the least temptation to favour his province or his co-religionists. But the Hindustan Review of which the Hon. Mr. Sinha, one of the protégés of the Beharee, is both Proprietor and Editor, did not evidently think alike and published in its editorial columns a statement which it would take the Beharee some time to justify or explain away. It wrote:—

If the Partition of Bengal is to be modified, it can only be with the consent and co-operation of Behar, on such conditions only as will commend themselves to the leaders of public opinion in that province. The Government of India are not likely to do anything now which would alienate the sympathies of the representatives of the nearly 30 millions of Beharees—that too with a Behar Law Member in the Council."

While writing on the subject of the Partition Day Meeting, we wrote in this connection as follows:—

"May not the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal, who have now tasted, like Behar, the joys of a majority for the first time, say precisely the same thing when pressed for their views? As for the Hindu right of the Government of India, although we do not think the reference of the Hindustan Review to the Law Member would actually commend itself to him, it is some consolation to think that he is not only a Minister but a Moslem as well."

Since then His Majesty's Announcement at Delhi has changed the situation as far as Behar and Eastern Bengal are concerned. But that has not altered our opinion of the Law Member's character and action in the least, and it is, in fact, our belief that his determination to give no occasion to anyone to suspect him of prejudice or predilection might have made him hesitate in the Council Chamber of the Executive before suggesting the incorporation of Behar as a separate Province had none of his colleagues proposed that measure before it became necessary for him to do so. In spite of this, the Beharee most unwarrantably and, of course, untruly, attributes to us the suggestion that "the Law Member exerted his influence to secure 'Behar for the Beharees' at the expense of the Mussalmans of East Bengal." We do not know whether the Beharee claims or does not claim "to be a well conducted journal," but in either case we are constrained to repeat its own words and say that "never did a more heinous calumny find place in a journal." In discussing the situation created by the incorporation of Behar, Orissa and Chhota Nagpur into a separate Province in the issue of the 27th April, we said in passing:—

"Beharees are no doubt sure that what has secured to them their good fortune is nothing less than their own character of sturdy loyalty. . . .

Well, we have a suspicion that if Behar is lucky, some other Province is also intended to be jealous. But howover Behar may have secured her separate existence, it depends upon the Beharees what use they are going to make of such existence."

Behar had all along mourned her being yoked to Bengal, and we should not be surprised if one of the evil results of this much-deplred and deplorable association has been that the Beharee has learnt a little of the methods of the Bengalee in dealing with quotations from the writings and speeches of people that it sets itself to criticise. For, although it has not altered our words, as the Bengalee did in the case of the Nawab of Dacca, it has skilfully eliminated the portion of our remarks which we have given in italics, and has itself italicised the single word "howsoever," which, isolated in this manner, loses most of its significance. But to say that this is done "to bring out into relief the implied suggestion that the Law Member exerted his influence to secure 'Behar for the Beharees' at the expense of the Mussalmans of East Bengal" is an assertion which we had rather leave uncharacterised. The Law Member has never been mentioned in the whole article in this connection, and even Serjeant Buzfuz who could twist "Chops and Tomato Sauce" into a declaration of love, would have envied the legal luminary whose subtle brain discovered this "implied suggestion" for his inventive genius.

To leave no doubt about our meaning we have only to quote a paragraph from our leading article on "The Recent Changes and the Indian Member" in which we have explicitly showed the chain of reasoning of which the last link was the separation of Behar. We then wrote as follows:—

All that we are permitted to know is that the Government of India found discretion to be the better part of valour and sought refuge from Bengali agitation and the consequent bureaucratic repression in the flight to Delhi, that they knew only too well that the transfer of the capital would mean a terrible recrudescence in Bengal of the agitation and anarchy that were only just subsiding; that the reunion of Bengal alone could prevent this, that a mere reversal of the policy of Lord Curzon would be too great a triumph for the Bengalis and too great a humiliation for the Government, while creating a province too big to be well administered; that this could be prevented, and the fear of the Government saved to some extent, by making Behar a separate province and adding to it Orissa and Chhota Nagpur; that the triumph of the Bengalis, who are discontented, would be tempered by the greater triumph of the Beharis, who are sturdy and loyal, and that their sorrow would be drowned in the greater sorrow of the Mussalmans, who are only loyal and contented. This chain of reasoning is indeed so well linked together that once the flight to Delhi was decided upon no other conclusions could have been possible except those arrived at by the Government of India. We are not, therefore, able to guess what the Law Member, or any other Member of Council, has done for the "loyal and contented" Mussalmans.

The same remark applies to the case of Behar and it shows clearly enough that the Law Member had no chance of betraying an undue partiality for Behar, even if he had the least desire to be partial to her.

As regards his share in recommending all these changes to His Majesty, we had received from a writer signing himself "Azad" a communication which was meant to test our impartiality in dealing with one for whom we had always been known to entertain the warmest regard, and we published it in due course. The writer said:

While bowing to the Imperial Decree . . . you have successfully dissected and laid bare the hollowities of the principal arguments contained in the now memorable State documents in favour of the amendment of the partition of Bengal. There is, however, one point about which you have been strangely silent so far, and that is the part played by the Hon. the Indian Member of His Excellency the Governor-General's Council. I take it that this gentleman was selected for his present post not only for his legal acumen but also because he was a representative Indian in close touch with the ideas and aspirations of his countrymen. He could not, therefore, have been ignorant of the arguments and facts so ably marshalled in the Comrade against the unsettling of a settled fact and the injury that this act is bound to cause, not only to a large section of His Majesty's subjects, but also to the hitherto unshaken reputation of the British Government for keeping its word when once vouchsafed to a people. It will be simply unbelievable to suppose that he was not cognizant of all this. But if he was cognizant of it all, why is there no indication in the despatches published that this acute point of view was pressed before the Council and successfully defended against the probable onslaught of the rest of his colleagues?

We published this communication most reluctantly, but we did it all the same, for we could not have otherwise easily avoided a suspicion not only of partiality on our own part, but—what was far worse—namely, a possible suspicion of partiality to Behar on the part of the Law Member, which the Hindustan Review had no doubt suggested. But even while publishing that letter we wrote:

We are rather sorry for the Law Member, for it is not customary here, as it is for Cabinet Ministers in England, that individual members of the Government take up cudgels on their own behalf. A member of the Executive Council in India must suffer in silence, for he cannot defend himself individually, and it is for this reason perhaps that individual members are not generally singled out for attack.

We then added:—

We are, however, chiefly concerned about ourselves, for our correspondent also tell us that we have been "strangely silent" on the subject of the Law Member's attitude. Our position is easily explained. In fact our correspondent has already explained it for us. When the Government of India has been criticised by us as a whole it is clear that the Hon. the Law Member has not escaped scotfree. We certainly expected and still expect from him a good deal more than his colleagues, whose knowledge of India cannot be half as intensive as his own, even if it be regarded as equally extensive. To that extent his share of blame must be greater, for he cannot plead ignorance as easily as his colleagues, though we have yet to discover a bureaucrat who publicly relied on that plea and acknowledged, like one ex Minister of England, his "colossal ignorance of India." These considerations appeared to us to be too obvious to need emphasis. But if "Azad" thinks it necessary for us to admit all this, we can have no hesitation.

After this, we referred to Mr. Ali Imam's position as a Minister of the Crown on which he had rightly laid stress soon after taking over charge of his new post, but we added that "we trust the Indian Member of the Council will not fall into the opposite error of regarding himself as nothing beyond a limb of the bureaucracy which with the best of intentions, knows, alas, so little of what passes in the heart and the brain of India." We added that Mr. Ali Imam must have known that not all the communities of India, including the Moslem community, would like every one of the recent changes. We added:

If the supposition that he did not know this cannot be correct, one of two things must have happened. He may either have considered the case of the Mussalmans of Bengal and Behar too weak to merit his support, or he may have consented to his colleagues' scheme with the assurance that some "compensation" would be offered later on to the Mussalmans as well. We do not know which of these suppositions is true, and have no means of knowing either.

Surely this must give the quietus to any such suggestion as the "heinous calumny" that Mr. Ali Imam was partial to Behar at the expense of Eastern Bengal. No third alternative is possible after this for the Beharee to father on us. In fact, the Mussalmans of Behar are explicitly mentioned as likely sufferers from the recent changes, and even if we could so far forget the character of Mr. Ali Imam as to accuse him of undue partiality to Behar, we could not possibly have been presumed to suggest that he confined that partiality to the Hindus alone in that Province. Far from suggesting any evil motives to the Hon. the Law Member, we, as Indians, felt elated at the clear proof that had been given, both by Mr. Sinha and Mr. Ali Imam, of the fact that they acted in the position of the Law Member in a manner for which nobody could suspect them of partiality towards their own community. But we realised the lurking danger that in consciously trying to appear just to other communities a well-intentioned man may possibly become unconsciously unjust to his own, for we believe such unconscious injustice is not rare. Few lawyers like to practice in their own father's and other relations' courts, for while a man in the responsible position of a judge is almost invariably immune from unduly favouring his relations' clients, the same thing cannot be said of the chances of his applying an unduly rigorous test to their cause. We had, therefore, brought our article to a close with the following suggestion:—

To the Hon. Law Member we wish to say only one word and no more, and we trust we may say this without casting the least reflection on his character or actions. Lord Minto rightly said that a strong man was he who was not afraid of being called weak. It is our belief that, similarly, a just man is he who is not afraid of appearing a partisan.

We apologise to our readers for having reproduced so much of what we had previously written, but this has been forced upon us by the tactics of the Beharee. It has quoted in support of its interpretation of "howsoever" what purports to be a compact extract from our leading article, for the usual typographical indication, viz., dots did not separate the various extracts. As a matter of fact, the first sentence in the extract is only part of a sentence, with both its head and tail lopped off, and separated from the next sentence of the quotation by more than a long paragraph. The second sentence has suffered the same mutilation; but in this case more than two solid columns intervene between it and the sentence that follows. However, this is nothing to the interpreters of "howsoever." What is so highly diverting is the obvious anxiety to appear to be entirely fair to us. They have taken pains to mangle and mutilate our words "lest some may think that we have not correctly interpreted the attitude of our contemporary towards the Law Member or strained a point in applying the implied reference to him." Vainly, "mercy and truth are met together: righteousness and peace have kissed each other." Speaking of Othello, Coleridge said: "Schiller has the material Sublime to produce an effect; he sets you a whole town on fire, and throws infants with their mothers into the flames. Shakespeare drops a handkerchief, and the same or greater effects follow." The Behar or its protégés prefer the material ridiculous. They excel even Shakespeare and create a greater effect than Schiller's conflagrations and atrocities—they only interpret "howsoever," and, lo and behold! the world is on fire.

Morocco.

II.

LAST week we traced the history of Morocco down to the end of 1906 when the final ratifications by the Powers of the Algeiras Act guaranteeing the independence and integrity of Morocco were deposited in the Spanish Foreign Office. Happy indeed is the Eastern nation that has no foreign politics, but those who know, in the light of later experience, what the guarantee of European Powers means, know only too well that no nation could escape foreign politics after such a guarantee. In the case of Morocco, her fate overtook it very early in the journey, for owing to the providential murder of a French man, Dr. Emile Mauchamp, in Marrakesh, on the 19th of March 1907, Ujda was occupied on the 29th of March by the Algerian troops of France, the French Government declaring it to be its intention to hold the town until satisfaction had been given to its demands. Needless to say Ujda was never evacuated. As Thrasymenes has truly said in the Socratic dialogue in the Nation, from which we quoted extensively last week, "these private dangers are the very seeds of Imperialism." But here was a rich harvest reaped no later than ten days after the sowing.

Although Raisuli had been removed from the governorship of Tangier after a Franco-Spanish demonstration off Tangier, his tactics still continued, and in June, 1907, he captured Kaid Sir Henry Maclean, a British instructor to the Moorish army and colonel of the Sultan's bodyguard, who had gone, as he thought, to receive the submission of Raisuli. He had to be ransomed by the British Government after a detention of seven months, on payment of £20,000—a sum which was subsequently refunded, to the extent of £15,000 by Raisuli himself, the balance being paid by Mulai Hafid. As the British Government had no territorial ambitions in Morocco, it is significant that in spite of the Kaid's capture by Raisuli no portion of Moroccan territory was seized pending the satisfaction of British demands. Who can say after this that the code of European diplomacy is not elastic?

But neither the capture of Sir Henry Maclean nor the killing of Dr. Mauchamp were of the same importance as the next "private danger" that gave to the sowers of the Imperial seed of France within a year the bumper harvest of the whole fertile region of the Shawia in Morocco. That was the Casablanca incident. A French company had received a concession to build a dock and had run a railway to a quarry a few hundred yards beyond the town walls, passing through a Moorish cemetery. But whether it was carried through the cemetery or not—for it has been disputed—it was carried in such close proximity to the cemetery as to cause great offence to the Moors and warnings of the probable consequences of a continuation of the work were uttered some days before any disturbance occurred. Trouble was feared, but who will say that it was not invited? The tribesmen of the hinterland, less used to the cavalier dealings of the Europeans in the coast towns, were naturally excited by the reports that a Moslem burial ground had been desecrated, just as the Europeans in Calcutta would be excited if they believed that the Circular Road cemetery had been desecrated. On the 30th July they attacked the workmen and killed seven of them, one being a Frenchman. Another account puts it at nine, of whom three were French. What followed would long remain impressed on Moroccan memories and goad the Moors to revenge, even though Europe—which knows of no massacres except those for which the ex-Sultan Abdul Hamid was alleged to be responsible, and no atrocities except those associated by it with the name of Bulgaria—has perhaps by now consigned them, along with the more recent atrocities in Tripoli, to the limbo of things obsolete and long forgotten. It must be remembered that ten or twelve years ago about a score of Italians were massacred in New Orleans, killed in the open streets. Referring to this massacre, Mr. Cunningham Graham writes: "Did Italy, rise in her majesty and declare war on the United States? She cooed as gently as a sucking dove, got no redress at all, and kept her somewhat mouldy powder as dry as circumstances allowed her, to fire it off to-day in Tripoli." But that is not the way in which the integrity and independence of an Eastern kingdom can be safeguarded. Mr. Bensusan, writing in a recent issue of the Contemporary Review, says: "To be sure the Basha of the town arrested the murderers, and undertook to hand them over to justice, but at the critical moment, when excitement was still running high, the French warship Galilee arrived off the port, and her commander saw glory within his grasp. So he bombarded the defenceless town of Casablanca, soldiers were landed, and the proceedings, as described to me by eye-witnesses, were of a kind that are better left unprinted here. Naturally, it became necessary to punish the Moors for objecting to the desecration of their burial grounds, and com-elling the commander of the Galilee to cover himself with glory, and the campaign, which will be well remembered, followed. Europe saw with satisfaction how hundreds of wicked Moors, who endeavoured to stop the French advance, met with the inevitable fate of those whose cause is not supported by modern armaments." The cruiser bearing the significant name of Galilee bombarded the town on the 5th August, after the tribesmen who had killed the workmen had practically departed. The culprits had thus escaped while the innocents suffered. But the confusion resulting from the bombardment gave to the disorderly elements of the town and among the neighbouring tribes an opportunity too good to be missed, and a general pillage was the consequence. On the 7th August the French troops arrived and took further revenge on the town for the murder of one or two Frenchmen by the tribes. A writer of clearly pro-French sympathies writes that "before order was restored, nearly every inhabitant had been killed or wounded or had fled, the dead alone numbered thousands. The European colony was, however, saved." Among the killed were Jews, women and children.

But this was not enough to vindicate the dignity of modern civilization and the mock Christianity of a goddess nation. A large force, landed under the excuse of "protective police," first under General Drude, and later under General D'Amade, began a campaign against the Shawia tribes, and it was not till June, 1908, that the country was subdued, in spite of the army numbering at one time 15,000 troops. A single instance would suffice to give an idea of the manner in which civilization conducts her civilizing missions sent out to reform barbarism. One of the French columns which penetrated the interior in search of trouble, and well provided with artillery, one day saw at a distance of three or four miles a large body of "the enemy," and gradually closed in, meanwhile pumping melinite shells into them. Instead of "the enemy" it proved to be a peaceful assemblage of country Moors, keeping a religious festival at a Zawiya or shrine of a saint. The result was that some 1,500 men, women, and children were killed and wounded for no reason whatever. An attempt was made to keep this piece of news out of the Press, but was not quite successful, and the fact is on record. The writer of pro-French sympathies from whom we have already quoted, writes that the action of France "aroused the fanaticism" of the tribes of Tafilalet and those dwelling near the Algerian frontier. Considering that in Europe it aroused nothing but sympathy for France and the workmen killed at Casablanca, we do not know if the world should not change its feelings towards "civilization" and "fanaticism" and learn to detest the former and admire and emulate the latter. Well, the "fanaticism" of the tribes was aroused, and in November Beni Snassen crossed the frontier and were not reduced to submission for long. Another outbreak occurred in April, 1908, when a French column in the Guir District, west of Fijig, was surprised. In that and a subsequent engagement the French casualties were over 200. French and Moorish Commissioners were then appointed to preserve order along the frontier.

But while the civilizing mission of France was thus engaged, the Government of Morocco was passing through an even more eventful period. On the 16th August, 1907—within a fortnight of the horrible bombardment of Casablanca—the Ulama of Marrakesh declared Abdul Aziz to be deposed and declared for his half brother, Mulai Hafid. Abdul Aziz was supplied with funds by the State Bank, and went in September to the seaport of Rabat—as his sturdier brother now proposes to do—at the head of an army. There he was visited by the French Minister, and naturally appeared willing to grant every French demand and provided that France supported him against his brother. This situation was not without its difficulty for France, for on the one hand, there was an opportunity here for obtaining from a Sultan reduced to such complacency all that French diplomacy had so long worked for, but, on the other hand, it was not an easy matter even for France to fight against a Sultan fully supported by the Moorish tribes. The decision of France was worthy of an astute diplomacy. "A loan was forthcoming, but no military assistance, save that some of Abdul Aziz's troops were taken by a French ship to Maastricht." While desultory fighting between the supporters of the rival brothers was proceeding, Hafid was proclaimed Sultan at Fes on 4th January, 1908, and entered Mequinez in the following May, and Fes in June. Aziz, for once exerting himself, started from Rabat in July for Marrakesh, with a force of 4,000 troops. On the 19th August, he started for the final march; but hardly had his forces started when it was assailed on all sides, whereupon the tribesmen deserted him, and the "regulars" ran away. Three days later Abdul Aziz found refuge in the French lines at Sottat, and at last accepted a pension from Hafid, and was assigned a residence in Tangier. That town, which is greatly under foreign influence, was the last to acknowledge Mulai Hafid, and did so only on the 23rd August. He had sought foreign recognition since January, but it was only now that he obtained it. Germany, for obvious reasons, being the first to recognise him. It accordingly threatened the Powers on the 2nd September, and France and Spain asking for guarantees in reply, were assured by Mulai Hafid that he would respect the Act of Algeciras. Early in 1909, all the Powers had recognised him. But to-day, after the brief space of three years, it is his turn to recognise the Protectorate of France, and he discovered a year ago that the first to violate the Act of Algeciras was the very Power which had made the recognition of him as Sultan dependent on his guaranteeing its inviolability!

When diplomacy had done its work for a time, high finance had an innings. When the campaign of France against the tribes came to an end, she presented a bill of costs to the very man whom she had least desired to see on the Moorish throne. Someone must pay for the massacre of thousands of innocent Moors, and as France could not be expected to do so, it must be Mulai Hafid. He had no money, but the financiers were ready to lend if the assets were valuable enough. As Mr. Bensusan well says, "If the borrower can't pay, he must give more assets, until at last all that is worth is in the hands of his creditors, and while he is being sold up, the Press of Europe reads him a solemn lesson upon the dangers of improvident finance." The result was that concessions were given to France and some to Spain. The latter led to some trouble with the Riffians to which we shall presently refer, but it is worth remembering that French money was behind the Spanish enterprise. Its failure led to what would surprise most readers who do not know how cosmopolitan is high finance. This was a union of France and Germany. We shall leave Mr. Bensusan to tell the story of this strange coalition. He says —

High finance was displeased by the result of the Melilla campaign. Navy and vulgar things were said in the papers about the people who were pulling the strings, and there had been none of those superlative profits that helped financiers to bear up manfully against the shameful abuse of those who lacked their capacities and opportunities. The next move on the board was a union of French and German financial interests. Messrs. Krupp and Messrs. Schneider joined hands, there was a Franco-German arrangement (February 1909), and out of it was born the Union of Moroccan Mines. The ostensible purpose of the Franco-German agreement was to define French and German interests in Morocco, to disavow the intention of creating "economic privileges," and generally speaking to do what is right to all men. Moors, of course, excepted. It was a noble arrangement, putting an end at once to Franco-German suspicion and Franco-Spanish finance. The Sultan advised the great Kads that they must put no obstacle in the way of hard-working European prospectors, who travelled all over the country searching in the interests of civilization for the copper, gold, silver, galena, iron, nickel, manganese, and antimony in which Morocco abounds. The prospectors toiled hard for their masters. Great progress was made. It was reported that a great part of the Moors were cowed and were admitting the Infidel to break open the sacred soil of their Fatherland. The time was approaching when the Union of Moroccan Mines might hope to approach the investing public, and bring the last blessings of civilization, the mining camp, and its accessories to the poor, benighted Moors.

That is the history of the Franco-German coalition in Morocco, and it is pretty significant of the omnipotence of Capital. That lesson has once more been taught by the settlement of the question opened by the visit of the Faithful to Agadir, but before we come to that we have to narrate the story of the Spanish enterprise near Melilla. The fortress of Melilla and the country round for a radius of three or four miles had been Spanish possession for many generations, but otherwise the occasion of the outbreak closely resembled the events at Casablanca. Here, too, there were concessions, one Spanish and the other French, but both backed by French capital and Spanish grandees, and one of them manipulated by a Scot. They conceded mining rights in the mountains, ten or fifteen miles away. But there is some uncertainty about the validity of these concessions. The tribes here do not recognise the right of the Sultan at far off Fez to dispose of their property, and if the gift was made by Er-Roghhi, nicknamed Bu Hamara, who had rebelled against the Sultan, the Sultan was just as much bound to respect the concession as Charles II would have been if Rob Roy had leased out the Highlands to someone for shooting. However, the companies were formed, the capital collected, and the railroads to the mines begun. When the rails had been laid for five or six miles, the tribesmen of the Riff, having themselves rebelled against Er-Roghhi, set upon the workmen in July 1909, and killed five of them. This seed of Spanish imperialism, however, fell on the stony soil of the Moorish Highlands, and did not bear the same fruit as the French seed in Casablanca. A body of Spanish troops sent up into the defiles of Mount Gurugu, close to Melilla, was driven back with heavy loss, and Spain sent out half a lakh of troops, equipped for a regular campaign, under General Marina. Mr. Nevinson read a paper on Morocco before the Nationalities and Subject Races Conference, held in London in 1910, in the course of which he said:—

Never in the course of a wandering life have I seen such ineffectual waste of stores, ammunition, time, and even life, as during the Melilla War. It surpassed the waste of the South African War, not in extent, not in being even less effectual. After prolonged hesitation and delay, the Spaniards did, nevertheless, succeed in pushing forward along the desert benches of a salt lagoon, in destroying a small town, in occupying an undefended fortress, and in placing outposts at various points which may possibly assist them in holding the Peninsula when the tribesmen of the Riff attack again. That being accomplished, the campaign was allowed to fizzle out, chiefly owing to its extreme unpopularity among the Spanish working classes. That unpopularity was, indeed, to myself the one hopeful and promising point in the whole business. The unwillingness of the reserves to be embarked for a war undertaken for the benefit of concessionaires and other capitalists, chiefly foreigners, proved how little trust Imperial aggression can put in the citizen army. Spain, it is true, professed other objects—its joint exercise of "protective police" with France and the possibility of converting the salt lagoon into a harbour. But, as in South Africa, the real occasion of the war was the mines and the interests of the capitalists. The outbreak in Barcelona, which followed upon the calling out of the reserves, showed that there may be a limit to the patience of the industrial classes when they are required to pay for such a cause as that with their taxes and their lives. And this is why I think we may derive some element of hope from the rather futile little campaign. As at Casablanca, we can trace in it the ordinary steps by which the modern Powers threaten nationalities and reduce races to subjection—the concession, the plea of trade interests and civilization's call, the pretext of police, the expedition of vengeance, the occupation of territory. Everything was complete in miniature, except that in this case the occupation will probably collapse for want of strength to maintain it. But that thousands of working people actually refused to serve in such a cause, and that the greatest and most progressive city of Spain rose in rebellion rather than remain subservient to the dictates of capitalists, Imperialists and the religious orders whose interests were thought to be deeply involved—those are facts which we who stand for nationality and freedom may well regard as full of encouragement and future hope.

Mr. Bensusan has well summed up the sequel of the internal troubles of Spain consequent on the failure in Morocco. He wrote in the Contemporary —

The strong man, Señor Maura, saved Spain from revolution, and in the confusion that prevailed, conveyed to gratify his clerical friends by shooting Francisco Ferrer, who had been very rudely outspoken on many occasions, and had been proved beyond doubt to be endeavouring to educate, the rising generation in Spain. Had he been allowed to live and to educate financiers yet unborn might have found even more difficulty in sending other people to fight their battles. A firing party in the trenches of Montjuich averted this unspeakable calamity and a coat of royal whitewash was applied to the rather tarnished reputation of the court martial.

What the result of the Melilla campaign was Mr. Nevinson has well indicated. These troubles practically ceased in November 1909, and if it pleases Spain or Europe to think that the Riffians were then reduced to submission, they may do so with pleasure. Only, we know that trouble still arises in the Moroccan Highlands, as on the Afghan border, and that Spain has not got even those means which we in India possess of dealing with it. The Riffians owe even less allegiance to the Sultan than the frontiersmen owe to the Amir of Kabul, and it serves no purpose to draw from these troubles the conclusion that the Central Government is inefficient. This much is, at any rate, certain, that Er-Roghhi was defeated by Mulai Hafid's army and was captured in August 1909. He was paraded in the streets in a cage and tortured brutally. That brings us to the end of the first year of Mulai Hafid's reign, and the sequel, with which we shall deal next week, will show how feeble is an Asiatic autocrat when it comes to a fight with European diplomacy, even if it be Republican. To those who say that what Persia wants to-day is a strong Asiatic autocrat of the old sort, used to a little blood-letting, and not a brand-new European Constitution with a Mejliss, we can point out Mulai Hafid and assure them that in his tortures and his vices he out-rivals the most determined despot of mediæval Asia. Yet, is Morocco any more independent than Persia and freer to seek out its salvation in its own way?

Sonnet:

I DOUBT if Heav'n has anything more fair,
Nothing on earth is half so fair as she,
Or sweet, or half so warm, or womanly
Not in Sicilian plains, or far Cashmere,
Hesperian fields, or blue-viewed Nilgiri,
Bloomed bud, or ripened fruit of richer hue
Than on her sunny face and forehead free.
No lethal weapons in her armoury
She keeps, or barbed words of gall and rue;
But kindly wit, and eyes of heav'nly blue
For winged glances; witching smiles for friends,
With many a nameless way of winning them,
On her chaste bosom glistens not a gem,
Her precious woman's heart makes rare amends.

CORRESPONDENCE

Fugitive Pilgrims of Assurance.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—I see that Messrs. Haque and Sinha have sent contradiction to your paper to have made statement that they had gone to Orissa on the suggestion of His Excellency the Viceroy. I do not know what is the truth, but the Hon. * * * * * during conversation had spoken to me that the above hon. gentlemen had personally spoken to the Hon. * * * * * that they went to Orissa on suggestion of His Excellency the Viceroy. I hope the Hon. * * * * * will enlighten us as to the truth of the matter.

PATNA.

[We publish this letter exactly in the form in which we have received it, except that we have given to the writer a nom de plume instead of publishing his real name, and that we have substituted asterisks for the name of the honourable gentleman whom he cites as a witness against the Hon. Messrs. Mazhar-ul-Haque and Sachchidananda Sinha. We received this support absolutely unasked, and in order to assure the readers of the truth of this piece of evidence we inquired from the honourable gentleman who was stated to have received exactly the same information as we had received whether it was so or not. He writes to us in reply as follows:—

"... You ask me to let you know as to whether the Hon. Mr. Haque and the Hon. Mr. Sinha had spoken to me that they had gone to Orissa on the suggestion of His Excellency the Viceroy. The plain answer to this is that they had told me so. And as I did not consider these statements to have been made to me confidentially I had made reference to them incidentally while talking to some of my friends. ... I do not quite see why I should consult anybody when I have simply to state what I know to be a fact and to tell what I know to be a truth."—Ed. Comrade]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—I rubbed my eyes when I read the contradiction by the Hon. Messrs. Haque and Sinha of the statement made by you in the previous issue of the Comrade that they had visited Orissa at the suggestion of His Excellency the Viceroy. I could not for my life understand the reason of this contradiction, as, firstly, I did not see anything wrong in the Head of the Government of India suggesting to the hon. members to take certain steps which would result in a better understanding between the different elements of the New Province, if in his view their visit to Orissa was likely to further that end. Secondly, the statement that their visit to Orissa was at the suggestion of His Excellency was made to me by one of the hon. members just a few days prior to their now famous tour. I fully remember the time and place when and where this statement was made to me, and I shall let you have the details, if necessary, later on.

SIR—I have read with considerable surprise the contradiction sent to you for publication by the Hon. Messrs. Haque and Sinha in connection with your statement that they had gone to Orissa at the suggestion of His Excellency the Viceroy. I very distinctly remember that the Hon. Mr. Haque repeated the same statement to me and I have been told that he did the same to others.

Essays : Indian and Islamic.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—Kindly publish this brief reply to S. Khuda Bukhsh Sahib whose letter appeared in your last issue.

He asks the question, "Was not Christ crucified?" The answer is "No." It seems to me that he has quite forgotten that the Quran denies the crucifixion of Jesus. He does not appear to know that several early Christian sects emphatically denied that their Saviour was killed. In the Gospel of the Apostle Barnabas it is explicitly recorded that Jesus was not crucified, but that he was taken up into heaven by the ministry of four angels, and that it was Judas Iscariot who was crucified in his stead.

The Ebionites, a numerous body of early Christians, denied that Jesus suffered on the cross, and asserted that he had flown away to heaven.

Basilides taught that Jesus was not crucified, but that a metamorphosis took place between him and Simon the Cyrenian, who was crucified in his stead.

To his second question, "Can anyone in his senses deny the indebtedness of Islam to Judaism and Christianity?" my answer is "Yes." I am in my senses and I deny it. True, the Prophet came to restore the religion of Abraham, the "Friend of God," but Abraham was neither a Jew nor a Christian. Christian writers admit that the Prophet could neither read nor write. They also acknowledge that he had never read the Scriptures. Rev. Geo. Washburn, D.D., says "There is no satisfactory evidence that up to the time of his announcing his prophetic mission he had interested himself in Christianity." Palmer says "There is not the least evidence in support of the accusation made against Mohammed by Christian writers that the greater part of his revelations were due to the suggestions of a Christian monk." Now if the Prophet had instructors it is likely that he would have dared to declare before them that the doctrines and laws which he had received from them were revealed to him by God?

There were no Jews in Mecca. The Jews of Medina were his inveterate and bitter enemies, and they would not have failed to expose him had he been their pupil. These facts compel me to believe that the Quran is an independent revelation of God's will, as it claims to be.

I trust the learned barrister will admit the fairness of my contention.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,

Mentioning Mr Cobb's inability to go to Abu owing to ill-health, you say that his promotion was the reward of "strenuous sedition hunting." It is only fair to both the Government and Mr. Cobb to say that the latter had already officiated as Agent to the Governor-General in Central India in 1909 (to the best of my recollection), so whether or not he indulged in the delicate pastime of sedition hunting, it was his hug to go to Rajputana or Central India on the next vacancy.

"TRUTH."

[We are sorry if we have been wrong in suggesting even remotely that Mr Cobb's promotion was due to sedition hunting. According to our Correspondent his sedition hunting seems to have been its own reward. How like virtue!—Ed. Comrade]

The Council

BY THE HON MR GUP

"As large a charter as the wind to blow on whom I please."

--As You Like It

March 1st.

Once more SIR GUY's day, and what a favourite he must be with the ladies, for the Visitors' Gallery entirely choked with them. But in the midst of them all sat the Son of Iran who had come to the Council, not like the ladies to see SIR GUY's "Annual Review" of all sorts of figures, but to witness VITAL Thakeray's collision with the Railways about their rates.

But before SIR GUY's Review commenced, there were some interpellations, and many a question was popped in sight of the ladies. The CROSS BENCHER asked for statistics of the minor indiscretions of the Frontier, such as raids and murders, and drew the attention of Government to the Confessions of a Chief Commissioner. Asked if Government had taken any steps, and if not, whether any were contemplated. THE UNDESIRABLE ALIEN promised the statistics as soon as such a helty cartload could be brought from Peshawar to Calcutta on the Grand Trunk Road of the Imperial Council, and, with regard to the confession, announced to the Council that as a mark of sincere appreciation for Bengal, best displayed in imitation, that confession had subsequently been retracted. The fault, said SIR ROSE KEFFEL, did not lie with the Police. (Has not a High Court just awarded them a diploma for goodness and gentility?) It is "the system which compels the police to interfere in petty cases in which the State is not really concerned" (Who said HOTI-MARDAN?) With regard to the unsuitability of the present law, proposals are under consideration for its amendment to meet local requirements. (Presumably the procedure has already been amended "to meet local requirements." But will the law be extended to the Bombay High Court to prevent the Judges from misunderstanding the true meaning of a Benevolence and the real motives of a Grant?)

In reply to another question from the CROSS BENCHER about the abolition of any posts on the score of economy, SIR GUY named a few supernumeraries and sinecures, but hotly challenged the statement that the abolition was due to economy. Bless your souls, that isn't economy at all. Wait till we disband a Company of Indian soldiers when NIKHAI-SAIN SAHAI's Kumaiti has reported, and then add five Regiments of Europeans!

Another question from the same source was asked requiring a statement of cases from Behar decided by the Calcutta High Court. The statement laid on the table disclosed what a litigious lot the Beharees were. Well had Sa'adi said of them,

نام لے کر خورد مرد بہار * بدل بالفتور ہوں لہو دگر
(If the Man of Behar eats half a loaf, the other half goes in charity to the Barrister.) Only, the "other half" was the "better half," and dashed well buttered too, and at present it underwent a marvellous transubstantiation in the journey from Potna to Colcoota, reaching its destination in the form of a juicy Rosher-poolle.

The MILD HINDU asked how BOOTLAIR SAHAI would spend the Durbar grant of 50 lakhs "for truly popular education." BOOTLAIR SAHAI explained, and in explaining gave mortal offence to MELANCHOLY MABER, Europeans and Anglo-Indians were to get 3 lakhs out of this, and to include Imperial Cousins among the common "people" was to mix up Tibbys with Pigmies.

When MILD HINDU asked SIR GUY what steps had been taken to fulfil his promise of retrenchment, the latter explained that just as the law maker is above law so his department was exempt from retrenchments. All the same, there was a saving of 2 lakhs made just to please the MILD HINDU, and it would be followed by increase of expenditure of several lakhs, once more to please this quite, contrary person, by strengthening auditors and accountants with Plasmon biscuits and Sanatogen. As for the other departments, the MAN AT THE WHEEL had said for the Home Department that it was still considering the possibility (?) impossibility) of economies under the cognate heads of Convict Charges at Port Blair and the C.I.D. PORTER of the Education Department had naively stated that it had not been found possible to effect any substantial economy, as if any one wanted it there, and as if even if everyone had wanted it, his inflating colleague would have agreed to it. P. W. D. GORDON showed that in Irrigation none wanted retrenchment, but in Civil works a few lakhs would be saved. Wise man, GORDON; not a word about New Delhi! SAG-SARZI MACLAGAN had effected the saving of a lakh himself and promised the saving of a crore on behalf of his successor. THE RAILWAY SLEEPER convinced the Council that in bad years nothing could, and in good years nothing should be saved. BRETHOVEN contented himself only with a few semi-quavers, and THE UNDESIRABLE ALIEN stated they had done what they could even before he came on the scene, but he would save them something even if it was only a bit of small change. With Russia thundering at our gates economy was a consummation devoutly to be wished and even more devoutly to be avoided. ST VINCENT said "Van possumus," for he controlled nothing but his own salary and his chief's, and one of the two he wished to increase. But the best was GROVER the captain's captain. From 31 crores they had reduced the Military expenditure to 30 crores 71 lakhs and 50 thousand, and he couldn't see how India could be safe after that. Perhaps NIKHAI-SAIN SAHAI might do it by removing the revolver from under the Government pillow. SIR ALI BABA, K. C. B., had explained that on Sunday evenings after tea and catechism, the Supreme Council generally met for riddles and forfeits in a snug little cloak-room parlour, and once it was asked "Can an army tailor make a Commander-in-Chief?" "Eight old heads were scratched and searched but no answer was found. No sound was heard save the seething whisper of champagne ebbing and flowing in eight old heads. Outside, the wind moaned through the rhododendron trees, within the Commander-in-Chief wept peacefully. He felt the awkwardness of the situation. An aide-de-camp stood at the door hiccupping idly. He was known to have invested all his paper currency in Sackville Street; and he felt in honour bound to say that the riddle was a little hard on the army tailors." So the subject dropped and "one of the most beautiful articles of social upholstery in India" was preserved for the MILD HINDU to sit upon in the next generation. To-day the question is asked "Can an Army Councillor unmake the Commander-in-Chief?" And eight heads are again scratched and searched. Though the heads are not so very remarkably old, little else is changed. The seething whisper of champagne ebbing and flowing comes from the heads of the Cherubim as it came then from the heads of the Seraphim. K. of K. could bear no brother near the throne. The Army Council may not very possibly bear the throne itself. No-More-Kay, and then—no more No-More-KAY. May he too not go to the bourne from which even Commanders-in-Chief do not return? And then the spirit of a thousand Beethovens may sob and wail in the air, as SIR ALI BABA had said; dull cannon may roar out their heavy grief; silly rifles may gibber and chatter when this pretty piece of social upholstery is consigned to the box-room; and the cocked hat—yes, what of the cocked hat? May it not adorn the pate of "ABIATICUS" of the National Review, the panegyrist of C. of K. and the sworn enemy of K. of K., and instead of following him as Nemesis, ride on his cranium with the mockery of revenge?

At last SIR GUY rose to present the Financial Statement. Once more the baby horn was a boy, and a fine healthy one too. Mrs. Camp leant over the bannisters and declared to the expectant relations below "No change." Describing the intervening worries, SIR GUY said that "in the middle of August the outlook was gloomy in the extreme"—because there was not a speck of cloud on the horizon! Then came "the dramatic change"—how like the works of the Government are the works of God!—"it was also a striking lesson of how narrow is the line in India between plenty and want." Yes, living is very cheap in India, and dying is just a little cheaper!

Thereafter SIR GUY, turned an Academician for the nonce, sketched the "main features" of the Annus Mirabilis. Very pleasant, indeed, and with just a nice how window in the figure formed out of a surplus of $4\frac{1}{2}$ millions sterling. Dealt with the well worn theme of Opium, and proved how he had avoided the Scylla of "vicarious righteousness" on the one hand, and the Charybdis of "selfish obstruction" on the other. But so long as China was unrighteous, he too would be selfish, and would ask her to pool the profits of unrighteousness. That was "satisfactory and honourable to both sides." Accepted the suggestion of the SASSANIDE of Bagdad, of sending less opium to non-China ports, with a modification, after having rejected it summarily last year. Truly the plant of non-official gardeners is a biennial product. The first year it looks sterile, but the next year it bears luscious fruits. SIR GUY mentioned the name of the Hague in this connection, and people wondered who, what and where it was, till someone mentioned that it was the anæmic angel which Europe had killed almost at its birth. Proudly declared to the Council that they had no need of such a sickly saint, for "our domestic control of the use of opium in India is not a matter in which we required international assistance"—a declaration that greatly delighted the representatives of a Taluquardom that subsists on opium and official favours. But explained that he tolerated the Conference because its end, both at the first, and now, was and is, to hold, as 'twere, the mirror up to the Government of India, to show virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time the Supreme Government's pretty form and its awful pressure in the Cabinet of Nations. "It enabled us to lay before the Powers a narrative of the unselfish policy which India had followed." The latest edition of the financial code of morality says, "But when thou doest alms, do it out of the wage thou earnest out of another's sin, and let they left hand clap thy right so that all may know what thou doest in the way of righteousness." Narrated the strange story of the profits increasing with the decrease of unrighteousness, and stated that just as the windfall last year had gone to Education, it would go this year to the sister grace of cleanliness. Howling to BOOTLAIN SAHIB, said that he would find the money and honourable colleague would have to find the justification. NO-MORE-KAY wondered when the turn of the third grace would come, and looked wistfully towards Republican China and the D—-only-knows-what Perna.

Coming to the ordinary revenue, triumphantly stated that the excess over expectations was $3\frac{1}{2}$ millions—an excellent method of disguising over-taxation to pay off old debts and pile up new ones. After distributing the largess, turned to ordinary expenditure and showed a saving of less than a million, a quarter of which had been made possible by the inability of the Local Governments to spend in full their grants for education and sanitation. Thrifty L. G.'s, to be sure. Most of the balance was due to the reduction of the Opium establishment. The least thriving poppy plants were first weeded out, and now the tallest poppies were being lopped off with pensions. This year the Behar juice too was soupy and therefore less expensive. Verily Behar is distinguishing itself more for insistence than consistence.

Then came the turn of the Budget for 1912-13. Here SIR GUY deprecated the desire to prophesy, and yet appeared in the guise of a prophet. Verily Allah is one and SIR GUY is the most prudent of His financial prophets. There's always "a moderate margin of safety" to begin with, and a surplus of $4\frac{1}{2}$ millions to end with. SIR GUY neatly balances revenue and expenditure at the outset, and by the time the customer has reached home, lo and behold one scale is lower than the other, and it is SIR GUY that has had full measure and overflowing. Coming to Delhi expenditure, was frankness itself, and said he had no estimate yet of the cost. But forgot to mention whether it was still inconceivable or not that 6 crores may be exceeded. Mentioned the three ways of financing New Delhi. "The first, and in some ways the most attractive (On the 25th of August, 1911, it was in every way the most everything,) would be a special Delhi loan." Then the second and the third, and the third was of course easily the first. Thereafter, with that unvarying regard for the rest of the weary—if not fear of the troubling of the wicked—added: "I shall not weary the Council by the various considerations which deceded us, with the full approval of the S. of S. (who has got printed slips saying "I approve" to save the India Office clerks labour when dealing with the Supreme Government's despatches) to adopt the third of these courses." And then with that assurance which comes of autocracy said, "It will, I believe, commend itself to the financial and commercial community of India (Who said PAUL GOOSE and ALAS-FOR-POOR JORROCKS?) By treating the Delhi operations as ordinary Capital works we ensure the greatest possible elasticity in the provision of funds." Capital way of treating the New Capital, and the elasticity only too admirable.

Turning to Provincial Finance, complained that only Burma had been disappointing. The MILD HINDU looked at GATES and smiled viciously. But it seems that the Permanent Settlements of last year were only the shroud of Penelope, and no sooner had SIR GUY and ORATOR MESTON woven them than they began to unravel. But how guileless was Penelope in saying that "the even tenor of our way was broken by a cause which none of us foresaw a year ago." So now framed a three years' temporary settlement for the three new, or new-old provinces. But "in Behar and Orissa there must be a considerable amount of initial expenditure before the province settles down to normal conditions." Yes, it will take long before Behar settles down to normal conditions after its abnormal excitement. But even in these temporary settlements, SIR GUY has not forgotten the strong point of Behar. He has reserved for himself a quarter of its net receipts from—just guess! Of course, it is Excise; what else could it be unless it was some fraction of a fine levied for the oaths of the learned, ilam qasam.

Man made in the image of God could well follow the example of his Creator "And God saw everything that he had made and behold it was very good." So SIR GUY strayed a little over a pleasing retrospect of three strenuous years and was satisfied. But generously as well as justly SIR GUY recognised the value of the "increased and more searching criticism" of the non-officials, because it had proceeded "not from any intention to embarrass a public servant who was honestly trying to do his duty but rather from a desire to help him to effect improvement." Naturally, at the head of the most criticised department of Government, SIR GUY could yet say that he found that criticism "temperate, suggestive and helpful", and the free interchange of views which the Council stimulated a "powerful factor for good in the financial policy of India." Dealing with the figures of the last three years showed how the revenue had grown from 69 millions sterling to $75\frac{1}{4}$ millions, and the expenditure from 73 millions to $79\frac{1}{4}$. An increase of six in one and half a dozen in the other. Let some may pray for an increase of revenue, be it noted that revenue is mostly taxation! SIR GUY on percentages is delightful. An increased expenditure of 78 per cent. on Education and of 73 per cent. on Sanitation compared with less than 1 per cent. on the Army! Oh, wonderful, wonderful and still more wonderful. The twin babies had grown up in stature in their infancy faster than the patriarch in his dotage. Is not that strange, is it not passing strange? But after all, the babies are still little mites besides this Eiffel Tower of a patriarch, a paltry 3 millions in one case and 11 millions in the other to the $20\frac{1}{2}$ millions of Military Charges.

Dealing with Currency, said he was hopeful that the sovereign will push its way into popular favour. That it should, for the Sovereign had already won the hearts of his people, and by no other method than sending his Message of Hope for the Education of the masses and for the uplifting of India through the diffusion of knowledge. SIR GUY acknowledged what a noble subject of His Majesty was doing in this direction, and what a debt of gratitude India owed to the MILD HINDU for pressing to the forefront the claims of Education. But he was fortunate that he had a Viceroy now in India who wished his name to be writ large in the annals of the land for the amelioration of Sanitation and the wide and comprehensive diffusion of Education. And who will not add that SIR GUY had endeavoured by the provision of the sinews of peace and progress to second the efforts of the MILD HINDU, to support BOOTLAIN SAHIB and to give effect to H. K.'s heartfelt desire. Expenditure is still mounting up, but the ladder is not the same. "Not by costly military operations (Cin-C frowns), not by exaggerated railway expenditure (THE RAILWAY SLEEPER wakes up as a protest against the insatiation that railway expenditure could ever be exaggerated: it is its own caricature), not by wasteful extravagance in administration (SARDOW III, representing the entire creation colours up visibly) but by well-considered outlay on services which tend to the moral and material progress of the Indian people." ("That's me!" shouted BOOTLAIN SAHIB from phandy, and PORTER and the SHARP UN advised. And me!!!")

The War Supplement.

News of the Week.

In the House of Lords, Lord Newton asked if the Government had addressed any representation to Italy on the subject of closing of the Dardanelles.

Lord Morley in reply said he did not deny the disastrous situation in the Black Sea and the Dardanelles. The Government had been in constant communication with the Turkish and Italian Governments with the result that after no unreasonable length of time, considering the difficulties of the Porte, the Straits would be re-opened. It was unreasonable to ask the Government to prescribe the limits in which Turkey and Italy should carry on operations. That would be going beyond anything ever conceived in international law or diplomatic usage. The Government had thoroughly performed the duties of a neutral Power.

Lord Lansdowne asked if it was true that the Porte would only re open the Straits if Italy promised not to re-attack the Dardanelles.

Lord Morley replied — "That assertion is quite inconsistent with the words used in the British Ambassador."

In the Commons Sir Edward Grey in reply to Mr. Molteno said that negotiations with Italy for the erection of a lighthouse at Guardafui were discontinued in 1908 owing to the difficulties raised in the course of the negotiations with the other Powers regarding the collection of dues at particular posts not in Italian territory. The Government were still hopeful that a scheme might be devised satisfactory to all the Powers.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 3rd — Dirigible balloons made a reconnaissance over the Turkish camp at Azizia, Suana and Benaden. They dropped 40 bombs with terrible effect.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on the 2nd.—The Vali of Smyrna reports that the battery fired two blanks warning the steamer Texas that she was deviating from her proper course, but the vessel took no notice. Consequently seven shells were fired dropping round the Texas which then struck a mine and sank in two minutes. The Military Commander says that 69 were drowned and 15 injured.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 8th — Admiral Viale occupied Rhodes this morning without opposition.

The Italians have landed a division commanded by General Ameglio at Rhodes. They met with no opposition.

The press in Rome is jubilant at this fresh display of Italy's ability to land troops in the speediest manner.

The press declares that the object of the occupation is to damage the prestige of the enemy and is a further part of the plan to isolate Constantinople.

The territory will be restored when Turkish troops are withdrawn from Tripoli.

The landing at Rhodes occupied three hours. The weather was calm. The Turkish garrison retired to the hills. The Porte declares that the occupation will have absolutely no effect on the issue of the war.

Italian troops have seized Lebda and routed the Turks, who lost 300 killed. The Italian casualties were small.

According to the Italian despatches, the debarkation of troops and material was accomplished in Kaltea Bay, eight miles south of the town of Rhodes and lasted from four in the morning to two in the afternoon. No opposition was encountered. The Italians immediately advanced on the town of Rhodes. The Turks were repeatedly compelled to retire on the town before the Italian rifle fire and bayonet charges. At seven o'clock in the evening, the advance was stopped, the troops being then within half an hour's march of the town. An envoy was sent to the Governor of Rhodes to demand the surrender of the town. The Governor replied that he had no means of resisting the Italians and was unable to control the garrison which retired to a plateau, on which the Italian ships opened fire. Subsequently the Italian flag was hoisted over the town.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 5th:—The Italian flag has been hoisted on Rhodes Island. Five Italians were wounded in the fighting during the debarkation of Italians. It is believed that the enemy suffered heavy loss. Fifty of them were captured, including a squad of Turkish Regulars.

The work of clearing mines from the Dardanelles has been begun. The weather is delaying the opening of the Straits.

Reuter wires from Rome on the 6th:—The Italians lost one killed and six wounded in the fighting near Rhodes. The Turkish casualties were 23 killed and 48 wounded, while they also lost 57 prisoners. The Governor surrendered. He was given an hour for consideration and then the bluejackets occupied the town. They were well received. General Ameglio published a proclamation and took measures for the maintenance of the public services. The Italians have now landed at Iachania in the southern part of Rhodes.

Reuter wires from Constantinople on the 6th:—Turkish official accounts of the landing of Italians on Rhodes Island states that the landing was opposed but that the Turks were compelled to retreat to the hills, where it is expected they will conduct a guerilla warfare. The garrison is 3,000 strong, and is plentifully supplied with ammunition and provisions.

Salonica, April 10

DESPITE the acknowledged failure of previous attempts to settle the Bosnian Muslims in Macedonia, the Government has decided to repeat the experiment. For this purpose the further sum of £21,000 is to be spent upon the installation of immigrants in the vilayets of Kossovo and Salonika. It may at least be hoped that the Government will on this occasion make adequate arrangements for the future support of this new population, as merely to dump the new arrivals on the land and leave them to their own resources will but add another terror to the sufferings of the unfortunate inhabitants of Macedonia.

With a view to prompt action against the revolutionary bands in Macedonia and Albania the numbers of the Gendarmerie are being rapidly increased. In addition to the mounted and unmounted men stationed in the blockhouses, which, it is intended, shall be subsequently linked up by telephone, special companies have been formed for the active pursuit of the bands. The present strength of the force in the various vilayets is as follows.—Salonika, 4,187; Monastir, 4,149; Janina, 2,040; Kossovo, 4,154; Skutari, 989—a total, in all, of 15,516 men. No further steps have, apparently, yet been taken in connexion with the proposed engagement of a staff of foreign and, probably, British officers for the training of the troops.

April 11.

An outbreak of anti-Bulgar activity on the part of Serb bands is reported from the Cazas of Palanka, Kumanova, Kopri and Dibra. The inhabitants of Bulgar villages have been threatened with death if they continue to call themselves Bulgar, while notable peasants have been beaten and others kidnapped in order to force the Serb propaganda upon the population. Seven Bulgars who were kidnapped have been released with the aid of gendarmes.

The Bulgar Committee claims, however, that the Serb Komitatists are operating in collusion with the Turkish authorities.

Constantinople, April 14.

The new Russian Ambassador, M. de Giers, arrived yesterday, accompanied by Madame de Giers. According to the procedure recently adopted by the Turkish Government and not at all to the liking of the foreign missions neither the Imperial Palace nor the Ministry of Foreign Affairs sent anybody to greet the new Ambassador on his arrival.

Dr. Mandelstamm, the first dragoman at the Embassy, arrived on the previous evening. From a thoroughly authorised source I learn that, contrary to persistent rumours, so far as M. Sazonoff was concerned the recall of M. Tcharikoff did not involve as a corollary the removal of Dr. Mandelstamm. St. Petersburg never thought of recalling him, and even if he himself later on should resume his personal intention of abandoning his diplomatic for a university career, there is no question of his departure at the present moment.

Considering the personal relations which are known to exist between Dr. Mandelstamm and the Young Turk leaders, it is thought that his return to continue his functions with M. de Giers is a certain sign that the new Ambassador has not come here with instructions to abandon the policy of a friendly attitude towards Young Turkey, which was inaugurated by M. Tcharikoff, although it may be anticipated that his manner will be more reserved.

Dehebat, April 14.

In their naval operations in Tripoli the Italians are displaying an amount of zeal and an excess of force that at times is in strange contrast to the object to be achieved. To take a recent instance, on Tuesday the Italian squadron bombarded the defenceless town of Zouagha, eleven warships taking part, and on Wednesday the bombardment was continued by fourteen vessels, the town being at length laid in ruins. When it came to effecting a landing, however, the Italians were not quite so successful, and four attempts were repulsed by a body of Turkish troops.

Part of the fleet subsequently proceeded to Dukames. Early this morning 100 Italians occupied the Galeput blockhouse, where they were besieged by the Arabs and their retreat cut off.

The following semi official statement has, says a Reuter telegram, been issued in Berlin.—"An Italian newspaper recently circulated a story in which the Emperor William was alleged to have declared to an Italian notability during his visit to Venice that if he had such an intelligent and patriotic people as the Italians he would conquer Europe. As, unfortunately, this report was afterwards published in the German press, authority is given for declaring it to be a malicious invention."

(FROM THE "TIMES" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, April 12

Although the local Press has lately devoted much attention to the re-organization and strengthening of the Ottoman marine, it may be doubted whether the present policy of the Turkish naval authorities is likely to contribute much to this patriotic end. Rear-Admiral Lampus, the newly-appointed Naval Adviser, recently requested the Ottoman Government to permit the members of the present British naval staff attached to the Ministry of Marine to remain temporarily under his orders after his arrival at Constantinople with the object of availing himself of their experience before selecting a new British staff. The Minister of Marine at first acceded to the Admiral's request, but has since withdrawn his consent, and the British staff will consequently leave Turkey at the end of the current month.

It is to be feared that this volte face on the part of the Turkish Government will add greatly to the difficulties of the new Naval Adviser, who will find himself beset by the same obstacles as those with which Rear-Admiral Sir Douglas Gamble was obliged to contend in a country where knowledge of local conditions is almost as important as professional competence and where intrigue is rife.

The tendency to political coquetry which is so marked in Ottoman Ministerial departments is likely to be stimulated by any diminution in the efficiency of the British naval staff. Nor must it be forgotten that the introduction of German naval experts by the Turkish Admiralty has been seriously considered. Contracts for this purpose were, indeed, prepared so recently as last July.

The Times received the following communication from the Turkish Embassy with regard to the telegram on the British Naval Staff in Turkey from its Constantinople Correspondent.

Rear-Admiral Lampus, having expressed the desire that the Imperial Ottoman Government should retain, until his arrival in Constantinople, the British officers in the Ottoman service whose contracts expire at the end of this month, the Ottoman Admiralty hastened to grant the eminent new Naval Adviser's request, while asking him to choose himself his own staff to replace those whose contracts are ending and whose services to the Ottoman Admiralty have been greatly appreciated by the Imperial Ottoman Government.

The information published to the effect that the Imperial Ottoman Government intends choosing any other foreign instructors is without foundation.

Rome, April 12.

The Italian native troops yesterday morning occupied the important fortified post at Bu Kemmesh. This fort, west of the peninsula of Sidi Ali, commands the Tunisian caravan routes and is the principal key to the frontier of Tunis. The only route of communication with Tunisia now open to the enemy is a hill track from Gharain, passable neither for artillery nor for heavy baggage. The telegraph line connecting Tripoli with Tunis is now in the possession of the Italians.

General Canova telegraphs—"Yesterday morning the Italian flag was hoisted over Fort Bu Kemmesh near the Tunisian frontier, while a naval demonstration was made off Zuara as our warships with landing parties were still there.

"The occupation of the peninsula of Macabex on the 10th instant ensures to us the possession of a station for our torpedo-boats in order absolutely to repress and prevent contraband in arms from the sea. The officer in command of the expedition desired to cross the Gulf of Macabex and reach the Turkish fort of Bu Kemmesh the same night, but was prevented from doing so by the state of the sea. At 11 o'clock yesterday morning, however, a company of Ezzemren Askaris and detachments of sailors, engineers and guards succeeded in crossing the narrow neck of sea to the mainland and occupied Fort Bu Kemmesh without encountering resistance. The enemy were still held before Zuara by our firing."

A later telegram states that the landing of war materiel still continues despite a fresh breeze. Yesterday evening the enemy attacked Fort Bu Kemmesh, but were immediately repulsed by the Askaris and the naval artillery. The night passed quietly.—(Reuter.)

Rome, April 17.

Yesterday morning the Turks attacked Fort Lombardia at Derna and were repulsed with some loss. On the Italian side one artilleryman was killed and one Alpine soldier wounded.

Lieutenant Palma has made an aeroplane flight from Tripoli to Sidi Said, making a reconnaissance along the coast. From his observations he discovered that a large number of Arabs had retired into the interior. An additional regiment of Infantry has arrived at Fort Bu Kemmesh.

Constantinople, April 18.

The Agence Ottomane publishes the following telegram despatched from the Dardanelles at 4.30 this afternoon --

"An Italian squadron, composed of 20 torpedo craft, ironclads and three transports, appeared off Kum Kaleh this morning and bombarded the outlying fort at Toprak Kaleh. The Italians fired 180 shells, of which one inflicted slight damage on the barracks of Seidal Bahr Fort. The Orhanieh and Kum Kaleh barracks were also hit, but little damage was done. Our losses amount to one soldier wounded and one horse killed. Orhanieh Fort alone replied. One Italian warship was badly hit and withdrew from the fighting line on fire."

(FROM THE "LITERARY DIGEST.")

THE Italian papers, notably the Tribuna, Rome, and the Osservatore Romano, join in the chorus of acclamation over Giolitti's African policy. The rest of the papers follow suit. But bitter is the opposition of the Republican Rivista Popolare, Rome, which styles the Tripoli expedition "an act of unpatriotic piracy." In this opinion it is supported by the Socialist Critica Sociale, Rome.

(FROM THE "TIMES" MILITARY CORRESPONDENT.)

THE long-expected landing of Italian troops near the Tunisian frontier took place at Sidi Said between dawn and dusk on April 10 within which period General Garioni's division, 12,000 strong, was thrown ashore.

General Vincenzo Garioni is well known from his services in China. He must be one of the youngest lieutenant-generals in the Italian Army. An officer of the Bersaglieri, he joined the Staff in 1884, became professor at the War School, then Chief of Staff of the Leghorn Division and commanding officer of the 24th Infantry. After commanding the Italian troops in China he returned to Italy and was made commandant of the Parma School of Musketry and subsequently commanded a division. He has a good repute for tact, energy, and intelligence.

The Italian Staff must again be congratulated upon the almost complete silence which has been preserved regarding the despatch of this expedition, drawn partly from Italy and partly from Tripoli. The division is composed of the 23rd and 37th Regiments from Tripoli, the latter of only two battalions, the 30th and 60th Infantry and 9th Bersaglieri with machine guns, field artillery, and four siege guns from Italy. A battalion of askari arrived from Massowah in the Conte di Cavour in time to take part in the landing. The troops were carried in eight transports, namely, the Minas, Bulgaria, Sannio, Verona, Riva, Libia, Tripolitania and Labur. A naval division under Vice-Admiral Borea-Ricci protected the convoy. It was composed of the Carlo Alberto, Marco Polo, Agordat, Conti, Sardegna, Stislia, Re Umberto, and smaller vessels.

In accordance with the pre-arranged plan, Italian warships made a demonstration and threatened a landing at Zuara, firing heavily upon the Turco-Arabs assembled at this point, whence Fethi Bey reported an Italian repulse. While this demonstration was in progress the convoy anchored off Sidi Said, about 18 miles further to the west, and the whole of the force is reported to have been put ashore by nightfall although the transports had to anchor two miles from the beach. There was apparently no opposition to the actual landing, but there is a report that a small Turkish fort, probably at Farwa or Bu Kameka, was subsequently occupied.

The landing place selected is totally devoid of resources, but it must be supposed that the plan is to march on Zuara and occupy it in order to arrest as far as practicable the contraband trade which reaches the Turkish camps from Tunisia by this route. An attack on Zuara has been long expected and Fethi Bey is not very likely to give way without a fight, but the extended reconnaissance of the Italian dirigibles in this direction should have made the Italian command well acquainted with the position and strength of the enemy's forces within striking distance. Whether this new operation will be supported in any way by a movement from Tripoli is not yet certain, but the Italian camp at Ain Zara has been broken up and replaced by a large redoubt occupied by a couple of battalions of the 50th Regiment. General de Chaurand's 3rd Division is therefore at disposal for an offensive movement, and some demonstration or attack from this side is not improbable in order to prevent the mass of the enemy's forces from being thrown against Garioni's division. It is, however, to be remarked that the Reservists of the 1888 class have now been sent back to Italy, or at least many of them have been, and that unless drafts from regiments in Italy have been sent out to replace them the strength of Italian corps will be less than before.

As for the results to be anticipated from the new move, very little can be hoped from it except increased cost unless the Turco-Arabs wreck themselves in a general action. The interception of the Zuara route will be some slight inconvenience to Nisbet Bey, but other routes further to the south should serve as well while, as for the blockade-runners, with a coastline 1,100 miles long it is not of much importance whether the Italians occupy five points or six. General Garioni's operation has, however, aroused fresh raptures in Italy, and one must admire the unanimity and enthusiasm which the Italian people continue to display respecting a war of which no end is yet in sight.

Constantinople, April 11.

KIAMIL PASHA has not without reason been described as "The Grand Old Man of Turkey." Now, in his 84th year, he has devoted nearly 50 years of his life to the service of his country. As a young man he was in Egypt, occupying an administrative post. The British occupation came. Unlike so many of his countrymen, who regarded British interference in the light of a national calamity, Kiamil Pasha was more hopeful, more optimistic. He studied our methods and our language, and he watched with ever-growing admiration the efforts of the little band of Englishmen who so heroically and unselfishly worked for the re-generation of Egypt. And so it was that Kiamil Pasha became an Anglophile by conviction.

His Highness received me at his konak, on the outskirts of Stamboul. The house is surrounded by a large garden. It is as an oasis in a desert of desolation, since it happens to be one of the few houses in this part of Stamboul which the recent fire left undestroyed. Kiamil Pasha had just returned from Egypt, where he had passed the entire winter. On their way to and from the Durbar, Their Majesties received him on board the Royal yacht when it touched at Port Said.

The veteran statesman, after inviting me to sit beside him on the divan, expressed his deep appreciation of the signal honour conferred upon him by the King and Queen. "I had a long talk with the King," said he, "and as an old man and one who has seen a great deal, I think your King is a very able man, possessing an extraordinary grasp of international affairs and a keen, critical judgment of men and things." Kiamil Pasha's thoughts next turned to the war.

"I will tell you what I think of it," he declared emphatically. "It is a misfortune for Turkey, but it is a much greater misfortune for Italy."

"The war," he continued, "as far as I can judge, is likely to continue indefinitely unless Italy recovers her reason which she appears to have lost temporarily. The struggle is, financially speaking, costing Turkey little, but it is becoming ruinous to Italy, and in the end she is much more likely to sue for peace than we are."

The decree of annexation, His Highness asserted, "was well worthy of the nation which had produced so much excellent comic opera, and of so diverting a kind. "Why did not the Italian Government," he said, "when about it, annex Constantinople too? It would have been equally logical. In my opinion it will take Italy at least 20 years to make any impression upon the hinterland of Tripoli. In the meantime much may happen."

"There is another thing," added His Highness in conclusion, "which Italy has apparently overlooked, it is this. With us the cession of Tripoli is a question involving something much greater than the mere loss of the territory involved. It would mean the end of the spiritual rule of the Padishah the recognised head of Islamism."

(FROM THE "DAILY CHRONICLE" CORRESPONDENT.)

The Constantinople correspondent of the Daily Chronicle published an interview with the Ottoman Minister of War, Mahmoud Shekhet Pasha, which indicates the non-possumus attitude of Turkey with regard to mediation. The following are extracts from the interview:—

"There is no fence in sight. . . . We are perfectly prepared to leave to Italy the entire commercial and financial development of both Tripoli and Cyrenaica. This would be of enormous advantage to Italy. But, unfortunately for the world, Italy is completely blinded as to her own true interests, and sticks to the word

'annexation' with that fatal fanaticism which has often proved the ruin of a nation. She is blinded, and there is no genius to enlighten her.

"We cannot give up the sovereign rights of our Sultan over a great part of our Empire which is essentially Moslem. It would be different with, for instance, Albania or Macedonia or Crete with their heterogeneous international population, although we are ready to defend these, too, with our last drop of blood. The more so shall we fight for Tripoli. It is almost exclusively Arab. And I am an Arab. Shame on Italy, on anybody suggesting that we should acquiesce in Italy's annexation of Tripoli."

Referring to the probable course of the war, Mahmoud Shekhet Pasha admitted that an extension of hostilities is quite likely to occur.

"Italy has given evidence of her spasmodic mode of action. . . . The forcing of the Dardanelles? The thirty-six miles of the Dardanelles are exceedingly well provided with hundreds of submarine mines of every variety and description. I have inspected the fortifications myself, and I find everything in perfect order. Let the Italians come!"

(FROM THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, April 10.

THE steps with a view to mediation, which have been expected for such a long time, were finally announced to-day. The form definitely adopted at the last conference of the Ambassadors, held yesterday at the residence of the doyen, Baron Marschall von Bieberstein, is that of an identical but not a collective demarche, each Ambassador successively and separately sounding the Minister for Foreign Affairs, Assim Bey, by means of a question of an identical nature.

This question will naturally bear upon the conditions upon which the Porte would be disposed to conclude peace. It is also thought, although the Ambassadors are very reserved, that the question will be followed by a request, couched in friendly terms, that the conditions may be formulated in the most acceptable manner.

This morning the Turkish Press devotes leading articles to the question of mediation, which leave no illusions as to the issue of the Ambassadorial efforts. The Tanin, the Government organ and the most faithful mirror of the opinions of the party of Union and Progress, declares that the triumph of the principles of Union and Progress at the elections means that the Government is obliged energetically to persist in resistance. It adds that Turkey is under no obligation to display a conciliatory attitude, since she is not complaining about the war or asking for mediation with a view to peace. The journal concludes by saying that the Great Powers must not be astonished by the reply which will be given to them by the Minister for Foreign Affairs, namely, that "so long as Tripolitania is not evacuated we cannot enter into peace pourparlers."

The Jeune Turc, also a Governmental organ, after some preliminary observations, in which it points out that it was Italy who, against all legality, attacked peaceful Turkey, and in which Italy is qualified as an "international brigand," writes as follows: "The reply of the Ottoman Government to the Note of the Powers may be considered as definite, and drafted in advance. It will consist practically of this formula: 'As soon as Italy withdraws her arms from our territory and ceases hostilities against us, we will also cease hostilities against her, and be ready to conclude peace.' We do not think," the Jeune Turc says, in conclusion, "that it will be possible to find in Turkey a Cabinet which will dare to give any other response."

Finally, the Yeni Gazette, an independent journal, which is interesting, however, because its articles on foreign politics are often inspired by the Minister for Foreign Affairs, Assim Bey, declares that, whatever may happen, the Ottoman nation and Government cannot renounce their rights of effective sovereignty over Tripolitania. Except after making all the sacrifices which a war involves, no Ottoman Government could assume the responsibility of leaving Tripolitania and Benghazi to be trodden by the foot of the enemy.

From information which I have personally received, I am able to add that this language is in perfect accord with the general opinion of Turkey. The officers' corps in particular is so exasperated that certain Ministers have received threatening letters warning them against entering into pourparlers with Italy on the basis of a direct or indirect cession of Tripolitania. I also know that the former Grand Vizier, Hussein Hilmi Pasha, a very influential statesman, whom the Sultan gladly consults, is also a partisan of uncompromising resistance.

(FROM THE "TIMES.")

Early yesterday afternoon a report was telegraphed from the Dardanelles to the effect that firing had been heard there and that an Italian attack was feared. On every ground we should have wished to believe that the rumour was unfounded, but the message which, we publish from our Constantinople correspondent places it beyond doubt that a serious attack has been made, and indeed, at the end of the debate last night, the news was officially confirmed in the House of Commons. The news is but a confirmation of possibilities which were brought very uncomfortably to our notice last month by the attack on two Turkish ships of war at Beyrout. It was admitted on all sides then that Italy had not exceeded her technical rights as a belligerent, but the opinion was also very justly expressed that any extension of such tactics would create a general condition of insecurity which might do serious injury to international interests. Those considerations are not less strong to-day, and they are reinforced by the present situation at Constantinople, where the Ambassadors of the five Powers—who have already taken this course at Rome—are engaged in pointing out that the continuation of hostilities is fraught with danger to European peace, and are requesting to be informed upon what conditions the Porte would be ready to conclude the war. It is not at all in keeping with our knowledge of the Turkish spirit to suppose that these inquiries will be advanced by any further demonstrations on the Beyrout model. Such demonstrations can have only one effect—to stimulate the warlike elements in Turkey and aggravate the difficulties which must in any case stand between the Turkish Government and the conclusion of peace.

Apart from these immediate considerations, Great Britain has ground to justify the strongest protest against any further extension of the scene of war. She has maintained the strictest neutrality between the two combatants, who are both her friends and will continue to do so. But the maintenance of neutrality cannot be held to entail the neglect of her own interests; and any policy calculated to provoke the fanaticism of the subjects of the Turkish Empire along the Eastern shores of the Mediterranean must run very gravely counter to our interests both as a Middle Eastern and as an Indian Power. It is true that war is war, and that a belligerent Power has a technical right to use all means not specifically barred by international agreement to compass its adversary's defeat, but belligerents have not seldom had to recognize that political expediency is sometimes superior to military expediency even in the actual conduct of war. The Italians have already admitted the force of such considerations in regard to the present war, and they are not less urgent at this moment than when war was first declared. The operations of Italian warships in the Red Sea have, as it is, been attended with some not negligible inconvenience to the British Government, and we cannot contemplate without the gravest misgiving any further exceptions to the localization of hostilities. If the exclusion of the Adriatic from the arena of active operations is of special importance to one Power, the exclusion of the eastern littoral of the Mediterranean is of equal importance to us. The dangers of any other course have already been pointed significantly by the situation produced in Beyrout and elsewhere by the attack delivered there last month. We have to thank the Turkish authorities alone for preventing on that occasion an outburst against European residents which could only have had the most serious consequences for more than one neutral Power. A renewal of the danger would strain their control to breaking point, and such an emergency is one which the British Government is bound, in defence of its own interests, to do what it can to prevent.

(FROM THE "AL MOAVAD" (OWN CORRESPONDENT))

Derna, April 30.

Last night the Ottoman troops had an encounter with a detachment of the enemy, who were obliged to retreat. There was another engagement yesterday in which three Italians were killed, while twenty of them left their rifles and several rounds of ammunition behind. There was not the slightest loss on our side. The Ottoman posts keep sniping at the enemy throughout the night, who dare not come out of their fortified positions. The only thing they do is to go on firing shells into space in self defence.

(OTTOMAN CONSULAR MESSAGE.)

Derna, April 18.

A party consisting of 30 Turkish soldiers gathered together in a place called Sidi Abdullah, towards the west of Derna, at 3 o'clock on the morning on the 16th April. Early in the morning a detachment of the enemy came forward. The Ottoman party began to fire and killed five of the enemy. The Italians, in order to help the detachment that had drifted within the range of our rifle fire, began to rain shells. At this moment the Ottoman Commander sent a reinforcement of Turkish regulars and Arab Volunteers. But before the reinforcement arrived, the enemy had retreated and taken refuge in their forts. The artillery fire had ceased.

At eleven in the morning our brave volunteers made a rush at the enemy and brought about an engagement. In the fight that ensued, our men used the same rifles which they had captured from the enemy and opened fire by bringing metreilleuses into action. The fighting continued till sunset. The enemy kept on pouring a heavy fire. After dusk they retreated towards their forts. Six guns of the Italian batteries on the west sent forth continuous fire, at last, however, our guns succeeded in putting them out of action. Some of the stone walls and earthwork, which the Italians had erected for protection, were also damaged by our shells. In addition to their western batteries, the heavy artillery of eastern fortifications and the guns of their warships also took part in the fight. But in spite of their wasting 2,000 shells, they could do little damage. I am thankful to God for the safety of our forty gunners. The enemy could not even locate their position. Six of our men were wounded, one infantryman, one artilleryman, one policeman and three Arabs. The wounds are very slight.

Derna, April 16.

A small detachment of the Ottoman forces, under the command of Zakki Effendi, moved up to Tobruk and, reaching close to the fortifications of the enemy, opened fire. Three Italian gunners were killed and they fell down on the ground. Two others jumped off their position and took to their heels. We cannot say if they received any wound. The Italian forts, thereupon, opened artillery fire which was continued till 2 o'clock in the afternoon. In spite of the fact that they wasted an enormous quantity of shells, they could do no damage to us.

Derna, April 19.

Last evening a detachment of our troops lay in wait for the enemy in a place midway between the new Italian fort and Tobruk. Meanwhile the Italians were coming back to their fort and when at a distance of 100 metres from the Ottoman ambush, in an instant our troops opened volleys of rifle shots and inflicted such havoc and destruction on the Italians that they could do nothing but run away. The same night a party of 10 Ottoman soldiers went near Tobruk and in close vicinity of the enemy's fortifications. Immense booty fell into their hands and they brought it, as much as they could carry, into the camp.

ENVER

Interview with Marshal Mahmoud Shevket Pasha.

[Specially translated for the "Comrade."]

(FROM THE "JEUNE TURC")

10th April 1914.

THE Constantinople correspondent of the Neue Freie Presse contributes to the issue of the 4th instant an account of his interview with Mahmoud Shevket Pasha.

"Is it a fact, Excellency, that the Ministry of War has latterly instructed the bankers and chemists of the Capital to lay by in good time a big store of flour and bread and of medicines and dressing appliances? Can we draw our conclusions from this?" It was with this question that your correspondent engaged the Minister of War in a conversation which unfortunately disappoints all expectations of a near conclusion of peace.

Mahmoud Shevket Pasha replied to my question smilingly with a counter-question, "Do you really believe that the Italian fleet can force an entrance and attack Constantinople? The Capital is not at all defended on any side. It is open towards the Dardenelles as towards Bosphorus. There is not one single fortress in the city to which siege could be laid. You must however believe this—that we have taken every imaginable military precaution for the safety of our Capital and have even provided for absolutely improbable contingencies—and we have done this not on account of the Italians, but because it is our duty to do so. With this in view we have made some inquiries, for we must know once for all, how much flour there is in the Capital and how much bread we could be supplied with in case of emergency."

"Your Excellency would be aware whether the Great Powers have approached the Porte with a view to mediation."

"No, nothing has happened until to-day."

"Since the mediation has, according to appearances, fallen through, may I ask for how long could Turkey in your opinion continue the war—judging from military and financial points of view."

"For a very long time, in my opinion, even indefinitely. Remember that the war costs us almost nothing."

"How much, Excellency?"

"I cannot tell you exactly—but our expenses are nearly 5 percent. those of Italy and your colleagues at the cost of war will confirm this."

statement. Our troops require nothing more than the frugal meal the country supplies them with, and I wish the Great Powers could conduct a war at such little expense as ours. I assure you that the Arabs are very happy in the war which is keeping them together. They have never been so happy as to-day—for they don't need to quarrel amongst themselves for arms and provisions—but have gathered together and are fighting as one man against a foreign enemy from whom they can capture arms, ammunition and provisions."

"Very well, they are fighting for their fatherland, their Khalifa and also for the plunder of an honourable war. But are they fighting for Turkey also? And then the war, Excellency, will not last eternally!"

"You are well aware how willingly and gladly the Arabs submit to the command of our officers and in what spirit of brotherhood they are fighting side by side with the Turkish troops. They are therefore fighting for Turkey also. I may tell you that Tripoli and Benghazi have never belonged more solidly to the Ottoman Empire than they do to-day. And could we now abandon these Provinces? Now—when the Italians are everywhere on the defensive and our troops invariably on the offensive?"

"Assuredly not. Meanwhile the Italians are constantly occupying sea-coast towns and the opinion is held in military and diplomatic circles, who too do not believe in the success of an attempt at mediation, that this war can only be brought to a close by a decisive military action and not by the interminable small engagements which are of no avail. A decisive stroke can alone settle the point. We are probably within sight of it, are we?"

"They say that Your Excellency has still a War Fund of fifteen million francs at your disposal and that the Italian aviators have observed on the plateau behind Ain Zara a concentration of two hundred thousand Arabs."

The Minister of War smiled and said, "If we really had so much, we would probably have thrown the Italians into the sea. The Italian newspapers have, I suppose, published all this only to justify the defensive inaction of their army. They may believe it if they like, it can do us no harm. As for this news about our War treasure, it is a baseless assertion of the newspapers."

"I return to my question, Excellency. The war will certainly not last eternally. In Europe the belief is widespread that the Turkish Government would not be unwilling to conclude an honourable peace, of course, on the basis of the recognition of the Sultan's sovereignty over the two Provinces, but also probably with the sacrifice of a small piece on the littoral. It is said that the Porte only fears that the mere mention of the word of peace might shake the warlike Arabs of Tripoli in their attachment to Turkey."

The Minister of War's eyes answered with a piercing glance in my direction and he muttered a few words in an undertone which seemed to mean "Who knows? One of the two will perhaps have to yield, or else the forces of one will make those of the other do so."

I again ventured "In my humble opinion, Excellency, the two Provinces, in spite of the valiant defence by the people, cannot be considered secure until Turkey, who does not possess a large fleet, could take her revenge by pouring in reinforcements from her army. And why does not this magnificent army march through Egypt to fight the enemy? It seems simple and is possible. Isn't Egypt Turkish territory? And isn't Tripoli Turkish also?"

The features of the War Minister contracted into a bitter smile. "Why can't we march through Egypt? You could answer that question yourself. And as for the Arabs," said the Minister—who is an Arab himself—laying emphasis on his words, "We are used to talking about our Arabs at Tripoli—but the question as to whether Tripoli will remain Turkish, interests not only the inhabitants of those parts, but the Arabs of the entire world. I must tell you that the Tripolitan war is not merely a Pan-Islamic problem but has become an international Arab problem and farther than that it would, I am convinced, be unwise to go."

"And the new Parliament? Its majority is already known. What attitude will it take up towards the questions of peace?"

"The Parliament? What has it to do with the war?"

"But I think that like all Parliaments it will have to vote fresh credit for the war."

"I have just told you that the cost of the war to us is extraordinarily little and I can pull myself out of it with my ordinary budget. The special expenses of the war in Tripoli may, at the most, demand a special credit, which will however not go beyond the ordinary cost of the provinces to us in time of peace. Anyway, it will not be far in excess of six hundred thousand Turkish pounds."

"One more question, Excellency: You entertain no fear then, that if the war lasts indefinitely, it will not cause any complications in the Balkans or in Persia? A Turkish newspaper considers that the Turkish situation on the Persian frontier is more important for the prestige of Turkey than that in Tripoli. Is it a fact that you have withdrawn your troops from the territory in dispute?"

"What the newspaper in question has said is only a private opinion. We have not withdrawn our troops. They will remain there until the outstanding boundary questions have been decided by the Turco-Persian Commission. Nor is there any Turco-Russian understanding on this point. We have simply informed St. Petersburg officially that we have no intentions of going any farther—and on this Russia has suspended the concentration of her troops. As for the peace in the Balkans, we are strong enough to ensure it in all directions and in Albania also. We have been pestered quite a long time with these Balkanic questions; they are quite all right now."

The Near East.

CLARITY all is not well in the Near East, the alarms and excursions of the past few days are too marked to be explained away by the pacific assurances of a great news agency. Europe should be prepared for one or more sudden coups of the kind that added Bosnia and Herzegovina to the Austrian Empire, carried the French army from the Atlantic coast of Morocco to Fez, and still more recently brought Italy to Tripoli and troubles that have yet to find their end. There are times, and this is one of them, when the trend of a policy that seems to be obscure may be rendered intelligible by a consideration of old ambitions. If the Balkans blaze next month and the peace of Europe be broken, it will be because Russia has grasped the opportunity that time has brought within her reach and because the general condition of European politics makes the certain risk less to be regarded than the possible reward.

Granting that Russia still desires to pass through the Dardanelles, it will be seen that the risks she has to face are smaller than they have ever been. Great Britain is not apparently concerned to offer opposition to the move, it is freely rumoured that the Anglo-Russian entente has taken note of the question. Next comes the Triple Alliance. If Russia approaches the Golden Horn on one side, it is more than likely that Italy will approach it on the other, the Italian position is a desperate one and calls for dangerous remedies. Recent attempts to raise money have failed, and no peace can be concluded on lines that the Turk would regard as dishonourable. Quite prepared to die, he is not disposed to consider surrender when he knows that but for the enforced neutrality of Egypt he could have driven the Italians out of Tripoli. It follows, then, that Italy might not oppose Russia.

The intentions of all Great Powers are ruled to some extent by the money market, and for once international finance may be a factor making for peace. Last autumn the mere rumour of war sufficed to create a commercial crisis in Germany, had not American money come to the rescue that crisis would have been acute. At present Germany might not be able to raise the money necessary to protect her interests in Turkey, nor is it clear that Russia could raise the money to attack them. Paris and London hold the keys of the war chest, and each is anxious to ensue peace. France has her hands full in Morocco for a long time to come; and this country has sufficient anxieties at home without seeking adventures abroad. There are two parties in Russia, one that seeks war, the other headed by the Tsar, that seeks peace. If conditions were normal wise counsels would assuredly prevail, as in November last, when the question of the Dardanelles became acute; but unfortunately the season is favorable to unrest. A Balkan incident can be had for the asking by those who know how and where to ask for it; and the sanctity of treaties is nowadays no more than a figure of speech. A great wave of lawlessness is passing over Europe. It is submerging all the Chancelleries; and those who look to defend any position by reference to treaties, obligations, moral rights and the rest are doomed to disappointment.

It may be thought that in reviewing possible danger to Turkey, no regard has been shown for the magnificent fighting qualities of the Turk, his unconquerable heroism, and his fine contempt for danger. There is no intention or desire to overlook these gifts; but they are seriously reduced by the all prevailing lack of peace. If Turkey had the necessary financial backing there need be no Near Eastern crisis that the Turk could not settle. But the finest army in the world marches on its stomach, and depends in its hour of trial upon modern equipment and material; and, victorious in the field, may be stricken on the Bourse.—S. L. BENUSAN in the "Morning Leader."

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

RUSSIA is informed that the Persian Government has resolved to reassemble the Mejliss at the earliest opportunity, but before ordering the elections, the Government considers it necessary for the welfare of Persia and in the interests of good relations with foreign Powers to remove the extremist element from the democratic party whose action is not consonant with patriotism at a time when Persia desires to be on friendly terms with Great Britain and Russia and when the united action of all the parties is necessary. These extremists will be released after the elections. The Government also intends to create a Senate in accordance with the constitution.

In regard to the reported attack on Major Peterson by the tribesmen to the north of Ispahan, Sir Dacod Khan Meftahy Saltanah Consul-General for Persia, in India, now in Simla, informs on the strength of an official communication he has received that Major Peterson was returning from Shiraz when he and his party met some sowers of Heidar Ali Khan at Moorcheh Khar and captured them. Some of the inhabitants of Moorcheh Khar endeavoured to rescue the sowers and an affray ensued which resulted in three of Heidar Ali Khan's men being killed or wounded. Major Peterson's gendarmes had no casualties.

An article in the Times calls attention to the fact that there has been little improvement in Persia and to the continued absence of a strong stable Government, and further to the recent summary arrests, for which good reasons appear to be lacking. The article refers to the painful impression caused by the bombardment of the mosque at Meshed, and regrets that Russian officers failed in the reverence expected from all civilised people towards ancient historical buildings, although, adds the article, the necessity for repressing disorder appears to have been clear. The article discusses the suggested subsidising of the Southern tribes upon the lines of the North-Western Frontier, but rejects the idea, on the ground that such an arrangement would impair Persia's authority. The article recommends waiting a little longer to give the Swedish officers a chance and afford Persia time and opportunity to regenerate herself.

A message to the Times from Teheran on the 5th states that two hundred armed Afghans have crossed the Persian border and that a larger incursion is said to be in preparation.

A message to the Times from Teheran on the 7th states that another Afghan incursion near Baluchistan is reported.

The Shiraz correspondent of the Civil and Military Gazette writes under date, 11th April.—The bad state of the road and the open illwill of Kashgirs to the British is responsible for Lord Lamington's decision not to visit Shiraz, at least via Bushire, and Kazeroun. In anticipation of the visit the Kavan party had his big house at Nasrteh, fitted and furnished and gave a large dinner to the European colony and the leading Persian officials. The roads are all more or less unsafe round Shiraz and trade is much hampered thereby.

Kavan's son Nasredowlah, recently shot down a noted Arab freebooter Rezaali Khan, which action is believed will strengthen Kavan's power among the Arabs.

Three Swedish officers with one hundred and twenty men arrived a week ago bringing several prisoners taken on the road whom they intended punishing themselves, even hanging one. This roused a storm of indignation in the city and the prisoners were handed over to Kavan. This highhanded policy will not help the Swedes to recruit the men they require for the gendarmerie. The tribesmen acting as road guards may oppose the gendarmerie unless their Chief realises that the gendarmerie is a Persian Government institution and not a foreign one.

In connection with the Indo-Persian Railway project, Mr. Johns, Engineer-in-Chief, has been able to carry the railway survey as far as Gaudar on the Persian Gulf, a distance of over 490 miles. The alternative alignments have been carefully located and their respective merits marked. His progress report is now before the Government of India. The survey party, as already announced, will recess at Quetta. The results of the survey are satisfactory, but the difficulty of water supply will be one of the difficult questions which engineering skill will be called upon to solve.

Reuter wires from Teheran on the 8th:—There is deep depression in Government circles owing to the news that Prince Firman Firman has been completely routed by Salar-ed-Dowleh and has retreated upon Hamadan, losing all his arms and ammunition.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

A BLUE-BOOK on Persia which was published recently covers the period of the two Russian ultimatums, the dismissal of Mr. Shuster, and the Russian invasion. If it appears from the documents printed that Sir Edward Grey criticised some points—unfortunately not the most injurious—in Russia's policy rather more freely than had been supposed, it is clear also why his criticisms had, and were certain to have, little or no effect. "If the Russian Government were satisfied," he wrote on 16th November, "that they had grievances which demanded redress, they must, of course, formulate their own demands for redress, that was no concern of mine." And again, on 20th November, he "explained that the Russo-Persian dispute did not concern Britain directly." It is this constant zeal to assure Russia that her policy in Northern Persia is a matter in which we have no direct concern that has been more than anything else responsible for the discreditable history of the last few years. It is a standing invitation to Russia to do as she pleases, and she has availed herself of it. And then, when she has done so, Sir Edward Grey discovers, of course, that this principle which he has laid down is one which circumstances and public opinion in England will not permit him to follow, and as a matter of fact he does not follow it. If we are not directly concerned in Russian policy, how is it that Sir Edward Grey is found telling the Russian Ambassador that the grievance on which Russia based her first ultimatum is of "comparatively slight importance," that her case is "not very strong," that he regrets she did not withdraw her troops when the ultimatum was accepted, that he could not approve of her demand for an indemnity, that he must warn her against sending troops to Teheran, and so on? The weakness of this method of negotiating with Russia is lamentable. We tell her that her policy towards Persia is not a matter of direct concern to us and then, when she takes the hint, we discover that the "ulterior consequences" of her action may compel us to remonstrate—too late. Russia may despatch troops to enforce her ultimatum—that is her affair, but if they are to go to Teheran, then the effect on Mahometan feeling will be disastrous. As though we did not all know that Mahometan feeling has been seriously offended by the whole of recent Russian policy towards Persia, by the advance to Kazvin, the brutalities at Tabriz! Why begin only to protest when it is a question of Teheran? If we were entitled to protest then, we were entitled to do so when the policy first began which could not but have "ulterior consequences" most grave for Persia and for us. Had we done so, the course of events in Persia would have been very different.

On April 15 Mr. Morrell asked whether Salar-ed Dowleh had yet left Persia in accordance with the strong recommendations made to him over a month ago by the British and Russian Governments, and whether Salar-ed-Dowleh had definitely refused to accede to the request made to him by the Consuls, and whether there was any truth in the report that he was proclaiming himself Shah of Persia. In reply to the first question, Mr. Acland stated that the answer was in the negative. As to the second, the Government had no information on the subject.

Mr. Morrell asked whether the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had received any report as to the recent bombardment by Russian troops of the shrine at Meshed, in Persia, whether he was aware that, as a result of these operations, many pilgrims were killed and injured, the mosque itself was almost destroyed, and its gold dome demolished, whether the keeper of the shrine was himself arrested by the Russian Consul-General and the courtyards of the mosque turned into stables and filled with the horses of the Russian troops; and whether he could say what reasons were given to justify these proceedings.

Mr. Acland replied: "I have received various telegraphic reports on the subject, but as they are not all in agreement it is hard to say exactly what happened. It appears that 39 persons were killed and 26 wounded, but it is not clear how many of these were pilgrims and how many were agitators, supporters of the ex-Shah who had taken refuge in the hasd quarters attached to the shrine. Both the mosque and its dome appear to have been struck by shell fire, but I have no information to the effect that either the mosque or dome was destroyed, or that the keeper of the shrine was arrested by the Russian Consul-General. The Persian Minister for Foreign Affairs stated to Sir George Barclay that horses had been brought into the shrine; but I have no information on this point from His Majesty's Consul-General at Meshed.

The reason of the bombardment is stated to have been the necessity of clearing out agitators and bad characters who had taken refuge in the basti quarters and who when summoned to surrender had refused and fired on the Russian troops. The action is stated to have been resorted to only after ample and repeated warning."

In reply to a further question, Mr. Acland stated that His Majesty's Government were in communication with the Russian Government on these proceedings.

Mr. Dillon asked whether the Government would call for a full report on these proceedings from the British Consul, and Mr. Acland replied he thought it went without saying that they would get as full a report as they could.

The Desecration of Meshhed.

The Committee of the London Moslem League have adopted a resolution recording their dismay and indignation at the bombardment by the Russian troops of the Holy Shrine and Mausoleum at Meshed and trusting that His Majesty's Government will be pleased to take such diplomatic action as may be considered expedient to prevent a recurrence of similar deplorable incidents.

The following is the reply received by the Secretary, London Moslem League, from the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the representation of the Committee of the London Moslem League on the subject of the bombardment of the shrine at Meshed:—

I am directed by Secretary Sir Edward Grey to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th instant, forwarding copy of a resolution adopted by the Committee of your League relative to the recent bombardment of the shrine at Meshed. I am to inform you in reply, that Sir Edward Grey is fully alive to the importance of this incident and that on hearing of it, at once instructed His Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg to make representation to the Russian Government which have since been repeated to the Russian Ambassador at this Court.

We have hitherto refrained from commenting on the repeated report that Russian troops have bombarded and destroyed the famous shrine of Iman Riza, at Meshed. We have been silent because we regarded the story as almost incredible, and we are still reluctant to believe it. Mr. Acland's reply in the Commons shows, however, that the allegation must, at least, be partially true, for it is admitted that both the mosque and its dome were struck by shell fire. Surely the Foreign Office, which has a Consul-General at Meshed, can find out the truth if it wants to? If the shrine and mosque and the wondrous golden dome have been ruthlessly destroyed by Russian guns, the outrage is one of the worst acts ever perpetrated by a civilized Power. It is almost as though Westminster Abbey or Notre Dame had been bombarded at close quarters, or as though the British had destroyed the Taj at Agra or the Jumna Masjid at Delhi. The mosque was "the glory of the Shah world," and the most venerated shrine in Persia. Its destruction even in war would have been unpardonable, and in peace it should never have been endangered for a moment. We are out and out for Anglo-Russian friendship, but in such matters we cannot think of mutual policies, but rather of the common duty of civilization, which appears to have been forgotten—Pail Mail Gazette.

Politics and Genius.

(FROM THE "TIMES" TEHRAN CORRESPONDENT.)

CASTING his mind back, in a mood of cheerful melancholy, upon the sorrows of his country in recent years, Sohrab enunciated one evening on my verandah the very tenable theory that Persia's principal misfortune was that she had produced a series of crises without producing any one capable of finding a solution for them. An inveterate but, in this instance, misplaced turn for originality had made her prove the rule that the occasion finds the man by herself providing the exception.

"Or rather a series of exceptions," he added, "for we have had enough Ministers in two years to have lined the road to Paradise, but they have unfortunately led us to quite another destination."

"But," said I, "genius is so rare in all countries, and crises are so common, that it seems to me that mankind must be content to apply to their solution, not genius, but commonsense."

"Political genius," Sohrab replied, "is in a community only a highly cultivated commonsense in politics. When this has been practised by a number of people for some generations an atmosphere is created in which it is possible for an individual political genius to be born."

"Genius is not, then, a pure accident?" I asked.

"The flowering of genius is a subject which I have submitted to some examination. For instance, in a nation which has for a time decayed it cannot be said that the quality of commonsense in the conduct of ordinary affairs has decayed in any comparable manner. A Persian peasant is perhaps not inferior in mother wit or in native shrewdness to a European peasant, and I have even heard Europeans say, with a certain bitterness, that the merchants of Teheran were possessed of great ability in the art of bargaining, which is the art of the merchant. I have indeed observed that certain Europeans, of defective education, regard with amusement the fact that Persians prefer to sit upon the floor rather than upon chairs, and to eat with their fingers rather than with knives and forks, and they speak as if this were contrary to commonsense. But you, my friend, will agree with me that these artificial arrangements for sitting and eating do not really forward the business in hand, and, though in your company I adopt them by habit with some comfort and a pleasant sense of European diversion, it is yet possible for the Persian in turn to regard them with a secret amusement as being the uncomfortable devices of people with stiff joints who have not the cleanly habit of washing their hands after their meals."

"But would it not be commonsense to make a more general use of machinery?"

"In the first place, the general diffusion of machinery depends upon railways, and you are aware that in Persia that is not a question for the individual, but pertains to political commonsense and high politics, so that indeed it is not all our fault that we are still without railways. In the second place, if we consider the difficulties of transport, the number of machines, as, for instance, sewing machines, in Persia is very large. And, thirdly, it seems to me that the people for whom it is a matter of individual commonsense to employ machinery may be divided into four classes. First, there are those who elect to edit newspapers, and Teheran has a sufficiency of printing presses. Secondly, there are those who elect to live by selling machinery, of these we have few who have chosen this trade by preference, and all can earn a living without it. Thirdly, there are those who elect to live by taming the labour of others, it is to the interest of these to employ a large number of workmen to produce goods quickly and cheaply by machinery. But in Persia the workman sells for himself and employs only the labour of one or two apprentices. The articles which he produces by his handicraft are durable, and their price is in proportion to the cost of living; moreover, I have heard Europeans admire them for their beauty and declare them preferable to those made by machines. Fourthly, there is the farmer, who beyond doubt would reap a greater reward for his toil by the use of agricultural machinery. But I am not aware that the farmer in any country shows any readiness to adopt machinery until it is forced upon him, either by those who have machines to sell or by the political commonsense of the community, which sends missionaries to convert him. The Persian farmer would equally readily adopt machinery were it within his reach; but he has neither seen it nor heard of it, and its acquisition at the present time, when there are no means of transport, would be entirely beyond the power of his purse."

"So that, given the kind of life to which he is accustomed, the Persian conducts it with ordinary commonsense?"

"Most assuredly, as far as his own needs are concerned. It is the sense of common organization, and of serving the general need, the spirit of social, not of religious, self-sacrifice, which is lacking, and this is a political sense. Hence there is no atmosphere into which a political genius can be born, or wherein he could thrive. Where many study machinery a mechanical genius arrives, and where art is worshipped an artist may be born. Thus in Persia there is perhaps no pure passion except for religious and philosophical subjects; and though I myself am not an admirer either of the Bab or of Abdu'l Baha, there are many who believe that Persia has in modern times produced two religious geniuses."

"It seems to me to follow from your theory, Sohrab, that before a new kind of genius can be born a new movement must first be born. This movement, also, must suffer from its uncongenial atmosphere, so that its beginnings may appear abortive. And in general the genius, instead of arriving with the movement, is likely to arrive a long time after, so that every genius has many puny and unacknowledged predecessors."

"That also is true, and the question of movement is of great interest. It is always important to discover whether a movement which suddenly flames forth is really new, in which case it is likely to die down and to pass through many stages before gaining strength. And this may perhaps be true of the Persian Constitutional movement. Or it may already, almost unobserved, have passed through its earlier stages, in which case it is likely to produce capable leaders and to attain a measure of success. In England I understand that you have many 'suffragettes' who clamour to vote on equal terms with men. In Persia such a demand has the air of outrageous novelty, and when a Deputy in the Mejlis so far forgot his surroundings as to advocate something of the kind the Assembly was naturally shocked and distressed. But in England, where your women have for centuries meddled in the course of politics it is possible that the movement has been long fostered before making such a noise in the world, and if this be so it is possible that a woman who is a political genius may be produced."

"The genius of the suffragette at the present time," I suggested in English, "might be defined as an infinite capacity for breaking panes."

Considering this remark obscure, and probably irrelevant, Sohrab ignored it and launched a much wider speculation

"If," said he, "one could contemplate the genesis of, and the stages reached by, all the movements that are going on in the world at the present or any given time, one would be in a position to make some reasonable conjecture as to the meaning of existence and as to whither we are going."

"The hypothesis is too colossal," I answered, "but at any rate you hold that there is a meaning?"

Sohrab replied by one of his own quatrains.

"For all the Toil of all the aged Past,
For all the Bread upon the Waters cast,
For all the Prayers that Men have prayed in Vain, Shall come a subtle Answer, at the Last"

"The satisfactory nature of an answer," I objected, "is generally in inverse ratio to its subtlety."

"For starving men, yes, but for philosophers, no"

"But for me, for example, who do not starve, and am an indifferent philosopher?"

"The plain man will always invent his own answer, and some times he may even be satisfied with it. But perhaps also, although the Prophet of the Gospels forbade this practice for men, the diverting spectacle of swine contemplating a pearl cast before them was in the scheme of the framers of the subtle Answer. You have seen the dallals when they bring you an antique shah, or a beautiful old tile, stare at it, turn it over as though they knew its secret, and assert loudly its beauty and great value. Of its beauty they know nothing, for we Persians despise our own art, but of its value they are very solicitous, that being precisely what they can persuade a farangi to pay for it. Is it not so also in your country that some men make much money by the manufacture of soap and other necessary articles, or by lending money at much interest, or by selling to a limited company of more ignorant persons something to which they have no title, or which is situated at such a vast distance, as for instance a diamond mine in Persia, that its worthlessness is not immediately discoverable? And these people, having become millionaires, collect beautiful pictures and statues, which are selected by those who are experts in such matters. But they themselves know only that these pictures and curios are valuable, and the secret of their beauty escapes them: for the vast sale of necessary, or unnecessary, articles to the world is not the garden wherein this kind of knowledge is cultivated. With such men one may compare the well-informed swine who nose the pearl of the subtle Answer. The well-informed swine have learnt that there is some mysterious value, though the subtlety escapes them. And just as your millionaires eagerly collect works of art, so the well-informed swine are often very strong either in theology or in philosophy or in the ceremonies of religion, thinking thereby to demonstrate their possession of the pearl, and their understanding of the subtle Answer."

"In general," said I, as Sohrab prepared to say good-night, "I am disposed to agree with you. Yet, though I have no objection to being called a plain man, it seems to me that you are developing your argument and analogies in a way that will ultimately cease to flatter. Moreover, the epithet 'well-informed' appears to me singularly unsuitable for swine, inasmuch as in my country it is by tradition almost exclusively reserved for the correspondents of The Times."

Morocco.

News of the Week.

DESPATCHES from Fez show that before signing the treaty with France granting that country protectorate over Morocco, Mulai Hafid insisted on abdicating declaring that he became Sultan as the defender of Morocco against foreign intrusion. At the instance of the French Consul, however, he decided to await the arrival of M. Regnault in order not to show disrespect to France. When M. Regnault arrived Mulai Hafid repeated his wish to abdicate, declaring that the French had deprived him of all power. Finally M. Regnault succeeded in gaining the Sultan's confidence and induced him to sign the treaty pointing out that international necessities were involved.

There is much uneasiness in Paris with regard to the situation in Morocco. Signs of unrest are apparent in all directions, and the Sultan, upon whose influence France had counted, is urgently desirous of quitting Fez and going to Rabat.

Prospects of an agreement being reached in the Franco-Spanish negotiations are improving under the stress of present circumstances.

A message from Casablanca on the 5th states that the Moors attacked a French reconnaissance party at El Maariz. The French had seven killed, while seven others, including one officer, are missing. Thirty were wounded, seven of them dangerously.

The French casualties at El Maariz were 27 killed and 30 wounded.

French reinforcements are proceeding to Fez from Tunis and Algeria.

News by the English Mail.

(FROM THE "MORNING POST" OWN CORRESPONDENT)

Paris, April 12.

Later reports concerning the fighting at Maharija, on the Algerian frontier, show that the engagement which took place there on 9th April was a serious one. A French force of 2,300 men was attacked by some 3,000 Beni Warain tribesmen, and only dispersed them after determined fighting. The French losses amounted to 20 killed, including one officer, and 63 wounded, including three officers, while the enemy left 200 dead on the field, carrying away with them a considerable number of dead and wounded. It is stated that several important Sheikhs of the Beni Warain were killed.

Paris, April 13.

A Marakesh telegram to the Temps, dated 7th April states that complete anarchy reigns in that District. Owing to the rivalry of the chief Kaid and the uncertainty as to the new régime bands of brigands have been carrying their depredations up to the gates of the town. Some Makhzen troops, pursuing a party who had carried off a herd of cattle, were driven back by the robbers. A rumour was current that the town would shortly be occupied by French troops. As a result of the French Protectorate land in the town and suburbs has risen in value, and despite the insecurity of the roads there has been a renewal of commercial activity.

(REUTER'S CORRESPONDENTS.)

Tangier, April 16.

It is now officially confirmed that the Sherccian troops at Fez mutinied yesterday afternoon. Their grievance was that part of their pay was to be given in the future in food. They shot all their French officers and instructors and attacked the wireless station, killing three operators outright and the fourth has since died. They then looted the French bank and the French quarter generally.

Three companies of French troops outside the city hurried in, and engaged and beat off the mutineers. They then posted themselves in the Consulate quarter, where all is reported to be well. The British subjects are all safe. A rumour that the Sultan and El Mokri, the Grand Vizier, had been killed is not confirmed. The wireless installation is working but slowly. Latest news says that the mutineers are looting the native quarter.

Paris, April 16.

It would appear from the conflicting accounts that a mutiny broke out at Fez yesterday morning among the infantry and spread to the other arms, except the engineers. Excitement prevailed in two native quarters of the city.

The mutiny has no connection with the isolated attacks upon Europeans during the last few days. Firing continues between the French troops and the mutineers. The Sultan is isolated, with several Frenchmen, in his palace, which is besieged by mutineers. The officers and non-commissioned officers who have been killed were acting as instructors.

A telegram from Tangier says that the mutineers attacked the Bu Zelud quarter, where the Sherccian telegraph employees live. Three of these men were killed, and it is feared that there have been other victims in the quarter where the merchants have their shops and residences. The journalists and a number of Frenchmen took refuge at the French Residency. The doctors of the mission are in the palace of the Sultan. The safety of the British Consul and the persons who have taken refuge in the British Consulate appears to be secured by the troops. The pashas of Fez Djedid (New Fez) and Fez Bali (Old Fez) are endeavouring to restore order.

(FROM THE "DAILY NEWS" OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Tangier, April 16

News from Fez reports that the people have revolted, and that the Imperial troops have sided with the inhabitants, attacking the French officers. The mutineers have cut communications. No details can be obtained.

It is reported that the outbreak began among the Imperial troops, who are discontented at their pay having been reduced. A section of the troops mutinied and killed their French instructors. The population sided with the mutineers, and many excesses were committed. The revolutionaries are reported to have murdered three operators belonging to the French wireless telegraph corps, and to have seriously wounded another. The Credit Foncier Bank has been plundered.

The Sultan is besieged in his palace. The palace is guarded by French troops, who are also guarding the residences of M. Regnault, the French Minister, and El Mokri, the Sultan's Foreign Minister, who has recently returned from Paris. The English Consul is safe.

The authorities are alarmed, and have sent an urgent demand for French reinforcements.

Fighting is still going on in Fez this evening. Troops from all the French garrisons in the north are being hurried towards Fez in order to save the Europeans.

Fez is in two parts, the old and the new. The Sultan's palace which is besieged is in the old town. It seems that the quarter in which are situated the house of the French resident, M. Regnault, and the consulates has not been attacked.

On the first news of a mutiny or insurrection M. Regnault summoned the French force of 2,000 men encamped three miles outside the city. This force now occupies Fez. General Moinier has ordered five companies of infantry from Mequinez, which is about thirty-five miles away from Fez. Altogether in the region of Fez the French troops number about 6,000, but the whole of this force is, of course, not available.

The French troops available in Morocco are. At Debiglah about 2,000 men, at Mequinez about 4,000 men, at Suk el Arba, General Ditté's flying column of 3,200 men, which has just terminated its operations in the region of Rahat, in the Shawia, 8,000 men, half of whom are available.

There is good reason to believe that the revolt is an organized attempt to cast off French authority, and that it will not be repressed without hard fighting. If the fever of revolt spreads to the tribesmen the French may have last year's work to do over again.

The building in which the Maghzen telegraphists are posted has been attacked, but is being valiantly defended. It is evident, then, that the 1,500 French troops in Fez are only holding their own, but it is hoped that the reinforcements from Mequinez and neighbouring towns will reach the capital by to-morrow.

The Shereefian army is under the command of the French General Brulard, with Lieutenant-Colonel Mangin as Chief of the Staff. It consists of (1) the Shereefian guard at Fez, (2) the Moroccan army acting along with French troops for the occupation of the provinces and in military operation. The Shereefian guard, a section of which has revolted, is commanded by a French officer of the rank of commander of a battalion or squadron, assisted by a native aide. The infantry is composed of one black battalion consisting of two companies, and one battalion of four companies. The cavalry is represented by one black squadron of two troops (pelotons) and one squadron of four troops. There is one battery of artillery with four guns.

The Journal des Debats says that reinforcements will undoubtedly be sent to Fez, doubtless from Rabat or the Shawia. At the same time it would never do to denude the coast district of troops, since the disturbances might spread to the tribes there, which were recently insurgent though they are at present quiet. The Debats thinks it may turn out that the French forces now in Morocco may prove inadequate, and regrets that a radical solution of the military problem was not effected in preparation for the new extension of the French colonial empire. The present state of Europe will not permit the drafting of large bodies of troops from the mother country. A reserve black force must be constituted in the colonies themselves in order to cope with emergencies.

April 20.

The disquieting announcement is made that fears are entertained for the safety of several of the French commissioned and non-commissioned instructors at Fez. The Mekinez garrison, which has been depleted by the despatch of reinforcements to Fez, is to be brought up to strength by relief drafts from Casablanca. The War Minister has inquired whether fresh troops from home will be needed. Wireless communication with Tangier is actively maintained, but owing to the partial destruction of the installation at Fez communication with the capital is precarious.

Madrid, April 18.

In view of the fact that the French Cabinet Council held on Tuesday is understood to have considered the question of a reply to the latest Spanish proposals regarding territorial compensations in Morocco, it had been expected here that M. Geoffray would before now have been in a position to make some fresh communication on behalf of his Government to the Spanish Foreign Minister. Up to the present, however, no such communication has been made and there is reason to believe that the delay is probably due to an interchange of views on the subject between Paris and London, as it is not an open secret that the British Foreign Office is at present taking a more active interest in the Franco-Spanish negotiations than has hitherto been considered necessary or desirable.

(FROM THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN")

When France obtained Germany's consent to her protectorate of Morocco and settled her accounts with Spain it was time to look out for trouble with the "natives," whose views have been overlooked for so long. We had not had long to wait. News comes to-day of a mutiny at Fez. Only seventy men seem to have taken part in it, and the occasion was some trumpery dispute about what our own army knows as deferred pay. But no doubt it will serve the purpose. Some Frenchmen are reported to have been killed, and if they come to life later, as these new-fashioned martyrs have a way of doing, it will be to point a moral against the inaccuracy of newspaper telegrams. But their blood, though shed only in newspapers, will have served as the seed of Empire. The Sultan is said to be besieged in his palace by the mutineers, and we can understand, after what has happened, that he is not very popular. But an equally good line for those who wished for an excuse for intervention would have been to represent him as being in secret sympathy with the mutineers. We do not pretend to know whether the mutiny is serious or not, and whether it puts Europeans in Fez in any real danger. In either case it will be an excuse for intervention, and we must expect such excuses to multiply now that the Great Powers have, between them, "settled" Morocco.

(FROM THE "DAILY NEWS.")

It is impossible, at the time of writing, to estimate the gravity of the outbreak at Fez, but as to the event itself Europe cannot affect surprise. No one can suppose that the establishment of the French Protectorate is welcomed by the Moorish people, and the Sultan's antagonism to the treaty which he has been compelled to sign is matter of common knowledge. This alone might suffice to explain the turn of events, but it is not unlikely that a more direct cause of the rising is to be found in the oppression and dishonesty of a section of the European exploiters of Morocco, more especially in regard to land-grabbing. The matter has been referred to time and again by the Tangier correspondent of the Times, and the significance of repeated protests from such a quarter is certainly not to be minimised.

(FROM THE "NEWCASTLE DAILY CHRONICLE.")

The Franco-Spanish negotiations respecting Morocco have come to a fresh stoppage owing to the refusal of the Spanish Government to grant the French demands concerning the valley of Uergha. The Paris view is that the valley of Uergha must be French. It commands the road to Taza, and is the only means of communication between Algeria and Eastern Morocco. The French must have it, and if the Spanish withhold their consent it will be dispensed with. French troops have only to occupy the valley, and once masters of it it will be next to an impossibility to dislodge them. This is the opinion of some of the Spanish papers, notably the Liberal which recalls an anecdote relating to the Spanish King Sancho IV. He received one day a message from the Pope informing him that he had been appointed the great Tamerlane of Persia by the Vatican, and inviting him to take possession of his new dominion. The answer of King Sancho was to the effect that he could not quit Castille for the moment, but that, to show his gratitude to his Holiness, he created him Sultan of Egypt.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Tangier, April 18.

The Tangier wireless station has obtained communication with Fez. News of an extremely grave character arrived early this morning. The Shereefian troops, discontented with the new regulations regarding their pay, demanded and obtained an audience of the Sultan yesterday morning about 11 A.M. The Sultan refused to reconsider the question, and was unable to pacify the troops, who immediately mutinied, shooting, it is reported, their French instructors.

From the upper part of the town, in which the Palace is situated, the soldiers poured into the central town, looting the French bank, the French hotel and other French houses en route. Meanwhile the wireless station had been attacked, three of the employees being killed and a fourth wounded.

The French troops, who were camped at a little distance outside the city, hurried to the scene and were able to occupy the quarter in which the Consulates are situated. The French Minister and party and the British and French Consulates are safe. When their telegram was sent looting was still continuing, and it was feared that more lives had been lost, but evidently the difficulty of communication between different parts of the town prevents the extent and the details of the casualties from being known.

The Sultan is alive in his Palace, but is isolated. A large body of French troops are at Mekinez and could reach Fez by forced marches probably in 24 hours. Further news is awaited with anxiety.

The British Consul at Fez telegraphs that all the British subjects are safe and unharmed. It appears that in no case was the residence of any British subject attacked, nor do they appear to have suffered in any way.

The foreign Consuls at Fez are all reported safe. A certain number of the French colony are at the French Consulate, but no news is obtainable in regard to those inhabiting other quarters of the city.

Three companies of the eight camped near Fez have entered the town and are protecting the Consulate quarters, the rest remain outside as a precaution against a possible attack from the tribes.

It appears that only a portion of the Moorish troops have mutinied, as far as can be gathered from the scanty information to hand the remainder are loyal. The four French employees of the wireless telegraph station valiantly defended themselves in their house, but were overpowered. The wounded man has been removed to hospital.

The last telegram received from French official sources appears more optimistic about the situation, but apparently they know little or nothing of what is proceeding in other parts of the town.

Paris, April 18

The intelligence of the mutiny of native troops at Fez conveyed in your Tanger Correspondent's telegram yesterday was confirmed in Paris to-day. An official despatch on the subject has been received at the Foreign Office from M. Regnault, the French Minister to Morocco, who is now at Fez on a special mission to the Sultan. Wireless telegram have also been received from Fez by the Temps.

Dr. Weissberger telegraphed yesterday at 2.30 P.M. to the Temps from Fez—

"A section of the Sherrefian have revolted and invaded the city. M. Regnault is arranging with General Brulard for the despatch hither of troops from the French camp (some three miles off at Debi Bagh)."

A telegram of to-day's date to the same journal says—

"Fighting was resumed this morning in the streets of Fez and is not yet ended. The house of the Maghzen's telegraphists was attacked. The telegraphists made a gallant defence. The arrival of the first reinforcements is, nevertheless, (sic) counted upon to begin to-morrow, and it is thought that it will then be possible to get the upper hand of the insurrection."

A third telegram, dated to-day, to the Temps says that several members of the French colony have taken refuge in the French Consulate and in the Sultan's Palace. Dr. Weissberger himself is at the Consulate. At the "Residence," with the French Special Envoy, M. Regnault, are Mlle. Goublier and five or six members of the Special Mission. The British and German Consuls are in their own house and the Spanish Consul is at a building where wireless telegraphy is installed.

An agency telegram from Tanger says that French troops had to drive the rebels from the city gates, which they had occupied.

An official despatch from M. Regnault explains the origin of the revolt. Before the reorganization of the Sherrefian troops was introduced on March 1, 1912, these troops had to provide their own rations out of their pay. They were improvident, and were always in want whenever their duties took them away from their garrison for 24 hours. After March 1 the pay of these troops was increased to something approaching the scale of the Algerian travailleurs' pay. A scheme has lately been devised by the French instruction for holding back part of the pay in order to improve the food supplies by establishing a canteen. The Sherrefian troops were indignant when they heard of this proposal, and yesterday morning sent a deputation to the Sultan in order to protest. Seventy men mutinied without waiting for the Sultan's answer, and a part of the population of the two quarters of the city joined them and indulged in rioting. M. Regnault at once adopted the necessary measures with the aid of the garrison of Dar Debi Bagh. General Moinier has ordered the garrison of Mekinez to send five companies to Fez to help in restoring order. There will then remain at Mekinez eight companies, one squadron, and a section of artillery. General Moinier is reinforcing the Mekinez garrison by a battalion of infantry and a section of artillery from Sak-el-Arba.

Principles of Biography.

NOBODY is more qualified than Sir Sidney Lee to speak about biography; its principles, its province, its ideal. As the editor of that monumental work "The Dictionary of National Biography," he has had advantages which hardly anybody can claim, much less rival or excel.

Biography, says he, satisfies the commemorative instinct in man. It satisfies a natural craving to hand down to posterity the hero's personality, a record of his achievements; an account of the manifold influences working upon and around him; shaping, controlling, directing his destiny.

With death all that is human perishes, but there is something which outlives death and survives the mortal frame. It is the memory of the man. To treasure the memory, to hand it down to subsequent ages—is, in many instances, only too natural.

A sense of devotion to the individual might induce the biographer to rescue his memory from oblivion. The achievement of some great object; the fulfilment of some great design, distinction on the battle field or in the arena of letters—any of these and many others besides—might lead to biographic commemoration. But Sir Sidney Lee imposes certain conditions and fixes certain rules which must needs be observed if biography is to fulfil its true mission. Not merely distinction in a particular sphere of activity is enough for biography. A career fit for biography, is a career, says he, which is "serious, complete and of a certain magnitude."

Death alone can give completion to a career. Until death, no true perspective can be reached; no impartial judgment can be pronounced, no correct survey of a career can be made. Therefore biographies of living men fail in one of the important requisites of a true biography. Various motives of flattery, fear, prudence, forbid a complete disclosure, but unless the portrait is complete it is hardly a portrait worth having. Prejudice, bias, in favour or against the living man is almost certain to exist, and the writer is liable to fall into the pitfalls of either unsavoury scandal or extravagant laudation.

By "seriousness," Sir Sidney Lee understands the quality which stirs and firmly holds the attention of the earnest-minded. As to what constitutes magnitude, Sir Sidney Lee suggests that an action is to be reckoned great or otherwise from the number of times that it has been accomplished, or is capable of accomplishment. For instance, the achievement of Shakespeare is rarer than the achievement of Wellington at Waterloo. While similar circumstances might call into being another Wellington it is more than unlikely that the world will see two Shakespeares. Therefore, the true function of biography is to keep alive the memories of those who by character and exploits have distinguished themselves from the mass of mankind.

By presenting the rules that should regulate the execution of biographies, Sir Sidney Lee has done a real service to literature. We see biographies of men of every kind issue from the press—men of very mediocre talents, and men of no talents at all. We trust that Sir Sidney Lee's admonitions will exercise a salutary check upon irresponsible productions.

After laying down the aim and marking out the sphere of a proper biography Sir Sidney Lee points out the dangers and temptations that lie in the path of the biographer. He is severely warned off from kindred studies, such as history and science. Nor is he to convert biography into a spacious pulpit, to extol virtues and to condemn vices, to point a moral and to impart ethical instructions. Biography is not to be made subservient to any other studies, however interesting and fascinating they may be. It must steer clear of them. Its rules, we are told, a domain of its own. It is autonomous.

It should confine itself to its own sphere of work, and that sphere is the correct portraiture of the man. It must hold up a mirror for us. It must place the man before us as he was, and not as we would like him to be. It must be a faithful, genuine, true picture. It must not be idolatrous, it must not be too long—the besetting sins of modern biographies. But man is a social animal. He is a part of the society in which he lives and moves. He cannot resist the influences which his environment exercises upon him. These cannot be excluded from consideration if the portrait is to be complete and perfect. Nor can we exclude from our consideration those influences which he himself exerts over those that come in contact with him. Sir Sidney Lee concedes all this, but he adds that our attention must be fixed first and foremost upon the man, and man the alone, and not upon his age, or his contemporaries. If, on the other hand, we suffer ourselves to be carried away by the study of his age or the history of contemporary events, we run the risk of relegating the real hero into the background. It is the personality of the hero which must occupy the central position, and not the history of his age. Masson's Life of Milton is an instance in point. Milton is there lost in the immensity of details. It is impossible to give more than a bare account of the splendid man whose life is lying before us. We recommend it to those who are interested in the study of biographies.

The Week.

Home Rule.

THE debate on the second reading of the Home Rule Bill concluded on the night of the 9th instant. Resuming the debate Mr Redmond said that underlying all the arguments against the Bill was the assumption that all parties to the new treaty would be animated by bad feeling and malice instead of by a desire to make the best of things. Why was this malicious folly attributed to Irishmen, when it was never committed in any other section of the Empire to which Home Rule had been granted? It would be Ireland's highest interest to safeguard her Constitution, to work it with moderation and success, and for the first time in her history to do her utmost to promote the unity and prosperity of the Empire. He believed all the old party division would quickly disappear. Responsibility would have a steadying, moderating effect upon men of all political views. Nationalists in Ireland, America and the Dominions had accepted the Bill as a final settlement. From the point of view of foreign policy and military strength the Bill was the most urgent step they could take to safeguard Great Britain's future to ensure the solidarity of the Empire and remove the obstacle in the way of a natural understanding with the great English-speaking Republic.

At a later stage of the debate Mr. Russel, Liberal, said the Protestants of Ireland were prepared to acquiesce in Home Rule. The present minority of Protestants in Ulster, who were opposed to Home Rule, was growing. Mr. Russel ridiculed the notion that Ulster would fight.

Mr Ramsay MacDonald sympathised with the religious prejudices of Protestants in Ulster, but said that Protestant workers there were beginning to discover that the present agitation was more of an economic than a religious character. Belfast's ascendancy nowadays was over labour, not over Catholics. The Bill would strip the veil from the enemies of labour responsible for the Orange agitation and prove an enormous gain to Trade Unionists.

Sir George Kemp, Liberal, opposed the Bill. He said he would have supported it, if Ulster had been allowed a separate Parliament.

Sir Gilbert Parker, referring to the resolution in favour of Home Rule, passed by the Overseas Legislatures, thought they had misunderstood Ireland's position. Moreover, they had in their eye the value of the Irish vote in their own domains.

Mr Churchill and Mr. Samuel, he said, had misled the House when they said that Ireland's position was analogous to that of South Africa. He was astonished that Nationalists were willing to accept the subordinate position of a province. Sir Gilbert added that if Natal would attempt to stand out of the Union of South Africa, the reply of the latter would be "You shall not go." Mr. Robert Harcourt advised Ulster to profit by the example of Natal and negotiate. It would be more effectual than revolvers.

Mr. Bonar Law said it was impossible to maintain this part of the Federal system when Government were destroying unity by establishing a separate Custom House within the United Kingdom and disregarding the Colonial practice. "When the States of Australia were federated," said Mr. Bonar Law, "New South Wales recognised the necessity of abandoning Free-Trade principles. It was nonsense to talk of legal safeguards. Such safeguards existed in the case of the Dominions but no Government would dream of exercising them. No dominions would allow us to exercise them." Mr. Bonar Law proceeded to exhaustive criticisms of the financial provisions. He ridiculed Mr. Asquith's expression "Ireland will be united by a cash" in view of the ridicule Mr. Asquith had poured on the idea of material interests consolidating the Empire, in the case of the Colonies. Such things were "sordid bonds." Mr. Bonar Law asked—"Are the Irish different from the Colonies?" He considered community of economic interests one of the strongest ties of nationality but in this case the financial causes teemed with subjects of friction and were wholly based on the principle of the British Government, acting solely as tax-collector. The ministers, he said, were fond of dwelling on Colonial examples specially that provided by South Africa but both races in South Africa desired union. Ulster could not be compared with Natal which had agreed to wait till a referendum had been taken. Mr. Bonar Law concluded—"If there had been a minority in South Africa so homogeneous and so strong that no power in South Africa could have compelled it to obey, would we have passed a Bill or sent British soldiers to enforce its acceptance? That was the only analogy."

Mr. Asquith replying said no serious attempt had been made in the debate to meet his argument which was based on the character and persistence of Irish demands. Such demand any Parliament was bound to assent to, subject to safeguards for minorities and Imperial supremacy. The British people refused to be frightened from doing what they believed to be just: by the language of intimidation as regarded Ulster.

The House of Commons passed the second reading of the Home Rule Bill by 372 to 271.

The greatest efforts had been made by the Government for a majority of over hundred at the second reading of the Home Rule Bill. The Opposition voted in full strength except for five members who "paired." Sir Clifford Cory, Liberal, voted against the Bill while Sir George Kemp, Liberal, abstained. Only three Nationalists were absent, two of them were in Australia and one was ill. The "O'Brienites" voted with the majority. Four Liberals have not been accounted for.

A large number of members of the Commons in the Palace Yard and the crowd outside gave Mr. Asquith and Mr. Redmond an ovation on their departure from the House of Commons yesterday. Many sang "A Nation Once Again."

The Unionist Party.

REPRESENTATIVE conferences of Conservatives and Liberal-Unionists have decided to amalgamate. The Duke of Abercorn, Lord Charles Beresford, Lord Halsbury, Lord Londonderry, Mr. Bonar Law, Mr. Walter Long, Lord Lansdowne, the Duke of Devonshire, Mr. Austen Chamberlain and other prominent politicians attended the conferences. Mr. Balfour and Mr. Chamberlain wrote approving the scheme.

New German Ambassadors.

REUTERS learn that the British Government's approval of the appointment of Baron Marschall von Bieberstein as German Ambassador in London was given on the 11th instant. The new Ambassador will arrive in the middle of June.

Stories of a "special mission" are described as "fantastical nonsense." Germany is merely sending her most able diplomat out of compliment to Great Britain.

Count Wolff-Mettermich is still down with bronchitis, from which he has long suffered acutely.

Baron von Wangenheim, German Minister at Athens, has been appointed Ambassador at Constantinople.

Morocco.

FRENCH fighting took place on the heights round Melilla, several Spanish columns being engaged. The Spanish losses were five killed and twenty wounded. A Lieutenant was among the killed.

Hundreds of time expired men of the Algeiras and San Roque garrisons who were about to leave their regiments, have been ordered to rejoin the colours.

Maxim and quick-firing detachments in the neighbourhood of Algeiras have been ordered to proceed to Ceuta. The Covadonga Regiment at present in Algeiras has been ordered to be ready to proceed to Melilla at a moment's notice.

India in Parliament.

REPLYING to Mr. Watt in the House of Commons on the 13th instant, Mr. Montagu said there was no present intention of recommending the experimental introduction of the Baroda compulsory education scheme elsewhere. Replying in the House of Commons to the Earl of Ronaldshay Mr. Asquith said the remaining stages of the Government of India Bill would be taken immediately after the Whitsun holidays, probably on 7th June.

Mr. O'Grady asked the Under Secretary of State for India in the House of Commons: Whether his attention has been called to the action of the magistracy of Lahore in demanding two deposits of Rs. 1,000 from the publisher of a newspaper entitled the Zamindar, that the publisher was summoned before the district magistrate to state his intentions in regard to the issue of the daily and weekly editions of the newspaper in question, whether, having regard to the fact that a declaration was waived in respect of the daily edition of the Zamindar, thus constituting the paper an old or existing publication to which the provisions of Sub-section 1 of Section 4 of Act I of 1910 could not apply, the action of the district magistrate is ultra vires, and, if so, will steps be taken to annul the decision in this case and to define the provisions of the Act clearly, so that in future the Press of India may know how it stands in respect to the law.

Mr. Montagu: I have seen only newspaper reports of this matter, but will make inquiry. I have no reason to think that the declaration as to printing made under the Act of 1867 (which my hon. friend possibly confuses with the deposit of security under the Act of 1910) had been waived. The magistrate was certainly not acting ultra vires if the Local Government considered that the paper had published matter of the kind defined in Section 4 (1) of the Act of 1910, and the fact that security has not hitherto been demanded from a newspaper does not in the least bar the requirement of security if the paper publishes matter offending against the law. This is fully understood by all concerned.

Tibetan Affairs.

It is understood that negotiations between Tibetans and Chinese at Lhasa continue to proceed amicably and that early settlement on the lines of the Chinese laying down their arms and returning to China via Gyantse may be hoped for.

Chinese Loan.

REUTERS wires from Peking:—The Foreign bankers and the Minister of Finance have come to an arrangement under which a series of advances totalling ten millions sterling will be made. The amount is repayable in one year out of the proceeds of the big loan and the advances will be expended under the supervision of Foreign and Chinese auditors.

Reuters wires from Peking.—The negotiations with the Six Powers connected with the loan have been satisfactorily concluded as regards Peking and will now be referred to London. An arrangement has been reached with the Minister of Finance on the question of supervision.

Provincial Decentralisation.

THE General Delegation Bill which the late Sir John Jenkins introduced in the Imperial Legislative Council now may be regarded as finally dropped, and the Government of India are now considering the best way of conferring extended powers upon the Provincial Governments. There is the alternative scheme of the enactment of a General Decentralisation Act or Acts. These would contain in schedule the sections of all the special acts in which it is desired to forego the necessity of previous sanction to administrative acts by the Government of India to substitute the Local Government for the Government of India as the executive authority which can take action in certain cases. Similarly to substitute for a Local Government a Board of Revenue or other subordinate authority and so on. The Government of India's new scheme will be sent to the Secretary of State for his approval and then legislative action will be taken.

Council Regulations.

IN CONSEQUENCE of the creation of Legislative Councils in the Bihar, Assam and Central Provinces, the Regulations governing the composition and working of the Imperial Council will come up for revision and opportunity may be taken to go into the whole question of Council Regulations and modify them in the light of past experience.

New Delhi.

A SCHEME for the future administration of Delhi by the Government of India has been drawn up and is under consideration. The formation of a Delhi Board is also engaging attention. The day for taking over the new capital by the Supreme Government will be settled as soon as the site for the permanent city is settled. The Home experts are expected to arrive at Simla almost immediately.

The Sanitary Services.

AN IMPORTANT scheme has been sanctioned whereby steps will be taken for the proper organisation of sanitary staff in the various provinces and the important Municipalities will be provided with qualified sanitary officers. Speaking on this point in the course of the Budget debate Sir Harcourt Butler said that a scheme for the reorganisation and improvement of the sanitary services has been submitted to the Secretary of State and a grant of 2½ lakhs has been sanctioned towards its introduction.

Islam in Africa.

REUTERS wires from Rome:—A letter from the Vicar Apostolic of Senegambia says that Islamism is progressing continually there. All regions of the Vicariate in less than twenty years will be a prey to Islam. Men and money, he says, are needed to defend those regions against the dangers of Islamism.

Afghanistan.

A FRONTIER correspondent states that there is no news of interest this week from Khost Valley where the rebellious tribesmen are apparently awaiting the appearance of the Afghan army that is now said to be moving upon the passes to the west. Some four thousand Shinwari, Kohistani, Ningrahar and other tribal levies are accompanying the regular troops.

Indian Industries.

SIR THEODORE MORISON, lecturing before the Indian Guild of Science and Technology at King's College, answered the various objections to the system of sending Indian students abroad for technological studies, but he said that none should come who had not read to the B. A. or the B. Sc. standard. He had great faith in attacking the problem of Indian economic development through the educated classes. They were alert and appreciative of new ideas. Success among them was reproductive in ideas, initiating movements and thought. Admitting that difficulties existed in finding suitable avenues for technically trained Indians, he said that they had a right to ask their countrymen for more practical sympathy and a new and enlightened form of Swadeshi. Indians should invest more largely in well managed concerns, and when they held a majority or a considerable portion of shares, they should urge the Board to take on Indians as juniors in posts of control and thus promote Indian development and open up avenues of employment for their own.

TETE À TETE

This report of the Distressed Indian Students' Aid Committee for the year ending 31st December 1911 is a very readable document. It throws light on an aspect of the Indian Student Problem in England which ought to receive an increasing amount of public attention in this country.

Distressed Indian Students' Aid Committee.

The Committee is composed of prominent Indian gentlemen resident in London as well as of well-known Englishmen who take great interest in the welfare of Indian students. The objects for which the Committee has been called into existence would be apparent from its name. It grants pecuniary aid to Indian students in distress after making thorough inquiries as to the genuineness of the need for help and as to the form that help should take in the true interests of the students. It is no part of its aims to subsidise poor students by the grant of scholarships or allowances. Another function of the Committee is sending back to India youths whose stay in England no longer seems to be desirable. It did useful work last year with the small amount of money at its disposal. It advanced loans to five students, while it repatriated five students who had, with the exception of one, proved themselves hopeless failures. The majority of the Indian students are, in the opinion of the Committee, self-respecting and well behaved. But it has come across "painful cases in which a student, after exhausting all the funds he could obtain from India, has run up debts to landladies and tradesmen, borrowed from his friends, both Indian and English, begged in the streets, pawned his clothes, has sometimes taken to drink, and even found himself in the debtor's jail." In all these cases it is only too obvious that the youth should have never been sent to England at all. As it is, he returns home a failure, after having spent an amount of money that he may not perhaps be able to earn throughout his life and having possibly become degraded in character. The responsibility in this matter primarily rests with the parents. The desire to finish education in Europe is on the increase amongst the younger generation of Indians. It need not, however, be mistaken for real capacity in every case, and it is not very likely that the failures of India will turn out to be brilliant successes in England. The parents should exercise the greatest care in choosing careers for their sons. The existence of a committee for distressed Indian students is in itself a sufficient proof that many lives that could be made useful to themselves, their family and their country have been ruined by a stay in England. The Committee has made praiseworthy efforts in its own way to help the Indian students in need, and its sphere of usefulness could be rendered much wider but for its modest resources. We are sure all those who approve of the Committee's aims will give it all the pecuniary help they can.

Mr. Lovat Fraser has contributed a new preface to the forthcoming third edition of his book, "India under Curzon and After," which is, for manifest reasons, exclusively devoted to a detailed analysis of the dramatic episodes that marked the historic visit of Their Majesties to this country.

Mr. Lovat Fraser and the Durbar Changes.

We need hardly say that Mr. Lovat Fraser, as an eye-witness, had ample opportunities to equip himself adequately for the task. His observations on the effect of the visit and the soundness, expediency and probable consequences of the momentous changes announced at Delhi will, therefore, be read with considerable interest. His description of the Durbar itself, its vast assemblage, its rich and varied ceremonial and its deep political significance is full of glowing enthusiasm. It has, in his opinion, strengthened the links that unite India with England, and he rightly attributes this happy result to the personal influence of the King-Emperor and the Queen-Empress and "the pleasure their graciousness everywhere created." The Royal visit has cleared the Indian atmosphere of misunderstandings, vague uncertainty and doubts; but this is not enough. We fully endorse Mr. Lovat Fraser's view that "the representatives of Great Britain in India have to build upon the new basis which the Imperial visit has furnished. The task which still lies before them is to convince the people of India, by wise and just government, by prudent concessions, by inviting further co-operation in control, that their interest will best be served by remaining within the British Empire." Passing from the Durbar, which he pronounces to have been an unqualified success, to the more controversial question of the Royal Announcement at Delhi, Mr. Fraser develops a cold, critical and almost relentless attitude. He subjects the reasons advanced in the Government of India Despatch in justification of the changes to a severe and detailed examination and dismisses them as weak and inadequate. First, as regards the transfer of the capital to Delhi, the Government of India have based their decision on three distinct grounds firstly, that they "should not be associated with any particular Provincial Government", secondly, that the Imperial Legislative Council and the Government of India should be "withdrawn from the influence of local opinion"; thirdly, that there are political advantages which it is "impossible to overestimate." On the face of them these arguments are not very convincing and Mr. Fraser finds no difficulty in demonstrating their lack of cogency and force. All the same, the transfer has met with general approval outside the vested interests in Bengal. It has appealed to the historic sentiment of the people at large, a sentiment which, notwithstanding Mr. Fraser's scepticism, exercises a potent influence over their lives and opinions. It has certainly released Government from the dominance of Calcutta, and if sufficient care is taken to guard against isolation and its resultant evils, there is every likelihood that the Government standpoint will attain to the balance and proportion it has hitherto lacked. The reversal of the partition in itself furnishes a powerful argument in support of the contention that the Government has sometimes been hopelessly obsessed by Bengali whims and sentiment. Mr. Fraser seems to entertain grave apprehensions in regard to the choice of Delhi as Imperial Capital on the score of its strategical insecurity. In the event of some invasion or revolutionary upheaval Delhi would be defenceless and its loss, "even for a brief period, would inflict a blow upon our prestige far in excess of the military importance of such a reverse." We hope fears of this nature are not common amongst the modern Britons, for they betray a nervousness and a lack of self-confidence that presage anything but good for the future of the Empire. The government that would be weak enough to lose Delhi would scarcely be fit to hold India, and the loss of Delhi would come about, not through a stray revolt or a sudden surprise of an invading host marching to the sack of Hindustan, but through the general decay of the fibre and spirit of the power entrusted with the defence of the Empire. As regards the second part of the Announcement, i.e., the reversal of the partition, Mr. Fraser's views are based on incontestable facts and deserve the most careful consideration. In fact he comes to almost exactly the same conclusions that we have so often expressed in these columns. Briefly speaking, he maintains that "the reversal of the partition was an afterthought." And he succeeds in proving out of the mouths of the Government of India and the Secretary of State that "the partition was not reversed on its merits but as a sop to prevent resentment at Calcutta's loss." He ridicules the official plea, so laboriously discovered out of the ashes of a dead and buried agitation, that the grievance of the Bengalis was "real and tangible," or that they were suffering under "a grievous wrong." He denudes with equal force the argument that the partition was responsible for "the growing estrangement" in many parts of the country between Hindus and Muhammadans, and that it was to alleviate "this most regrettable antagonism" that the Government reversed the partition. "If no better reason is forthcoming, then they stand self-condemned. For what has been the result? The rash and reactionary policy adopted has actually intensified the bitterness of feeling between Muhammadans and Hindus. . . . Very little was heard of Muhammadan indignation while the King-Emperor remained in India, for a feeling of loyalty enjoined temporary silence, but the wrath of resentful Islam has been uncommonly audible ever since, and is still waxing louder. The Muhammadans of Eastern Bengal feel that they have been betrayed. Under the greatest provocation they remained perfectly quiet for seven years, relying implicitly upon British pledges. They have now been flung aside." As regards the growth of co-operation and harmony between the Hindus and the Moslems of Bengal, it would be instructive to know that "already the Calcutta Hindus are resuming their familiar attitude, and are loudly grudging bereaved Dacca its promised University." It is altogether illusory to lay stress on the numerical balance of the two communities in the Presidency of Bengal. "Unquestionably the Calcutta Hindus will in practice enjoy their former monopoly of power and influence." These are opinions with which every dispassionate observer will find himself in complete agreement. We trust the Government, too, may have learnt enough by this time to understand this just and reasonable standpoint. Mr. Fraser's analysis of the changes and their probable results is, with some exceptions we have noted above, on the whole worthily performed. He is not free from the bias that naturally clings to a man whose life has been spent in the exposition and practice of the ideals of conservative Imperialism. His attitude towards the gradual rise in the political status of Indians is not very inspiring. But he is too experienced a publicist not to recognise the irresistible nature of some of the Indian demands, and he knows how to bow gracefully to the inevitable.

The occupation of a number of tiny islands in the Aegean has not a whit improved the Italian chances of success in the war, or impaired Turkish powers of resistance. The sensation has been prepared for consumption at home where some ugly manifestations of populist feeling are beginning to be visible. The "Nationalists" who had learnt to think imperially, had engineered the press campaign that ultimately forced the Italian Government to launch its luckless enterprise in Tripoli. How the enterprise has fared may best be gathered from the frantic efforts Italy is now making to set the whole Europe ablaze. The "Nationalist" organs are by turn praying the Turks to give up resistance and blaming their generals for the impasse they have created in Tripoli. At times they brandish that much-provoking "Decree of Annexation" in the face of Europe, about which Kiamil Pasha has said that "it was quite worthy of the nation that has produced the best comic opera." The question naturally arises at this stage, how is this melodrama to end. No definite answer, however, can be found to this question as there are many incalculable factors governing the problem. Italy is powerless to coerce Turkey single-handed. Nor is she capable of undertaking the conquest of Tripoli without breaking down under the enormous strain that such an effort will involve. The occupation of the Aegean islands has not the slightest value in relation to the main issue of the war. Is it, then, a part of some new and bolder scheme that is to be put into execution later on? The military correspondent of the Times throws out some vague hints to that effect in his survey of the present situation. There have been persistent rumours about a Russo-Italian understanding having been recently arrived at with a view to take concerted action in forcing Turkey to submit to peace terms dictated by Russia and Italy. Such co-operation may take the form of a simultaneous attack on the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles. If this is a probable contingency, a general European conflagration cannot be far out of sight. The dogs of war in the Balkans are only waiting for some such opportunity to fly at one another's throats; and while Turkey will have to fight for her life, her stake will not be heavier than that of Austria, Russia and possibly of Germany and England. The future is on the knees of the gods. We wish European diplomacy had the moral strength to avert a catastrophe that would shake the whole of Europe to its foundations. A brigand has almost endangered the peace of the world, but none of the civilised Powers seems to have the courage to restrain him in his career of wanton destruction relieved by cowardice. The Ottoman Government is opening the Dardanelles to-day, with no guarantees at all, and who knows but that another Italian raid may be launched in a few days.

We reproduce elsewhere the interviews which a representative of the Daily Chronicle has had with Mahmud Shevket Pasha and Kiamil Pasha on the subject of the proposed peace. We had also reproduced a few weeks ago the text of a remarkable interview which H. E. Assin Bey, the Turkish Foreign Minister, had granted to the same representative. It defined the attitude of the Ottoman Government towards the so-called peace proposals of Italy with a strength, lucidity and frankness that cannot be mistaken. Assin Bey is one of the ablest and most brilliant amongst the younger statesmen of modern Turkey and his pronounced sentiment will, we are sure, leave no room for doubt as to the unfaltering determination of the Turkish Government to defend at any cost the honour and integrity of the Empire. As he rightly observed, a treacherous and unscrupulous foe has attacked Turkey just when her hopes were the brightest. The adventure has ended in a disgraceful debacle. But the nervous politicians of Rome went through a parliamentary farce and declared that Tripoli was thenceforth to be an Italian province. This action on paper was created as much to deceive the Italian populace as to bolster up a sort of pretence for a fact that was not, and probably can never be, accomplished. "Countries cannot be conquered by Royal decrees of annexation," says the Turkish Foreign Minister. If Italy desires peace, i.e. her first tear up that ridiculous document. As for Turkey, she can afford to wait for the issue of the conflict with equanimity. She is fully prepared to face all eventualities, and would fight to the last gasp in defence of her honour and interests rather than accept peace at any price. The courageous and unequivocal statement of policy by the Turkish Foreign Minister must have reassured the whole Islamic world that the cause of Islam in Tripoli, the cause of right and justice, will not be sacrificed or sold away at the bidding of a brigand who has not even the redeeming feature of courage. The Turkish reply to the Powers seeking the necessary basis for mediation has for the time being stopped all talks about peace. The recent development of Russo-Italian cordiality, and, more particularly, the tone of the maiden speech delivered by the Russian Foreign Minister, render Russian intervention a possible contingency of the future. About the actual position of affairs in Tripoli there is nothing new to report, except that the more recent accounts of the eye-witnesses, which we have been publishing from time to time bring into clearer relief the hopeless deadlock into which the Italian enterprise has sunk. Even the Times correspondent has at last been forced to report, after many denials and doubts, that the Sheikh of the Senussi has declared war against Italy, that the declaration has been inscribed in thousand words on a banner, that some contingents have already arrived in the Turkish camp, that his nephew is coming up with a force of 3,000 or 4,000 Arabs, and that the Sheikh himself will continue helping the Turkish cause with men and money. The Egyptian papers had reported three months ago all what the Times correspondent is now beginning to admit. Prior to this tardy admission we had been assured by him that the leader of the Senussi had no concern whatever with the fortunes of the contest which his countrymen and co-religionists were waging in defence of their homes, their liberties, their honour, and their faith. What is even stranger still, an earlier myth about the Sheikh had represented him as the head of a formidable religious confederacy which was preparing a great coup in secret against the ascendancy of the white man in Africa. After some experience of the peaceful ways of this great and puritanic religious fraternity, the legend about the "Senussi Peril" began to die a natural death. By some inscrutable twist of logic the Senussi leader began to be represented, since the Italian descent on Tripoli, as wholly indifferent to the fate of his followers and his own country. Both these theories were the sort of fantastic creations which do duty for facts in modern European diplomacy. No one after this can reasonably doubt that the Turkish and the Egyptian accounts of the war in Tripoli are, under the circumstances, the most reliable.

The scheme of exploitation that has taken shape as the Persian Railway Project is being worked out in detail by the Russian bankers in conjunction with their London confreres. Meanwhile an ominous spell of silence seems to have fallen over the actual state of things in Persia after the tale of Russian atrocities at Meshed was by degrees divulged to the world in all its naked horror. An indication of the attitude of the virtual dictators at Teheran was furnished the other day by Reuter when Russia was reported to be anxious for summoning the Majlis—shortly, of course, of its "extremists"! The Persian Government, we may presume, exists under the shadow of a "veiled protection," very much as Mulla Hafid continues to grace the throne of his ancestors after the "peaceful penetration" of France has been blessed by his royal sanction. His pathetic desire to abdicate has been vetoed by the astute French Resident who knows the value of a lawful despot in the growth and consolidation of French power in the Shereefian Empire. The feelings of the Persian Ministers may not be far removed from those of His Shereefian Majesty, but they are held to their post by an inextinguishable diplomacy. They must continue in office to bear responsibility for civil anarchy and chaos and furnish the necessary excuse for the steady development of the Russian scheme of occupation. As the executions at Tabriz and Meshed have shown, patriotism of the Persian is high treason to the Tsar; and as long as the Russian agents are supreme at Teheran it matters little whether the Government of Persia is nominally carried on by an independent Executive or by an Executive controlled by Majlis. The choice is simply between Tweedledum and Tweedledee. Under the circumstances we do not see why the Persian Government should be held responsible for disturbances and rebellions in the provinces and for the unsafe condition of the caravan routes. This is, however, a necessary move in the game. We await future developments with the curiosity of one studying a new and mysterious art. The facts of the present situation are these. Russia is in military occupation of all the principal towns in the northern provinces. She has nominated her own governors of these places, some of them being the notorious outlaws on whose heads the Persian Government had set a price. In spite of the assurances given to Sir Edward Grey, the Russian occupation is becoming permanent. Intimidation and terrorism, execution of Persian patriots and leaders of faith, wanton bloodshed and desecration of the most sacred places are the order of the day. Bahr-ud-Dawlah still hangs about the south-western frontier and the offer of the Turkish Government to help in his expulsion or capture has been rejected, probably at the bidding of the Russian Minister at Teheran. The Government has for the time being forfeited all power of initiative. These broad facts, however, have been quietly ignored by our contemporaries, the Times of India and the Englishman, in their efforts to magnify the significance of the so-called "Afghan Raid" into Persia. Our Bombay contemporary reads a lecture to the Musalmans on the responsibility of the weakness of its Moslem neighbours to their gaze and hopes, with evident gloe, that they will "soon" attack the Afghan hordes just as they have been protesting against the capture of Russia. The Englishman develops a new line of words of which a patriotic enthusiasm. It says:—"What will Afghanistan do to the east and Turkey to the west ready to snatch territory and the crown tribal chiefs up in arms against the Government at Teheran, the case of Persia is indeed a sad one." We are sure our contemporaries know as well as we do the real state of Persia and the causes to which her present troubles are due. What they say for the edification of the Indian Mussalmans cannot distort the real issues. The petty quarrels on the Perso-Afghan frontier are as old as the waters of Helmsud. To try to read into them a wider significance and interpret them as a part of some aggressive design hatched in secret by the Afghan Government does little credit to our contemporaries' sense of proportion any more than to their estimate of the attitude of the Mussalmans and their knowledge of the situation. The presence of the Turkish troops in Urumia is proving a veritable thorn in the side of Russia. But the Turks are not there to establish "order." They provisionally hold the territory that is still in dispute, about which a Commission is sitting in Constantinople. The Muscovite can bear no brother near the little throne that he is erecting for himself in Persia, and we need not be surprised if we hear the Turks accused of aggression, who are as much concerned about the safety of their own frontier as the Persians are about their independence. Now, however, it would seem as if the Russian movements in northern Persia were dictated by the altruistic desire of saving Persia from being "snatched" by Turkey and Afghanistan. One may live and learn.

It is not very often that one gets a glimpse of what is actually happening in that dark region of the earth, known as the Russian Empire. The implacable energy and resolve that mark the Muscovite foreign policy convey the impression of a strength that is wonderful, even though it has always been exercised to crush freedom and exalt iniquity. This strength, however, is not the expression of a free society organised into a State for the common purposes of secular development. It is the breath of an autocracy based on militarism, which can only exist by the exercise of a ruthless and impartial suppression at home as well as abroad. The failure of the revolutionary movement, due in the main to physical causes, the vastness of the area, the diversity of races and the consequent dispersion of aim and lack of cohesion has given the Russian Autocracy a new lease of life. It has emerged triumphant and its complete success has led to the revival of its methods. The Duma exists on sufferance, and even this is possible because it has become a willing puppet in the hands of the bureaucracy and an obedient instrument of the will of the Tsar. The Muscovite has begun to play the bully again. Meanwhile the condition of the Russian masses has grown worse than ever. They are starving in millions. They are suffering under a frightful weight of oppression as the result of the cruel agrarian laws. The feeble voice of suffering wrung out of the heart of pain is promptly gagged by the myrmidons of the police who know how to restore "perfect quiet and order" in the dominions of the Tsar. The persecution of the Jews has been revised in all its ferocity. One of the forms in which tyranny is practised over that hapless community is the bringing of a charge of "ritual murder" against its members who are forthwith tried by an ecclesiastical "inquisition" and condemned to death. This "blood accusation," as it is called, flourishes on a horrible lie, industriously circulated by the clergy of the Orthodox Church, that the Jews entice away Christian boys who are offered as sacrifices in some blood curdling and inhuman rite. This is a monstrous falsehood, which had been frequently responsible for Jewish massacres in the past. It has been revived again and a Jew named Beilis was to be tried at Keiff on this horrible charge. We are glad to hear that "four separate protests—Russian, French, German and British—signed by the most distinguished representatives of the liberal professions and leaders of thought of those countries have been simultaneously published," though we are sceptical as to these protests proving effective. The Russian bureaucracy treats the moral scruples of the civilised world with undisguised contempt, and we think no European government would dare address a remonstrance to St. Petersburg such as is not unoften done in the case of Turkey. European conscience is stirred to righteous wrath when the Ottoman Government is obliged to put down anarchy and rebellion amongst the Christian malcontents of the Empire, and the tales of "Turkish atrocities" artistically finished by the blood-and-thunder correspondents find their way into the press of Europe. Russia, however, is immune from such protests and can persecute Jews and impose political and religious disabilities on her Mussalman subjects without incurring the displeasure of the civilised Powers. The Jews in Turkey enjoy perfect toleration and the Christian races enjoy privileges in some cases denied even to her Moslem subjects. But the Serb, the Bulgar and the Armenian must go on uttering grievous tales of woe because it suits certain Powers in the furtherance of their well-known political designs on the Turkish Empire. We do not know how to interpret the gushing friendship of such civilised Governments as those of France and England with a Power that is so ruthlessly brutal at home and unscrupulous in its relations abroad, except on the hypothesis that diplomacy is mainly concerned with the exercise of an art in which ethics would be a sheer irrelevance.

The Comrade.

Moslems and Buddhists.

PROFESSOR A. VAMBERY of Budapest represents the type of European publicists who after an itinerant journey through a part of the East have ever since set up as undisputable authority on all Eastern affairs. These "students" of Oriental races and religions, as they style themselves, are never so happy as when some event of extraordinary triviality strikes their imaginations and affords them the rare luxury of seeing themselves in print, clad in the panoply of conventional phrase and the glitter of stock generalities. They construct new theories with marvellous ineptitude, try impossible combinations of facts, strain every nerve after melodramatic effects, and not unoften touch the heights of the insane in their quest for sensationalism. To preach, to warn, to foretell disaster is characteristic of the type. Rapid means of communication between Europe and Asia, which have shrivelled the world to a hand's breadth, might be supposed to have led to the growth of mutual knowledge and sympathy. As a matter of fact they have created a gulf of hostility, intolerance and misunderstanding that keeps the two continents apart to a degree never known in the history of the world before. The very facilities for free intercourse have grown to be insuperable barriers between them. Very few Europeans take the trouble of entering into the feelings of the Eastern peoples, just because the opportunities are so great and they can be missed without a pang. The existing political relations have complicated matters still further by creating a wide diversity of motive and outlook. Add to this the noisy hum and buzz of a race of faddists who keep hanging on the flanks of the diplomatists, the imperialists and the financiers of Europe and never lose a chance of making the confusion worse confounded. The steam, the electricity and other thousand and one inventions of science have annihilated distance and drawn the world closer in every part. The pseudo-scientific theories about race, religion and climate dictated for the most part by the selfish instincts of political domination have, on the other hand, dug deeper lines of cleavage than those over which science has triumphed.

Europe has gone through a varied political experience and yet it has evolved no coherent political philosophy. Much that passes for current political thought is in substance the work of political impressionists dominated by fear. Modern democracies have got to be fed on "bogey", and it is inevitable that an army of trained manufacturers should appear on the scene to supply the article. "Yellow Peril," "Black Peril," "Brown Peril," "Pan-Islamism" have in turn been served up to satisfy the European appetite for panic. We need not enquire too closely into the psychology of the temper that requires such weird stimuli. The instinct of self-preservation is a tyrant and some times a humorous tyrant at that and plays strange pranks on the craven and the weak. Europe that is so powerful and full of energy and determination to all outward seeming may have heard the footsteps of the Nemesis dogging at its heels. Moral doubts and fears effectually paralyse the hand that wields power of any kind, and who knows but that the political sins of Europe have returned to plague it in the shape of its faddists and alarmists who are busy manufacturing "bogey" which may be no more than the proverbial "daggers of the mind." The appetite for this strange diet grows on what it feeds upon. The taste, too, is growing decidedly complex; a brand new "bogey" compounded of the "simples" would seem to be required now to tickle the jaded palate. It was reserved for Professor A. Vambery to prepare the "compound" and call it "An Approach between Moslems and Buddhists."

The Turko-Italian War and the affairs in Morocco and Persia have served as the texts of many a lay sermon about the duty of the European Powers to establish political control over the non-white races in the interests of civilisation. Large countries rich in mineral wealth and agricultural resources cannot for ever be suffered to remain unexploited and desolate, a prey to chronic misrule and chaos. The native races may not willingly accept alien rule, but they cannot be the best judges of their political and social needs. At all events, the economic development of the world and the spread of the arts and industries of modern civilisation cannot be held in check for long in deference to native susceptibilities. It is the moral obligation of civilised Europe to take the inferior races under its tutelage, to open up fresh tracts of the earth to international trade, to develop their resources and to introduce modern standards of life, comfort, duty and thought amongst their inhabitants. This is the line of argument that all modern casuists adopt in order to justify the political aggressions of Europe. Professor A. Vambery, therefore, adds nothing to our knowledge when he repeats these set formulas of aggressive imperialism with the mechanical ease of a zealous disciple going through his Sunday catechism. As long as Europe holds the field in political power there will be no lack of admirers of its methods. Thanks to its "cultural" advancement and the wide sweep of its thoughts, moral justifications and ethical formulas can be found for any act, motive or desire of which European humanity is capable singly or in mass. Freedom was once considered to be a divine gift. It is now a mere phrase blasted by the hot breath of the god of Materialism, the Almighty Dollar States and Sovereigns, in not very remote ages, thought justice to be the true expediency. If, however, Europe deems it necessary, in its relations with the weaker races, to destroy freedom and regard justice as something grossly inexpedient and stuff its conscience with the most cynical implications of a shallow evolutionary philosophy, the world, at any rate, might well have been spared the reiteration thereof by a publicist who is so eager of being abreast of modern cynicism and yet has not the thoroughgoing courage even of the cynic. Towards the close of his article he justifies the aggressions of Italy, of Russia and of France as a necessity of civilisation, and yet we find him writing these words in its earlier part —

The fear of losing the booty, or of seeing it snatched away by another, is at the root of all the diplomatic scheming of our several Calixtus. The ostensible purpose to be the standard bearers of Western culture, the propagators of modern civilisation and humanisation, is either an empty shibboleth or else a matter of quite secondary importance. The chief object is, and remains the acquisition of colonies, the extension of territory, the founding of new markets for home industry and commerce, and by the subjugation of foreign nations, to exalt and to increase the power and importance of the mother country.

It would be a profitable exercise in the art of logical reasoning and consistency to compare this passage, especially the lines we have italicised, with another paragraph in which all such wars of conquest undertaken with the purpose of gold and glory are justified because "they herald improvement." But the climax is reached when we are assured that "acting upon this principle, our rulers have for more than a century been forcing their way into Islam, gradually depriving the followers of the Prophet of their political independence." The italics are ours.

Let us, however, define the central thesis at which Professor Vambéry has wrought with such plenitude of logic and powers of ratiocination. The Mussalmans, he says, are everywhere losing their political independence as a result of their intellectual and moral stagnation. They cannot, however, be reconciled to this loss, and the introduction of law, order and civilisation does not appeal to them on account of their religious pride and fanaticism. They are smarting with a sense of humiliation and are casting about for means to retrieve their position. The chances of success for a combined political movement on pan-Islamic lines are remote, even if such a movement could be possible, for the simple reason that the Mussalmans have not the necessary intellectual equipment and political cohesion for a task of such magnitude. Still, however, their "nervous irritability" and resentment at things as they are constitute a danger not to be ignored. Quite recently the Professor has detected new tendencies moving the Moslem world in the direction of Moslem-Buddhist coalition. He regards this as a striking phenomenon, for in his opinion there was no love lost between the followers of the two great faiths of Asia. He indulges in bad history and worse knowledge of Islam to prove that the Mussalmans always despised the Buddhists. It is only their common hatred of Europe that has drawn them now together to scheme the overthrow of foreign dominance. "How far all this intriguing is a matter for serious alarm we need not here enquire." It is enough for the great "student" of Eastern affairs to warn the cabinets of Europe and direct their attention to this new and portentous constellation in the political firmament of the East.

In the whole history of sensational journalism it would be difficult to find a more perfect mare's nest than this, so laboriously discovered by a man aping the tone and manner of a political prophet. The whole tissue would be amusing did we not know that European public opinion is usually fed on this sorry stuff. Let us therefore examine the facts on which Professor Vambéry has based his tremendous conclusions. Shorn of unnecessary verbiage and leaving aside his references to his own familiarity with the world of Islam and his intimate knowledge of the ways of Yildiz during the Hamidian régime, the whole article, consisting of eight closely printed pages of the Nineteenth Century and After, yields as residue two facts that have led to the discovery of a world-shaking movement. One of these facts is that "a Turkish newspaper, published at Ili and subsidised by the (Chinese) Government, invites the Muhammadans to make common cause with the Chinese..." The other is that the Mussalmans worked whole-heartedly with the Republican leaders for the overthrow of the Manchus. There are philosophers who can trace out of a cock fight the existence of God and the latest theory of Creation. There are said to have existed jugglers in this country who could transform a monkey into an umbrella and an umbrella into a goat. In the face of such intellectual and supernatural feats it is not impossible for Professors Vambéry to evolve out of these two facts a "Moslem-Buddhist Peril" just when other "Perils" were beginning to lose some of their nerve-shattering horror in a state of single blessedness. But even Professor Vambéry, who has such mysterious scent for "facts," has missed the greatest fact of all. He somewhere deploras the rapid evolution of Asia and Europe as terms hostile in meaning. But he and those who think like him are the real authors of this antagonism. In all their breakneck and slipshod generalisations about future developments in Asia underlies the tacit assumption that the progress of the Eastern races is a menace to Europe. No Eastern people should be allowed to advance beyond the stage of political dependence, or else there would be an end to European supremacy. All signs of moral and material progress in Asia, the growth of knowledge, patriotism and civic sense constitute a "Peril" that should be suppressed at its birth.

The Chinese Moslems showed a truly patriotic spirit by actively co-operating with their Buddhist fellow countrymen with a view to establish a régime of law, liberty and equality. This was a beautiful example of the territorial patriotism which the Mussalmans are said to lack by some of their critics. Would Professor Vambéry like to have seen them withholding their help from a cause on the success of which depended their own advancement and wellbeing? To have remained passive and sullen and irresponsive while the whole Empire was stirring with the pulsations of a new life would have been the height of imbecility and cowardice. Yet Professor Vambéry and his tribe never fail to discover in liberal, progressive and essentially peaceful movements dangers of incalculable magnitude to Europe. If Europe cannot see without nervous shocks the growth of knowledge and of love for political freedom amongst the nations of the East, if it regards all that as dangerous to its political domination and, therefore, to all the vital interests and concerns of humanity, then the days of that domination are numbered. A fear-ridden and conscience-stricken Europe can not long continue to be the dictator of the world's destinies, the soothsaying prophets of the Vambéry variety notwithstanding. As for the Moslem-Buddhist rapprochement, we are glad a spirit of mutual trust, goodwill and harmony inspires the followers of the two great Eastern faiths in China. What is more, we would like to see this spirit grow in strength and create an indissoluble bond of union amongst the people for the good of their motherland. Their example should be the inspiration of all Eastern races in their efforts at self preservation.

Education in the Panjab.

AFTER all, the only sure and safe method of measuring the intellectual, moral and material progress of a country is to be found in the study of the statistics relating to the organised activities of its people. A prejudice against "mere figures" no doubt exists, more particularly amongst those delightful souls who see the world through the purple mists of emotion. Their proper medium is feeling. But for the purposes of the legislator and the practical reformer, moving along the lines of least resistance from precedent to precedent and compromise to compromise, statistics are the only reliable guide. No doubt they easily lend themselves to manipulation. It has, however, yet to be proved that logic and common-sense have failed to detect mischievous manipulation, and in any case the argument hardly suffices to discredit an instrument which is admittedly of ever-growing value in the development of knowledge and thought.

The Indian Census returns of last year have not yet appeared in their final tabulated form. When completed they will prove a mine of useful information and indicate the lines along which practical efforts for the many-sided advancement of the people should be made. Provincial figures relating to various heads have been appearing from time to time, and the recent publication of the Panjab census returns relating to education should prove very instructive reading. The figures have been compiled according to religion, sex, district and principal cities. In order to accurately estimate their bearing on the educational state of the Province, it is necessary to bear in mind the relative strength of the main religious communities comprising the population. According to the last Census the Panjab has a total population of 24,187,750 out of which 12,275,477 are Mussalmans, 8,773,621 Hindus and 2,883,729 Sikhs, i.e., the Mussalmans constitute more than 50 per cent. of the entire population, while the proportion of the Hindus and the Sikhs is about 36 per cent. and 12 per cent. respectively. Now, taking the education figures for the whole Province we find that only 3.7 per cent. of the total population is literate, while the proportion of those who know English works out to only .4 per cent. These figures disclose an amount of illiteracy in the Province which ought to give food for thought to the uncompromising critics of Mr. Gokhale's late lamented Bill as well as their official henchmen. The Panjab has been occasionally held up to the gaze of an admiring world as an example of official energy and enterprise. We yield to none in our admiration of its magnificent canal systems and the irrigation facilities for the provision of which the Provincial Administration has steadfastly worked. It seems, however, that the Administration is not fully alive to its responsibilities in regard to the intellectual and moral needs of the people. Sir Louis Dane has been heard to deplore the growth of crime and drink in the Panjab and has earnestly exhorted the leaders to help him in combating these evils. We doubt, however, if any such co-operation can be of much practical use as long as the mass of the people are steeped in ignorance. The Department of Public Instruction in the Province has moved little in the matter beyond suggesting an increase of fees in the Secondary Department! Lack of funds need not be erected into an eternal excuse for official inaction. Once there is a will, a way will be found to cope with the enormous mass of ignorance by effecting provincial economies in other directions. And no one can seriously maintain that our Provincial Administrations are the cheapest and the most economical that the wit of bureaucracy could devise.

But even more serious is the share of responsibility that should attach to the people themselves. It is hard to reconcile this mass of illiteracy with the heat and bustle of the provincial life as far, at any rate, as it has manifested itself in the field of journalism. With a people 99.6 per cent of whom have not even the rudiment of modern education, all discussions about their political development in the direction of self-government have a merely academic interest and no more. Racial and religious rivalries seem to have greater fascination for our public men in the Panjab than the actual condition of the mass of the people. A zealous organ of pan-Hinduism in the Province dwelt with considerable satisfaction the other day on the existence of keen communal rivalries, for they would lead to progress by competition. True, but our contemporary had in this case mistaken the means for the end. Surely, a hot-blooded argument about "separate electorates" and "official loaves and fishes" conducted on the most approved lines of self-centred communal patriotism can hardly furnish the true basis for that competition which leads to progress. Some of the partizan papers, that are enamoured of this kind of "competition" and sing its praises with full-throated ease, have ceased to discharge their primary function of educating and guiding public opinion by impartial criticism, by judicious comment and by frank exposure of evils. They have, instead, developed an art of apologetics which is mainly concerned with defending the particular class or interest they happen to represent. Controversies about Urdu and Hindi as mediums of instruction, the proportion of Hindu-Moslem teachers in the schools, the "Jhatka" question in boarding houses crop up from time to time with unmitigated virulence, meanwhile the masses continue, as of yore, to grow up, live and die amidst dingy horizons, never knowing a wider outlook, without feeling the pulse of an ampler life, bounded within the shell of custom and shut out from the broad light of heaven. The provincial Press in this country has not evolved provincial patriotism and, as a consequence, it has failed to become an effective lever in the uplifting of the people.

Turning now from the general state of literacy in the whole Province to the position of individual communities in the educational scale, we have some very startling figures to quote. We have already stated that 3.7 per cent. of the entire people are literate of whom only .4 per cent know English. The Mussulmans, who form more than half the population of the Province, have only .5 per cent. of their numbers who can be said to be literate, while the proportion of English-knowing among them is .1 per cent. The percentage of general literacy amongst the Hindus is .55 and of those knowing English is .5. The Sikhs have .58 per cent. of their community who are literate and .3 per cent. knowing English. It will be readily seen from these figures that educationally the Mussalman are the most backward community in the Province. In general literacy the Mussulmans stand to the Hindus and the Sikhs in the approximate proportion of 1:4. In modern education their ratio is 1:5 when compared to the Hindus; and 1:3 in comparison with the Sikhs. These figures are eloquent in themselves. The Moslem community in the Panjab has only one-fourth the strength of the Hindus and the Sikhs in point of education. No further comment is needed to press the matter home to those who profess to be its secular guides. This vast gulf of difference in the relative position of the Mussalman in provincial education will, we hope, engage their most earnest and undivided attention. It is impossible to overrate the significance of the figures as they stand. They disclose an ugly fact, a fact that is disappointing to a degree and which the Mussalman for the sake of their most vital interests, have got to face manfully and squarely. The Panjab Moslems have hitherto been supposed to be the most progressive section of the Moslem community in India, and if, with their much-vaunted progress, they are, in fact, hopelessly behind the Hindus and the Sikhs and even fall far below the average educational level of the Province, there can be very little hope for the future of this whole community.

There are some general causes that are, among others, responsible for this sad state of things. In the first place, the rural population of the Province is for the most part Moslem, and modern education has for manifest reasons made very little progress in rural areas. If we take the statistics relating to urban population the Moslem percentage is not proportionately so meagre.

Again, the poverty of the community, the agricultural occupation of the Moslem masses and general racial prejudices have also been operative as deterrent causes. There are still hundreds of villages in the Panjab, inhabited entirely or almost entirely by the Mussalman, where exist no schools for primary education, and the parents cannot afford to send their children to a distant village school, chiefly because they need their help in agricultural operations. A school in their own village, equipped for imparting elementary instruction with reference to the agricultural needs of the locality, will attract large and steady attendance of the village boys without interfering with their seasonal work in the fields. The establishment of rural schools ought to be the immediate concern of the Panjab Government. But the greatest responsibility lies on the shoulders of the Moslem leaders. It is their duty to organise a systematic campaign against the evil of ignorance that afflicts the mass of their community.

We hope, after the ugly revelations furnished by the educational figures, the Moslem leaders in the Panjab will see the futility of inordinate zeal they so readily expend in barren controversies and devise really useful and practical measures for the education of their community. The Hindus have already organised a Primary Education League in Lahore which has raised large funds, has started work in the city and is spreading a network of similar organisations all over the Province. If a few Mussalman were to take up the work in earnest and devote their energy to achieving solid results rather than to advertising it abroad, the problem would be solved in a few years. In the life-struggle that lies before their community social efficiency alone will count. And it would be a mere platitude—though platitudes some times need repetition—to say that efficiency of every kind depends upon the training of intelligence. The Hindu leaders are making laudable efforts to take up the education of the Hindu masses in their own hands. But the Mussalman are still juggling with figures. The Hon Mr Shafi had tried to show in the last session of the All-India Moslem League that the Moslem percentage in primary schools was proportionately higher. Is it not a little astonishing to think that such an argument could be used against the introduction of compulsory primary education, when there is an appalling mass of illiteracy darkening the face of the land? It would, however, be a profitable exercise for him to compare his figures with the Census returns for education in the Panjab and with the help of this edifying material re-assert his philosophy of optimism. As long as there is a single illiterate Moslem boy in Lahore or elsewhere, whose illiteracy is due to a want of opportunities, no responsible Moslem leader can enjoy an easy conscience. If he feels the burden too great for him let him quietly make room for others. Workers with real strength of purpose, cool judgment and hearts of flame are needed to undertake the task. Is there none amongst the many gifted Moslems of the Panjab to play pilot and lead the way?

Love's Sadness.

THERE is in love a gentle sadness
Which only lovers know,
A sorrow much akin to gladness
In its supernal glow.

True love is truly complemental
Completing soul to soul,
And so the sepal and the petal
Of flowers make the whole.
But still in giving all it giveth
The heart is not content,
For love's a trade that ever thriveth
On lavish gifts intent.

Beside the meed of love it needeth,
Its own great gifts untold
The heart that loveth no more heedeth
Than dross to purest gold.

It giveth all its wealth of feeling,
All that it has and more,
Never stinting, naught concealing,
Yet oweth as before.

Thereof is born a gentle sadness
Not deepened into pain,
A sorrow much akin to gladness
Like sunshine blurred with rain.

Essays : Indian and Islamic.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—Mr. Gholam Waris refutes Khwaja Gholam-us-Saqilain's remarks on the Essays on the ground that it is an historical work and not a religious tract. But it is not easy to understand how the religious aspect can be ignored when the work is claimed to be the history of a religion. In fact, Mr. Gholam Waris disclaims for the author what he himself expressly claims because, while the former asserts that "it is not the province of history to enter the psychological regions and show how Muhammad was inspired," Mr. S. Khoda Bukhsh has actually dealt with the inspiration. In the issue of the Comrade of 27th April he negatively defined it as a means of revelation which was not a "conduit pipe." He also strongly professes his belief in the inspiration and gives his own view of it. In the Essays themselves he refers to "the sources from which the Prophet of Arabia received his inspirations."

I trust it will be admitted on all hands that when a historian mistakes facts, his readers have every justification to disagree with him and he should take such criticism in good grace. It is certainly not only a misstatement but a calumny to attribute to our Prophet an extensive vocabulary of vituperation. Every Mussalman has a right to resent such an injury to his religious susceptibilities. Even the worst enemies of our Prophet like Spahnemius and Sale, who have gone to the length of accusing him of criminality and of imposing a false religion on mankind, have felt themselves compelled to admit the Prophet's "courtesy to everyone" and "agreeable behaviour" from which even his bloodthirsty enemies were not excluded. Besides his own inborn courtesy and politeness of no ordinary kind, his God taught him قَوْلُوا لِلنَّاسِ حَسَنًا It is difficult to overlook the sarcastic manner in which Mr. S. Khoda Bukhsh has dealt with the Prophet in spite of his claim to be a Mussalman and his admirer. He evidently did not realise how sorely he would wound the feelings of those who sincerely honour the Prophet as the only next to their Creator.

Mr. S. Khoda Bukhsh is perfectly entitled not to be sparing in imparting to the world the result of his reflections and judgment, but the Mussalman world sees nothing new in his vituperative language to the Prophet or his revered grandson, nor in the information that Islam was "fashioned" by the Prophet with Christianity and Judaism as his sources. I may be pardoned for my candour in pointing out that the Kufra imputed the same charge to him thirteen centuries ago which occasions the refutation from

Allah اَمْ يَقُولُونَ افَتَرَّمَهُ (Do they say the Prophet shaped out the Koran)? and Allah Himself furnished the reply to him, and thus

قُلْ اِنَّا نَقْرُبُكُمْ نَلَّا تَمْلِكُونَ لِي مِنَ اللَّهِ عَيْتًا مَّا عَلِمَ مَّا تَبْهَتُونَ

نَبِيَّهُ كَفَى بِهِ شَهِيدًا بَيْنِي وَبَيْنَكُمْ ط

Divine vindication will stand good against such imputations till the world endures. The information will be no news to agnostic Europe either. It is the Araya Samaj alone who will hail Mr. S. Khoda Bukhsh as a fresh weapon in the warfare they are carrying on against Islam and the Prophet and will claim him as a learned Mussalman authority.

As the learned author holds that the Prophet's "knowledge of Jewish and Christian books, at times faulty and imperfect to a degree, was derived almost exclusively from oral communications," he cannot get away from the sequence which must naturally follow that the Koran is faulty and imperfect to the same extent. Though probably the author means the inference, I dare say Mr. Gholam Waris is not likely to be prepared to go so far with his friend.

It is not a lack of the knowledge of the art of criticism which gave rise to an effusion of religious fervour in Khwaja Gholam-us-Saqilain, which must be shared by all Mussalmans who have true love for Islam and its Prophet. In his sermon on this point, Mr. Gholam Waris has not shown himself less amenable to the fault he imputes to educated Indians, though he has less excuse for harshness in defending his temporal friend who can very well take care of himself. Yet Khawja Saheb has not said anything harsher than the fitness for "gladiatorial combat" and the advantage of an Ulema attributed to him in his remarks against blasphemous language.

ABDUR RAHEEM.

Moslem Education in Bengal.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "COMRADE."

SIR,—I do not know how to express our deep thanks to you for raising your voice against the modern educational system in Bengal which has long been engraving Hindu ideas, traditions and imagery on the minds of Muhammadan students in their school days. The slow, unconscious process of denationalization has long been going on amongst the Bengal Moslems and it is mainly responsible for the sluggish rate in the progress of English education in Muhammadan Bengal. On passing the threshold of any Muhammadan family in Bengal you would at once catch the note of murmur, sometimes not without reason, against modern education to the effect that the people of western light and culture are fast deviating from the path of Islam. The truth is that a Muhammadan student in Mufassil schools, often a solitary figure in the whole class of Hindu students, living in unsympathetic surroundings and not unoften compelled to take Sanskrit as his Second Language, has not the least opportunity of knowing Islam. He remains blind, through no fault of his own, to Islamic culture and traditions. He knows all about Ram and Krishna, but when you ask him about the Prophet, his birth and parentage, he is found to know nothing. That the modern system of education in Bengal is essentially Hinduistic there is not the slightest doubt. If this process of denationalization is allowed to continue for some time, there is no doubt that there would grow up in Muhammadan Bengal a set of people of hybrid culture and doubtful education, and no one having the least foresight would fail to see how far they would retard the progress of the community. Rightly, therefore, you have raised your voice and said,— "What the Mussalmans of Eastern Bengal require is that where they preponderate school books should not be written in a manner forcing such inspiration, such imagery, and such a vocabulary on them to the neglect of the essentially Moslem inspiration, Persian and Arabic imagery, and the vocabulary that is derived from these sources." But may I say that the demand is equally pressing in all parts of the Presidency? The Muhammadaus of West Bengal—a people who have suffered the most—want the panacea more than the rest. I may here point out in this connection that in the Presidency Division (excluding Calcutta), the Muhammadaus form the major part of the total population, and in one of the districts, Nadia, they form 62 per cent. of the total number of people.

I, therefore, hope that you would voice still more emphatically the view on behalf also of the people of West Bengal—as the remedy is much more urgently needed in their case—and thus put them under a deep debt of gratitude and obligation.

Principles of Biography.

ISLAMIC.

AS SOON as the Arabs had won their Empire and settled down they turned to letters. Of all the studies to which they applied themselves none seems to have had a greater fascination for them than that of Biography. It has been suggested by an eminent authority that the study of Biography received an impetus from the condition of the times. That great and far-sighted statesman—the Caliph Omar—whose personality stands out above all like a peak among low ridges—had organised a system of State pensions for men who had fought and bled for Islam—for them indeed and to their descendants according to their deserts. This necessarily led to a careful enquiry into the history and antecedents of the claimants. It is a very plausible suggestion, and possibly there is a great deal of truth in it. But there was another reason more potent still. A large mass of traditions—affecting every conceivable condition of human life—was set in circulation. These had to be examined, tested, verified. There were traditions at variance with each other. There were traditions which defied every possibility of reconciliation. There were traditions supporting conflicting claims. Upon the thinking Arabs the necessity of arriving at some rule for testing the truth or otherwise of hopelessly irreconcilable traditions called for immediate action. The solution of this problem is most interesting. They had not yet reached a high degree of mental training, and accordingly we have no right to expect from them a very lofty order of scientific criticism. The way they settled the difficulty was by instituting a searching enquiry into the character, integrity and antecedents of each individual traditionist. In other words they began, in right earnest, to study the life of each traditionist. Thus arose a large number of biographies individual and collective. By individual, we mean biography of an individual person, by collective—a series of lives within the confines of a single literary scheme.

Was there any principle which our Islamic authors recognised? Any standard to which they strove to attain? Any pattern which they put before them to follow and to imitate?

It would be absurd to suggest that literature has ever been ordered to sample. Literature is, indeed, the expression of a nation's character—the manifestation of its intellectual culture. It is a part of the national life—real, integral, unseverable. It is as much subject to the limitations of time and geography as religion is. Nobody, therefore, can urge that any literature has sprung up in conformity with pre-ordained rules. Rules follow and do not precede—they are mere generalisations from existing conditions. What I seek to find and to consider is merely this: Were there any general principles underlying Islamic biographies?

The first thing that strikes us is—that whatever may be the indebtedness of Islamic learning to foreign literature, it is clear and beyond dispute that their biographical literature was purely original and essentially indigenous. No clearer proof of this is needed than the workmanship of the Islamic biographies itself. There was no want of a model, but the attention of our authors was never drawn to Plutarch, who "introduced the biography of disciplined purpose to the modern world, with lasting benefit to life and literature." Personality was Plutarch's quarry. He preferred to concentrate his attention upon what to the unseeing eye looked insignificant—upon "a light occasion, a word or some sport." "Therein," he adds, "men's nature, dispositions and manners appear more plainly than the famous battles won, wherein are slain 10,000." He was a just biographer who was not distracted from his proper aim by ethical fervour or by panisanship. Nor were the purposes of history or science within his scope. (Sir Sidney Lee, Principles of Biography, pp. 34, 35.)

Islamic biographies appear to me to be divisible into three main groups: (1) those that were written with the express purpose of laudation, (2) those that were written with the deliberate object of censure, (3) those that aim at ascertaining the truth about the individual. The first two need not detain us at all. They must be summarily dismissed as, from the nature of things, they do not and cannot give us a correct and faithful picture—so essential for a true biography. They are either triumphal peans or hideous scandals. Let us, then, take those that honestly seek to describe to paint their heroes. These fall far short of our expectations, and for two reasons. In those days the materials upon which the biographer worked were necessarily sparse and scanty. There were rarely, if ever, private letters, private diaries, estimates of friends and criticisms of foes—long departed from the scenes of earthly strife—to enable the writer to draw the real man as he was in flesh and blood. All that he got was a stray reference, a passing notice, a fragmentary sketch. If by some felicitous concurrence of circumstances a more detailed account was to be found, it was invariably a detailed account of the man's achievements rather than of the man himself. In Oriental biographies the hero is never without his State robes; without his staff of office, without some symbol or emblem of power.

Want of materials, then, is one, and the Oriental idea of gravity another reason, for the absence of a complete biography. To the Oriental it would be offensive in the extreme to describe the lighter side of a great career. Just as his life is a solemn ceremonial so is his biography a brilliant disguise. Rarely, if ever, do we there come across the ordinary incidents of mortality which compose, nay, sanctify life—our laughter and tears; our worries and woes, our irrepressible joys and sweet regrets. It is only the public life that we get, never the private. It is a catalogue of virtues: failings, imperfections, infirmities, frailties—these, indeed, find no place there.

Take, for instance, the life of Saladin written by Bahauddin. It comprises over 300 pages. It gives us a detailed account of his wars and campaigns; his public, official life; but it is provokingly silent as to the inner life of the great warrior of Islam. It does not lift the curtain and show the hero to us as he showed himself to his associates, friends, confidants. We do not see Saladin face to face with a terrible catastrophe. We do not see him wrestling with the terrible problems of life and death—a problem which all mortals must solve—and solve for themselves. We do not see him in the midst of sorrow or in the freedom of the festive board. We obtain only one side of his life. We only see him decked in his royal robes; ruling, commanding, issuing firmans. It is on this account that I have described Oriental biographies as incomplete and fragmentary. There are exceptions to this rule, but exceptions only prove the rule. They never aim at completeness. There is one other feature which, in this connexion, might be noted here. In their zeal to present their heroes in the most favourable light, they garble facts and not infrequently suppress or sacrifice truth. Are not modern biographies indictable on this score as well? They are, therefore, incomplete pictures, but even so far as they go they are not always reliable. Reliable in this sense, that they do not take the slightest trouble to test or verify the statements which they make. They are never watchful of the lies and fables of hearsay accretions. At times they give us various conflicting statements and leave the reader to pick and choose. They never so much as even attempt to weigh evidence, to decide for themselves. As for a critical treatment of the man and his age, of the influences working upon and around him, of the age in which he lived and the people among whom he moved—these never seem to have attracted the attention or excited the curiosity of our writers. To them man was a distinct entity, detached from his surroundings. And even this human being was important for their purposes only so far as he was a man of action or a man of thought. Further and beyond they do not seem to have troubled themselves.

But their failure in one direction has been more than compensated by their brilliant success in the other—I mean in collective biography. On a smaller canvas they are at their best. Who can excel them in brevity and conciseness—to mention two only—Ibn Sad and Ibn Khallikan. They are perfect models of what national biography should be. All that is worth knowing is brought within a short compass with admirable skill and judgment. There is no fault of omission or commission. Every fact, necessary to the understanding of the individual, is brought out with scrupulous care and artistic circumspection. Biographies of men, distinguished in every branch of arts and sciences, have been written, and always written well.

The Arabs were a remarkable people for industry, for research, for long, patient, unwearied labour. If they cannot compete with the Persians in acuteness of intellect and clearness of vision; in insight, penetration and judgment—in industry they stand head and shoulders above them. Almost all historians and biographers are Arabs—almost all philosophers, Persians. Here are the two types of intellect in Islam—one analytical, the other synthetic.

S KHUDDA BUKHSH

Anecdote.

WHEN Canon Rawnsley was collecting information in the Lake District about Wordsworth, he came upon an old man who had been a servant at Rydal Mount. This whilom retainer told many interesting stories.

Wordsworth, it seemed, was very absent minded. He once forgot the dinner hour.

"I'd goa," the old man remarked, "to study door and hear him a-mumblin' away to 's-self."

"Dinner's ready, sir," I'd ca' out, but he'd goa mumbling on like a deaf man, ya see. And sometimes Mrs. Wordsworth 'ud say 'Goa and brek a bottle, or let a dish fall, just outside door in passage. Eh, dear, that mustly wad bring him out wad that. It was nobbut that as wad, howivver. For, ye kna, he was a very careful man, and he couldn't do with brekking t' china."

HAMIEI FITZSHAKESPEARE, the author, producer, and principal actor in the thrilling drama, "When Fierce Assassins Sniffed His Gold or, The Vengeance of the Plumber," met a friend in the Strand the other evening.

"Halloa Fitz!" exclaimed the latter. "I hear that you sacked the whole of your orchestra last night."

"Yes, silly asses!" declaimed the great tragedian. "They went and spoiled the best scene in the whole play."

"Goodness me! Whatever for?"

"Well, I told the leader to pick out appropriate music for each scene, and you know the thrilling passage where the judge condemns me to death?"

"Yes, yes!"

"When the judge put on the black cap, the pack of idiots at once struck up, 'Where Did You Get that Hat?'"

The Assessor.

THE Assessor is a bureaucratic device to at once satisfy and adequately punish native craze for distinctions. He is a bare-faced attempt on the part of the government to exploit native stupidity and leisure for the amusement of its over-worked judges and the mirth and diversion of the busy lawyers. He illustrates the utility of perennial irrelevance and the innocence of judicial flirtation with uninformed opinion. He has the gift of perpetual babyhood. He carries a whole houseful of negations with the humility of a Pope. He is a spurious coin which loudly proclaims the folly of all imitations. He is a mukhtar's argument which convinces nobody but amuses all. He has the confounding elasticity of the Congressman's political doctrines but none of the unbending rigidity of an unconvertible Moslem promise (vide the accounts of the Moslem University published or going to be published in the Institute Gazette at some unknown date in the unknown future). He has the furtive coyness of an Indian undergrad engaged in his first experiment of beard farming. He is the promise of a grander realization than the ungazetted and officially unrecognized Lalaship of his juvenile dreams. He is the prophecy of a titled future—rich with accumulated corpulence, but richer with magisterial nods and collectorite smiles, the friendship of the head khanasama and the respect of the red-turbaned chaprasis, the testimonials of indifferent character and official acknowledgments of ill-rendered services.

The Assessor is a man of 45—including his first fifteen years of dhoti-less poverty and unangochad (انگوچاد) constitution, when he used to either address the unconvincing but encyclopaedic virtues of his kach-alus (کچ آلو) to indifferent and sceptical passengers at the railway station or proclaim his marvellous recipe for the preparation of Adam-tempting sweets to a dazed and astonished world of mouth-watering street-boys. He does not believe in that human hypocrisy which hides human nudity under an artificial covering of clothes and, as a concession to a convention ridden world, only tolerates the pre-historic dhoti as the only forgivable violation of human sanctity.

He loves his principles dearly enough, but he does not carry them about to enhance the unwieldiness of his bulky person. He has a turban of none of the known colours to decorate his head with an appreciation of its marvellous fortitude under the fortnightly operations of the itinerant barber's unrelenting razor. To him the turban is not purely ornamental but has an unsuspected fund of vast usefulness behind it. It flatters the Sahib, both real and make-believe, into a temporary recognition of his claims to existence, in spite of his colour, and an acknowledgment of his ground kissing salaams. His quilted trousers—defied by an irrepressible dhoti insistent on the recognition of its ineffectually-voiled existence—inherited along with a weakness for khatas from a paternal uncle—complete the irresistible equipment with which he starts to conquer the judge of an alien race, to inspire awe in the minds of the criminals hauled up before him and compel the unwilling respect of the counsels defending them.

His religion is a pure unitarianism, a belief in the unity of coins and the immortality of the Promissory Notes. His cosmopolitanism is of that superior kind which loves and respects, with equal warmth and admiration, the Russian rouble and the English shilling without despising the unpretentious native coori.

He is a Banya by caste—a fact to which he has now got reconciled, though there are still moments when he feels strongly tempted to kick up a row with the Creator for making a wholly gratuitous selection of family and parentage for him without consulting his personal wishes in the matter. The public has dubbed him a Lala—not so much from an appreciation of his noble origin as from a deep-rooted conviction that it may be good logic, but it is both indifferent wisdom and bad manners to call a spade a spade. On the other hand he claims this recognition as the first instalment of a series of surrenders to his career of irresistible triumphs.

He redeems, be it said to his credit, the chronic illiteracy of his family. He knows Hindi and has often recited Ramayana to an admiring circle of friends and relatives with a brutal unmusicahy. His genius, which can accomplish such mighty feats as the deciphering of an illegibly written letter from distant Bombay or the reading of the famous Bura Masa without a pair of spectacles on, is a puzzle to his mother. He is the proud boast of his wife who constantly thrusts his learning on the unwilling ears of her less fortunate sisters of the mohalla, secretly enjoying the result of her operation.

His son of the scantily-buttoned coat, richly oiled shoes, and ink-spotted dhoti, is the pride of the father and the living hope of the family. His success at the Entrance Examination, unless precluded by the caprice of the Board of Examiners or untimely illness brought on by ill-cooked rice and indigestible mask, will, it is devoutly hoped, be the occasion of the emergence of the family from comparative obscurity into a position in which the proud father would give wide berth to insolent constables, shake hands with a tahsildar without visible trepidation and call on the Diptee Sahib without being insulted by the untipped chaprasi. He confidently believes that his Matriculated son—a spectacled intellectual prodigy who would challenge the great Unapproachable in his own language—will be the object of extravagant bids both from the Government and the public, and he has already decided, in defiance of the protests and expostulations of his wife, that he shall go to the former. (The present writer humbly suggests that local Governments should be warned against participation in the on-coming scramble.)

The Assessor, seated behind the Sessions Judge, is the despair of the criminal in the dock and the envy of the open-mouthed spectators. He is surveying the ceilings with an interest suggestive of a bold determination to either revolutionize the modern architecture or remodel the universe with due regard to the superior claims of his caste-fellows. Sometimes the unsuspecting and irresponsible object of his merciless scrutiny is the chair which he occupies. He evidently wonders at the powers of endurance possessed by an ostensibly wooden thing which would support his enormous person without audible groans. Maybe he is only comparing the respective merits of glass and chair as articles of trade and wondering what a bewildering sensation it would make in his mohalla if all the chairs could be translated to his house.

To an Assessor nothing is more soporific than the arguments of a counsel at the close of his case, and no awakening is ruder than the one caused by the Judge's call on his inexhaustible stock of ready opinions. His response is a wealth of refreshing irrelevance poured upon the Judge with an unstinted liberality, in heroic disregard of the Judge's smiles, the counsel's frowns and the prisoner's half-audible imprecations. Accused of dacoity, the prisoner is pronounced to have committed murder in cold blood, and this in spite of the complainant reminding him that he is still alive and was never within his memory dead even for half an hour, and the Judge, otherwise sceptical of his veracity, endorsing the truth of both statements.

The Assessor is a piteous spectacle before a Civilian Judge with a reputation for ungovernable temper and an unsurpassed record of vigorous kicks administered freely during an indifferent official career. He is all nervousness and trepidation—an apology for his unhallowed existence, a penitent confession of his inextinguishable sins of colour and unavoidable omissions of birth and domicile. He thinks it none of his business to know Law and does not want to add to the cares of a prosperous trade, a prolific family and a protruding belly, the correction of an erring Legislature and the enlightenment of a benighted Judiciary. He needs not worry himself about Law, for there is the Thanedar, jealous of his privilege of law-breaking to guard his close preserves against the encroachment of outsiders. And so long as there is the D. S. P. of papal infallibility—an infallibility relieved by periodical fits of Diptee-cidal mania—to sanctify the Police chahans and the Civilian Judge to keep their sanctity inviolate against the profane attacks of defending counsel, dozing is perhaps the only legitimate form of criticism on the merits of the trial open to an honest and conscientious Assessor.

The Future of Crete.

THAT so much in the Near East should turn on the event of the two general elections in Greece and Turkey is a welcome evidence that force, even in that troubled corner of the world, is not the sole arbiter of national destinies. The Ottoman Parliament has yet to be chosen, and until it has met, no prudent prophet will forecast the immediate future of Turkey or the issue of the Italian War. Should the Young Turks by methods, however irregular succeed in recovering the position which had been shaken before the dissolution, the Empire will have a Government strong enough to adopt a firm policy in face of the two contrary risks of unpopularity at home and complications abroad. Should they emerge seriously weakened from the contest, they may dread any course which would expose them to the censure of the extrenier patriots. Should they be defeated, the Constitution itself might be endangered. Whatever their errors in the past—and their errors have been so grave as to prejudice the whole future of the splendid experiment which they inaugurated—a spectator who thinks mainly of the peace of the East must wish for them at this moment an unequivocal majority. A divided Chamber at Constantinople would be an encouragement to Italy to prolong the war, while at the same time it would fail to yield the necessary support to any Turkish Government which ventured to compromise with the enemy.

In some compromise the war must issue. We should hope ourselves that Italy might eventually be persuaded to accept a lease of the African provinces. But only if Turkey is strong enough to continue the war without the fear of internal dissension, will she be strong enough to secure a peace on terms more favourable than her adversary is at present inclined to accept. It is a nice question whether the acquisition of an elected Parliament has for the moment increased the ability of Turkey to resist such an assault as this from Italy. We inclined to think that the Hamidian régime would have made a much less stubborn and steady resistance, and would have failed to draw moral support from the patriotism of the people. But undoubtedly it could have yielded or bargained with less fear of offending its subjects. In any event, the transformation of the form of government has introduced a complication into the high politics and military problems of the East, which would have seemed incredible five short years ago.

In Greece the issue of the General Election has greatly enhanced the chances of peace. After a period of confusion and revolution the strong personality of M. Venizelos has brought a stability and a self-discipline to Greek politics unknown since the death of Tricoupis. At two successive elections the country has given him an overwhelming majority, and the way of escape seems to lie broad and clear from the old mazes of personal politics. His programme is one of systematic reconstruction, without a hint of the reaction and the forcible discipline which commonly attends such an effort undertaken after a time of anarchy and disorder. M. Venizelos brings to Greek affairs the hardness and realism of his Cretan temperament. He learned his politics among assemblies of armed men on hillsides swept by the guns of European navies and the Turk is an adversary whom he has met in the field. Taught in that school, he has imposed a pacific foreign policy on the orators of the Athenian cafés. A man of his stamp will repress wild adventures and hopeless escapades, but equally he will seize his chance, if the chance should come his way, to realise the secular dream of the union of Crete with Greece. There will be required of him, before the new Chamber is many weeks older, an act worthy of the legendary Roman father. The Cretans, resolved to treat their union as an accomplished fact, are sending a full complement of deputies to Athens, and if the first twenty-three should be intercepted by the forces of Europe, a second and a third contingent is ready to sail to replace them. It will be expected of M. Venizelos, Cretan of the Cretans and the leader in many an earlier struggle for unity, to spend the popularity which character and success have brought him, in picketing his Chamber with Greek troops to arrest these delegates. With what resource of Odysseus-like diplomacy he will extricate himself from the quandary we cannot divine. To exclude the Cretan deputies will seem an act of anti-patriotism. To admit them is, in all probability, to call the Turkish armies for a second time into the plains of Thessaly. It is the dilemma which the delays and half-measures of the Concert have all these years prepared.

A settlement in conformity with the aspirations of Crete would have been easy at any moment before the Turkish revolution. No mind can gainsay the natural right of the islanders to dispose of their own destinies. There is a struggle which has lasted, with brief intervals for recuperation, through a century and a half. They fought harder and longer than the people of the mainland in the War of Independence. Nor have increasing education and contact with Europe weakened in succeeding generations the passion of their resolve. It is mainly a splendid and generous sentiment which inspires them, but then demand has also its practical side. An island whose only trading centre is the Piræus, whose whole economic life flows in Greek ships between the ports which look northward and the centre of all Greek life, cannot develop its own resources in a natural way while it is tied in the trammels of an alien fiscal system. Worse even than the incubus on its trade is the continual disturbance and uncertainty in all its public life, caused by its anomalous position. It experiences the same inevitable and self-imposed repression as Ireland. So long as it is a sort of treasure to think of any national object save the one purpose of achieving union with Greece, it can have no leisure of mind for its own internal development. All the liberties which Europe permitted and secured, all the machinery of constitutional self-government, all the expensive and elaborate police, is wasted while this one obsession holds its mind. The Cretan Chamber is nothing and has never been anything save a national committee for bringing union about. It might, perhaps, have been otherwise had Prince George, whom Europe gave the Cretans as their first Governor, been a man formed for leadership and constructive work. The island was weary then of desolating struggles and the men who looked round on burned villages and ruined olive groves were ready to think stolidly about schools, and roads, and harbours, and agricultural experiments. Prince George's faults of temper and crudities of method ruined that momentary hope. His failure made only one argument the more for a final settlement and a clean solution. The island has known no rest since it rose against him, and it is resolved to take no rest until its natural destinies are completed.

It is intolerable that Europe should continue for a further term of years to play the policeman against a proper aspiration. It is defending no real interest. The Turks have nothing to lose save a memory of conquest if the Crescent flag should cease to fly on the single rock which gives it shelter. The luckless remnant of the Moslem population is in jeopardy only because the continual unrest of an unsolved problem exposes it to Christian hate. A wiser handling of its interests would long ago have assisted it to sell its lands on fair terms, instead of leaving it to be persecuted into exile and tricked of its due compensation. The one obstacle to a settlement is the proper reluctance of the Powers to inflict on Turkey the momentary humiliation inseparable from the loss of Crete. But when we reflect that one of the four Powers concerned is Russia, scheming to open the Dardanelles, and that another is Italy, the whole hypocrisy of this excuse becomes apparent. The loss must sooner or later be faced, and the least inopportune way to bring it about would be as part of a general settlement from which Turkey would reap compensating benefits. We have argued in these columns that the Italian war demands a settlement by a European Conference. In no other way can Turkey be protected from the alternatives of a slow robbery in Tripoli or a swift and shattering assault in European waters. Mediation by an interested and grasping Power like Russia is a remedy worse than the disease. The lines of a possible solution are, to our thinking, that in a general survey of the Eastern Question, Europe should secure for Turkey in Africa better terms than she can herself extort from Italy, and make of that boon the compensation for the loss of Crete—(The Nation.)

The Persian Crisis.

News of the Week.

REUTER wired from Teheran on the 9th instant:—The situation in Kerman is menacing. A large force of hostile tribesmen is expected to enter the town to-day. British subjects as a precaution intend to take shelter in the Consulate. The Persian Government is not inclined to regard the situation very seriously. Fighting between the rival sections of the Khasgals is reported from Fars. Telegraphic communication with India is almost entirely interrupted owing to brigands cutting the wires.

With reference to the report sent by Reuter from Persia of the unrest in Kerman, it appears that a local rebellion has commenced against the Persian Governor-General of that place. The rebels who appear to belong to the lower order of the people alleged that Persia was being partitioned between Great Britain and Russia and that they were acting so that it might not fall into the hands of the new masters of the country. The Persian Governor-General has decided to seek safety in flight and the local Parsee and Hindu traders with some friendly Khans have taken refuge in the British Consulate. No serious danger, however, is apprehended and now that the Governor-General has taken himself off, matters will probably quiet down.

Reuter wired from Teheran on the 12th May. The situation in Kerman recently reported as very threatening is improving. The Imperial Bank is being re-opened.

Salar-ed-Dauleh has requested the British Minister to induce the Government to send troops to fight him twelve miles outside Mamasan, otherwise he will not be responsible for the safety of the inhabitants of that town.

Reuter wires from Teheran.—It is understood that the Persian Government in virtue of the arrangement of 1857 for the delimitation of the Perso-Afghan frontier has applied for the good offices of Britain in connection with the Afghan irroads.

In the House of Commons Colonel Yate asked whether Great Britain's claim to construct the Trans-Persian Railway south of the Russian sphere had been put forward and the Persian Government informed of the claim.

Sir Edward Grey replied:—"When the question gets to a further stage then the Persian Government must be informed. The scheme is at present in a most inchoate stage. We shall have to bear in mind the question raised by Colonel Yate."

A new railway is being constructed from Karachi along the Mekran and Persian Coasts to Bushire, writes the Advocate of India's correspondent from Karachi. This is a step of the utmost importance to this port, he continues, and to merchants of India generally. The scheme should open up new markets of vast possibilities and the only reason so far why very little information leaked out to the general public is because the authorities concerned are extremely reticent over the matter. Work is being carried out under the supervision of Mr. Johns, C.I.E., Chief Engineer, Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway. At present he is engaged in surveying and preparing the estimates. Up to date, the site of the proposed railway has been surveyed from Karachi to Jask. The proposal is to carry the line from that port to Bandar Abbas and then northwards up to Kirman and southwest to Bushire on the coast at the head of the Persian Gulf. It is obvious the line has vast potentialities. From Bushire to Koweit is about 120 miles by the sea and when the Koweit-Basra and Baghdad line is completed, there will be an inexhaustible market for Indian commerce. At present goods have to be conveyed by the sea and by the caravan. Trade will be opened up which is very much hampered at present. The work of surveying the Karachi-Bushire line was commenced in the early part of 1911. This line will run from Karachi as a rule about fifteen miles from the coast to Malban Caruara, Pasni, Chhabar and Jask then to Bandar Abbas, Linga Kirman and down to Bushire.

(FROM THE "DAILY TELEGRAPH" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

St Petersburg, April 21.

Persian affairs are rapidly going from bad to worse. The Regent, disgusted with what is going on around him, and chafing at his own inability to restore even a semblance of order, is preparing to resign. Every effort is being made by Russia and England to induce him to stay on, because he is an enlightened man, conversant with European culture and politics, and qualified to engraft on the nation those Western institutions for which it is ripe.

If Nasr-el-Mulk goes, his successor would probably be the Sipahdar, who is incomparably worse equipped for the task and less trustworthy than he. The Regent now insists on making a trip to Europe for the sake of his health, and it is an invidious task to throw obstacles in his way. But it is felt that if he once departs he will not return to Persia.

Salar-ed-Dowleh's freak is causing extreme embarrassment to the two protecting Powers, and is protracting the hopeless welter. He has seized a Persian province, and insists upon governing it, in spite of the legally-constituted Government.

THE "DAILY CHRONICLE"

Since he returned to America Mr. Morgan Shuster, the ex-Treasurer-General of Persia, has finished his book about that country. He calls it "The Strangling of Persia," and in it he describes Persia as he came to know the land and the people. Naturally he has much to say about the influences which led to his leaving the land of Omar Khayyam. Mr. Shuster writes crisply, and he does not "hesitate to shoot."

Sir Edward Grey on Persia.

III

It is true that the Spring-Rice despatch, penned a short time before the receipt of these instructions, had dotted the "i's" and crossed the "t's" of the concise language used in the telegraphic despatch upon which Sir Edward Grey relies. But anyone who will take the trouble to compare the former despatch with the language used by Sir Edward Grey and Lord Morley in explaining the Convention to Parliament in February, 1908, can scarcely fail to come to the conclusion that Sir Cecil Spring-Rice was abundantly justified in doing this. Nor does Sir Edward Grey now blame him. He tells us that in substance—in general substance—the Spring-Rice despatch does not differ from the official interpretation "except in regard to one sentence at the end, which states that their object (the British and Russian Governments) in these friendly negotiations 'was not to allow one another to intervene.'" "I believe," he goes on to say, "that the British Minister in drawing that up did not intend it to bear the construction which has been put upon it. The construction which has been put upon it is that we undertook some obligation to guarantee in a way we had not done before the integrity and independence of Persia. That was not the construction which he had intended." I scarcely know by whom the words quoted by the Foreign Secretary have been construed in the terms which he cites. For nearly a hundred years Great Britain and Russia have exchanged assurances with one another and have given assurances to the Persian Government that they were resolved to respect the independence and integrity of Persia. The Anglo-Russian Convention confirmed these assurances, and was based, in the language used by M. Isvolsky and quoted by Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, on a guarantee of the independence and integrity of Persia. I have already given Sir Edward Grey's own words in explaining the Convention to Parliament: "Under the Agreement we bind ourselves not to seek certain concessions of a certain kind in certain spheres. But these are only British and Russian spheres in a sense which is in no way derogatory to the independence and sovereignty of Persia." What the Convention did, if we are to accept the British and Russian official explanations of its object, was to render easier than it had been before the task of both Powers in maintaining the integrity of the Persian frontiers and the sovereignty of the Persian Government. They were in future to act together at the Persian Court with this common object in view. Having entered into a mutual arrangement to pursue this common object, they would also be able to keep themselves and their subjects in check against any violations of the fundamental principle. That is the obvious meaning of the language used in the Spring-Rice despatch, and to that meaning both Governments are irrevocably committed by their own official or public declarations. As for the unofficial nature of the Spring-Rice despatch, this word must surely be used by Sir Edward Grey in a purely technical sense. It consists to a large extent of citations made from Sir Edward Grey's own words and of quotations from official declarations communicated by M. Isvolsky to our Government. The statement that it was not sent home because it did not seem sufficiently important can surely not be accepted as conclusive. I am anxious not to embitter the controversy in any way, and I, of course, accept without reserve Sir Edward Grey's statement that he himself had never seen it. I would only observe that it was well known to all those who had followed Persian affairs, and that it had been quoted over and over again in the Press of this country. It contains a concise and perfectly clear statement of the objects which the two Powers had in view when they concluded their Convention. It had been perused by Mr. Shuster before he accepted service in Persia. It would be dishonourable to repudiate it, even if it were possible. I have shown that it does not stand alone, and that we cannot repudiate it even if we might now feel inclined to do so.

It is for this reason that we are precluded from taking very seriously Sir Edward Grey's speech of February 21, last. Even the gods sometimes nod; and it may be unkind on the part of humbler mortals to do more than nudge their elbow and try to recall them to a sense of reality. If that speech stood alone, the Anglo-Russian Convention would constitute a standing menace to vital British interests in Asia. Turn, for instance, to the latter passages of the speech: "I deprecate the constant attacks that are made in this House as to what has and is taking place in the North of Persia . . . I am not in a position very often to have any information in regard to some of the statements. Even if I had, I do not consider it my business to investigate all the circumstances on each side, and then to say exactly what is true . . . Russia in the North of Persia finds it necessary to take certain measures to protect her trade or her strategic interests. Those are not necessarily a breach of the Anglo-Russian agreement. Look at the second paragraph of the preamble, which begins 'Considering that each of the Powers, Great Britain and Russia, has for geographical and economic reason a special interest in the maintenance of peace and order in certain provinces of Persia. With a Preamble like that you cannot say for a moment, when either country takes steps to intervene in a particular region in Persia where it has been admitted by the Preamble to have special interests, and to take action to protect those interests which it considers in danger—you cannot consider that as necessarily a breach of the Agreement. There are certain things in the Anglo-Russian Agreement which would be a distinct breach. A breach of Article 1 or Article 2 of the Agreement is, of course, a thing which would be taken up. In all the criticism which has been offered in this House in respect to the Agreement, only once that I remember has there been any reference to the really operative articles of the agreement, or any allegation, at any rate, that any one of these had been broken." Or, again: "It is impossible for us, in different parts of the world, when disputes arise between other countries, to undertake to be the arbiter in those disputes." And he applies this general statement to disputes between the Russian and Persian Governments in Northern Persia. The impression conveyed by these passages—I do not say that it was intended to be conveyed—is that the action of Russia in Northern Persia must be regarded as a matter of comparative indifference to ourselves, unless any distinct British interest in that region be affected. Further, that the Preamble of the Convention justifies what has taken place in Northern Persia, and that it is not so much the Preamble upon which we must lay emphasis as the particular articles of the Convention.

Now, if such passages could really be taken seriously, we should be fain to face with two distinct and mutually destructive interpretations of the Anglo-Russian Convention. One would be the interpretation conveyed in the name of the Governments of Great Britain and Russia to the Persian Government in September, 1907, and given to the House of Commons in February, 1908; the other would be Sir Edward Grey's interpretation of February, 1912. The entirely heterodox nature of the later version compels us to regard it as due either to a lapse of memory or to defects in expression.

But the fallacies which underlie it must be made clear. In the first place, there are distinct British interests in Northern Persia, and these are directly menaced by what has taken place there. To mention only one, there is the considerable trade of Great Britain with Tabriz in Northern Persia, the result of a century of British effort. The city of Tabriz is at present occupied and practically administered by Russia. Does that fact alone not constitute a menace to a distinct British interest in Northern Persia? Secondly, if you enlarge the meaning of that portion of the Preamble which was quoted by Sir Edward Grey to include strategic interests as he himself enlarged it, at what point will you be able to stop? Turkey has also strategic interests in the North of Persia—interests which are vital to the future of the Ottoman Empire in Asia. When the Russian troops pour in on one side these interests dictate to the Turkish Government the necessity of redressing the balance. But these considerations, important though they no doubt are, sink into comparative insignificance beside the menace to the fundamental principle of the Anglo-Russian Convention which is involved by the continued presence of the Russian troops in Northern Persia and by the proceedings of Russian agents and officials in that region. We have not all of us forgotten the official interpretation placed upon the Convention and we shall take care that others are not permitted to forget it. Everything, as Lord Percy declared in 1908, depends on the interpretation. Was there anything, he asked, to prevent the creation of spheres of influence? What assurances had we received from the Russian Government on such points?

And Sir Edward Grey replied that the so-called spheres laid down in the Convention were "only British and Russian spheres in a sense which is in no way derogatory to the independence and sovereignty of Persia." Then there was the declaration, officially conveyed to our own Government, of the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs to the effect that "This Agreement between the two European Powers which have the greatest interests in Persia, based as it is upon a guarantee of her independence and integrity, can only serve to further and promote Persian interests, for henceforth Persia, aided and assisted by these two powerful neighbouring States, can employ all her powers in internal reforms." In view of all that has gone before, how can it be contended for a single moment that the action of Russia in Northern Persia are a matter of comparative indifference to ourselves, as co-signatory with the Russian Government of that Convention? The whole Convention falls with the fall of its fundamental principle, which is that the independence and integrity of Persia shall be respected absolutely. The words I have underlined are the official and precise instructions given by Sir Edward Grey to our representative in Teheran. Surely it was, and remains, the business of our Foreign Minister to satisfy himself that any action taken by the two Powers, or by either of them, in Persia should be conformable with the fundamental principle.

As for the breach of particular articles of the Convention—in Afghanistan, in Persia or in Tibet—to which Sir Edward Grey complains, no reference has been made, does anyone suppose that the Russian Government would take the trouble, even if it had the desire, to commit a breach of these articles at the present time? Nothing would be more absurd while, under cover of the Convention the greater part of Persia is being absorbed. The point made by Sir Edward Grey is surely a mere debating point, scarcely worthy of a responsible statesman. So is the point made against Mr. Ponsonby, that Mr. Ponsonby was, in fact, inviting him to prevent Russia from regaining and retaining the influence which she possessed in Northern Persia before the Convention was signed. What ever legitimate influence she then possessed was of a commercial nature, and it was the object of the Convention, as officially interpreted, to prevent this kind of influence, whether exercised by Russia or by ourselves, from being extended to the internal affairs of Persia. Persia was to be given a free hand—she was even to be given assistance—in effecting her own regeneration. When she took that task in hand in a really serious manner, Russia came down with a heavy hand upon her, and we looked in vain for Sir Edward Grey and the fundamental principle. Nobody desires to deprive Russia of any legitimate influence in Northern Persia. Let her apply her capital and industry to the development of the country. It will be good for Persia, good for Russia, and good for the rest of the world. That is quite a different thing from covering the country with her troops and performing acts of sovereignty which are wholly incompatible with the bed rock principle of her Convention with ourselves.

One general reflection is forcibly suggested by Sir Edward Grey's speech. Nobody who listened to it could fail to be painfully impressed by the utter want of sympathy which it displayed from beginning to end with the Persian people. One could scarcely credit the evidence of one's eyes and of one's ears that a pronouncement of this cold, hard, pitiless nature should be delivered from that bench. I have already alluded to one of the indirect results of the Persian question—the effect which it has had in stimulating public interest in the conduct of Foreign Affairs. It has also proved to be a touchstone of habits of thought among our statesmen. One of the great disadvantages of keeping Foreign Affairs outside-party controversy is that the practice tends to stereotype the strictly official and departmental view in the conduct of our foreign relations. This is almost always a narrow view. When it is expounded by a Liberal Minister, the naked hollowness and inadequacy of the conception is rendered even more conspicuous, and the result is that we have often to turn to the leaders of the party out of office for a more reasonable and also authoritative exposition of the true temper and objects of British policy. Throughout the speeches of Lord Curzon on the Persian question there runs a vein of truly Liberal sentiment and principle, which contrasts, as white to black, with the speeches of the Liberal Foreign Secretary. This contrast is, no doubt, partly due to the modern practice to which I have alluded, but it is also interesting as a psychological fact.

Few causes could be better calculated to elicit the sympathies of Liberals than the cause of Persia; and few questions call more loudly for the application of Liberal principles. That is where the real difficulty comes in of our "condominium" with the Russian Government in Persia. But anyone who has given serious thought to the future of our relations with Russia will probably have come to the conclusion that, if they are to be productive of benefits to the world at large—if healthy fruit and not poisonous plants are to be their outcome—then it is in the direction of Liberalizing Russian policy that our friendship must become operative. In the declarations of M. Isvolaky we have already received satisfactory evidence that hopes such as these are not necessarily fantastic. But, if they are to be realized, if the friendship is to continue and be rendered productive, British policy in relation to Russia, must be watchful and persistent, and not remiss, forgetful and indifferent to the end in view. In Persia we have a field where the character of Anglo-Russian friendship will be given its future shape and imprint. Should that imprint be reactionary and destructive of the liberties of Persia, there can be no doubt that the axe will have been laid to the very stem of the tree of Anglo-Russian co-operation in Asiatic affairs.

Can Great Britain afford—it may be, under the pressure of circumstances—to throw over the fundamental principle of the Anglo-Russian Convention? From Sir Edward Grey's recent language it might almost appear that we could afford to do so. Moreover, I notice in certain quarters of the Press, probably inspired from official sources, a tendency to regard as quixotic any efforts on our part to protect the liberties of Persia. In this connection it is only fair to Sir Edward Grey to state that he did appear to contemplate the possibility of a failure of his declared policy at the time when, in 1908, he explained to the House of Commons the meaning of the Convention. He seemed to argue that, even in the event of such a failure, the Indian frontier would be safe. But those passages of his speech of 1908 are open to a crushing reply. He told us that strategic considerations had been paramount with the Government in making the Agreement concerning Persia. He argued that the key to India lay in Seistan, which had been included in the British sphere. We were at all events safe, he went on to say, from the danger of a Russian railway through Seistan to the coast of the Indian Ocean. I am sorry to say that we cannot accept this version of the origin of the Convention either as quite accurate or as complete. If strategic interests were really paramount in deciding us to make this Agreement with Russia, why was not the Defence Committee called together and invited to pronounce upon the strategic considerations involved? Moreover, everybody knows that our real object in making the Agreement was to include Russia in our political entente with France or, in other words, to constitute a rival camp in Europe for the purpose of balancing the Triple Alliance. There may be much to be said for a policy of this nature as, equally, there is much to be said against it. But there can be little doubt that this policy in the hands of Sir Edward Grey has proved a failure. It has brought us into unnecessary antagonism with Germany—a country which constitutes one of the great civilizing forces in the world and provides us with one of our best markets. It has involved us in great sacrifices of paramount British interests in various parts of the world. If we are to continue to pursue this policy, it must be worked in a different spirit. And our friends in the Triple Entente must be brought to pay more regard to the vital interests of this country.

Now, the future of Persia and, it must be added, the future of those regions which constitute the Ottoman Empire in Asia are both intimately bound up with the future of the British Empire. If we are not to become a great military Power, if our people are to be spared the burden of military conscription, then it is all-important to us that the military Powers of Europe should be kept at a safe distance from our Indian Empire. That is why any form or measure of absorption of Persia by Russia—a process which is not dictated by any expansive needs of her population, but is artificially stimulated by a clique—is so dangerous to ourselves. For the sake of argument, let us limit it to Northern Persia and examine in what direction it would lead.

The area delimited by the Convention as subject to Russian industrial development is an area larger than that of France. It includes the modern and the more ancient capitals of Persia and most of her principal cities. Strategically, it contains the keys of the Turkish Empire in Asia. Any Power which is politically predominant in that region controls the machinery which is capable of operating over vast regions in Asia. And if that Power were to proceed to military occupation, the time could not be far distant when her frontier would march with our own frontier. The Turkish Empire, our natural ally in this part of the world, would then be weakened beyond repair, and we should have to trust to our own military resources to defend a frontier which we could not leave to look after itself.

Seistan is only one of the keys to India, and Sir Edward Grey admitted that the occupation of Northern Persia would provide Russia with two doors to Herat instead of one. But we need no labour questions of this kind. If Russia were in occupation of Northern Persia, for how long could we keep her out of Seistan?

Could you erect a stable Persian Government in what is called the "neutral sphere"? Even if you could, which is very doubtful, you would have lost the weight of the Turkish factor, and you would only be putting off the evil day. It is no doubt for these and analogous reasons that Lord Curzon in his book on Persia summed up the situation by declaring that the maintenance of the integrity and independence of Persia must be regarded as a cardinal article in our Imperial creed. I commend this phrase to those of his own party who are inclined to wink at present developments in Persia.

During the past few months, ultimatums to Persia have been raining in from Russia. Mr. Shuster, who was rapidly restoring order to the Persian finances, has been dismissed by order of Russia, and so has the Persian Parliament. It was agreed that Persian compliance should be promptly followed by the withdrawal of the Russian troops from Persia. The promise remains unfulfilled. But these proceedings have had the effect of opening the eyes of British public opinion, and they will not easily again become closed. As a result, the situation has grown slightly more easy, and the ex-Shah, whose operations were the prime cause of the present troubles, has been removed from the country. It is understood that our Government has notified that of Russia that we can never recognize him as Shah of Persia. If the Russian Government be really desirous of acting in a spirit of good faith towards us, how comes it that it does not join in this declaration? As co-signatory with ourselves of the Protocol of 1909, under which the ex-Shah was removed from the clutches of the Constitutionalist forces, and as responsible for his "escape" and return to Persia, the Russian Government must surely see that to persist in their ambiguous attitude towards the ex-Shah is not exactly the best way to allay British suspicions of Russian policy. Persia can never really settle down while the ex-Shah is held in terrorem over her head. As matters now stand, the future of Persia still hangs in the balance and that balance is held in the hands of her two powerful neighbours, who are engaged in the impossible task of thinking out a common formula for the expression of opposite policies.

Certain conditions have been presented by both Powers to the Persian Government for acceptance in return for a small loan. They display little consideration for the Persian Government, and the rate of interest on the loan is 7 per cent. instead of 5 per cent., which was the interest on previous advances. Should they be accepted by the Persian Government without very close scrutiny, they may involve the destruction of Persian independence and the establishment of a Russian Protectorate. The Persian Government is asked to accept the Anglo-Russian convention and to make it the basis of their policy. What does this mean? If Persia was to be bound, the Persian Government should in the first instance have been made a party to the Convention. In what sense is that Government invited so late in the day to base its policy upon the Convention? The operative articles provide that neither Great Britain nor Russia are to seek concessions on their own behalf or on behalf of third parties in certain regions of Persia, and they are not to oppose one another in applying for such concessions in certain other regions. Is the Persian Government to accept the principle that third parties are to be ruled out in applications for concessions in these regions? If so, what is to become of existing Persian treaties with foreign countries, which provide most favoured nation treatment for the commerce and industry of those countries in Persia? Such is the question which at once suggests itself to any student of Persian affairs, and it requires an authoritative answer. Only by the acceptance of some form of protectorate, and by its recognition by the other countries concerned, can the Persian Government, it would seem, base its future policy upon a principle which would violate the rights and privileges of such countries in Persia.

Another condition is that the Persian Volunteers should be disbanded, and also the irregular troops, and that in their place should be organized a small, regular army. The Volunteers and the Bakhtiari levies have proved in the past to be the main supports of the Liberal party in Persia—the party which has given Persia her Constitution and her Parliament. Sir Edward Grey was asked in the House of Commons the other day whether the proposed new Persian army was to be officered by Russians. His reply was, "It may be." I very much doubt whether even the Russian Government would make such an absurd proposal. There is no analogy between the Persian regular army and the small brigade of Persian Cossacks which was organized under Russian officers as a kind of bodyguard in Teheran. The Persian regular army is entrusted with the custody of the frontiers; and has Sir Edward Grey so completely forgotten the interests of Turkey as to suggest that Russian officers should be employed on the Turkish frontier, while he himself has so jealously provided against their employment in the regions which adjoin the Indian frontier?—H. Turkey is hurrying re-inforcements to Albania where revolt has broken out at Scutari and Ipek, and troops have sustained a reverse. It is feared that the Mirdites and other powerful clans will join the revolt.

Reuter wired from Constantinople.—The Albanians who are in revolt demand the same privileges as were granted to the Malisori in 1911, including the right to carry arms. It is reported that the revolt has spread to Diakova where the garrison has been attacked and surrounded and communications cut. Gendarmery guardhouses in Mirdite country have been burned. The authorities suspect the Italian secret agents but are confident that the force is sufficient to crush the revolt.

Reuter wired from Constantinople.—The work of removing mines from the Dardanelles has been suspended on the plea of unfavourable weather. The delay is disquieting to shipping circles and is making an impression in diplomatic quarters.

Reuter wired from St Petersburg.—A concience of the representatives of trade and the Ministry of Commerce came to the conclusion that free passage of the Dardanelles was not assured even in the future and decided to memorialise the Government urging the necessity of passage from the Black Sea for Russian trade and requesting that every means should be employed to secure the passage.

The work of clearing the Dardanelles is making satisfactory progress. It was expected that it would be completed on the 14th instant.

The Italians have occupied the islands of Caxo, Scrapanto, Piscopi and Misera, and are sending troops to form garrisons there. The authorities have been made prisoners and have been sent to Italy.

Reuter wires from Rome.—The Italians have further captured the islands of Kalismo, Lero and Patmoh. The Turkish authorities and officials have been taken on board warships.

The Italians are making extensive preparations for the administration of the recently captured islands. They have established a steamship service between Brindisi, Stampalia and Rhodes, and many police and other officials are already en route for the islands.

Mr. Smallwood, correspondent of the Daily Chronicle with Turks, has been killed in a skirmish near Derna, Tripoli.

Reuter wires from Rome.—The Italians surprised the Arabs at Tobruk, driving them off and killing over a hundred. The Italian casualties were six.

Reuter wires from Constantinople.—The Chamber of Deputies cheered on a telegram being read from Enver Bey declaring that all the Turks in Tripoli were determined to resist to the end.

Reuter wires from Constantinople.—According to the latest official reports the search for the mines in the Dardanelles is completed and it is anticipated that the Straits will be opened on the 17th instant or on Saturday.

Bari, April 23

The Italians have occupied an island opposite to Bu Kemmesh and also a house on the mainland by surprise. Only five Arabs were there.

They landed not less than 5,000 infantry, six guns and some cavalry, and seven transports have since arrived and are waiting to disembark. Their efforts to reconnoitre or advance have been repulsed by the Arabs.

The Turco-Arab force is rapidly increasing and awaits the Italian advance with full confidence. The Turks have both guns and cavalry and the situation looks like developing into the usual deadlock.

Meanwhile religious fanaticism and unrest are spreading throughout North Africa and the interior. Volunteers are flocking from vast distances to the Crescent. The Italians are teaching the Arabs that they are able to stand against one of the Great Powers. Italy is waking sleeping dogs that England and France must quiet later on.

Rome, April 23.

According to news from Tripoli the Italian troops entrenched at Bu Kemmesh were attacked to-day by the Turks. The battle lasted until 2 o'clock in the afternoon, the Italians finally claiming a complete victory. The Italians lost seven killed and about 70 wounded.—Reuter.

[Bu Kemmesh is about 30 miles west of Zuara and about 100 miles west of Tripoli.]

Athens, April 23.

According to an official despatch from Euboea, an armoured cruiser with five torpedo boat destroyers put in at Karystos on Saturday morning. She was flying no flag and was towed by one of the destroyers. Some fishermen who approached state that the cruiser had a hole in her side, they were positive that the ships were Italian. In the afternoon the vessels left Karystos for Laurium, probably bound for Italy. It is supposed that the cruiser is the vessel which the Turks claim to have disabled during the bombardment of Kum Kaleh.

Rome, April 20.

The Tribuna yesterday, commenting on the Italian naval demonstration before the Dardanelles, says—

"The first impression which was to be gathered from the news was that the fleet was about to force the Dardanelles, but the aim of yesterday's action was not and could not be that. In the first place, it would be necessary to show the immediate utility of such an undertaking and to consider, in addition, that such an action would call for time and for systematic preparation which has not been carried out up to the present.

"The action had, however, other objects from the point of view of military policy which were completely attained. On the political side it was necessary to confirm in a tangible manner the denials already made by our Government to those who had affirmed that our liberty of action in certain seas, and notably in the Aegean, was placed under restraint. Our action yesterday showed that that was not true. We showed Turkey, in particular, that on such pillows people do not sleep peacefully. What we did yesterday we can, therefore, repeat to-morrow if circumstances should point to such action as advisable for the termination of the war. Among the innumerable false statements which Turkey has circulated among her people was included one stating that our fleet did not dare to appear in the Aegean. We have proved the contrary, while Turkey did not make good her boastings by bringing out her ships from their solitary refuge. Also, from the point of view of the Tripoli war, it was necessary to demonstrate that the traffic in contraband on the Turkish coasts can be punished on those coasts, while the cost of the war, which Turkey professes not to feel, can be there made very real.

"It was desired to show all this to the Young Turks, who proved that they had no means of resistance other than the closing of highways to the commerce of the world. That is what we do not desire, at least for the present. The Italian squadron will retire from the gates of Constantinople, of which, however, it has not taken final leave, but merely said au revoir!"

The following semi-official communiqué is published here—

The statements contained in the interpellation of a Deputy in the Austrian Chamber as to the alleged assurances of the Italian Government that it would not extend the theatre of war to European territory are incorrect. The Italian Government has never declared that it wished to restrict the field of its warlike activity except as regards Adriatic and Ionian waters—seas where warlike action would have been contrary to Italian interests"—Reuter.

Rome, April 24.

The Tribuna publishes a telegram from Sofia of yesterday's date giving the contents of the reply of the Porte to the steps taken by the Powers with a view to securing a cessation of the Turco-Italian war.

"After thanking the Powers for the mission they had undertaken in accordance with the highest interests of European peace and Turkish civilization, the Porte affirms that nothing justified Italy's ultimatum. The Porte replied to the ultimatum in a pacific tone and in a manner which would permit of a cordial understanding and a useful discussion on the differences and incidents which had arisen. But without waiting for that, Italy issued a declaration of war. Turkey was sadly astonished by the official announcement of the sudden opening of hostilities because she was convinced that she could settle the matter by good will and by the concession of such of the demands put forward by Italy in Tripolitania as were compatible with the sacred rights of the Sultan, and especially because Italy was among the powers pledged to maintain the territorial integrity of Turkey The righteousness of Turkey's cause in the war is therefore incontestable.

After emphasizing the fact that the Porte was subjected to and did not provoke the present state of affairs, the Note goes on to investigate the moral and political consequences of a voluntary cessation of hostilities, apart from the loss of military prestige which would be compromised by a withdrawal of the troops from Africa. The Porte cannot but reflect with affection and gratitude on the native populations of Libya, who have even attracted the attention of the Powers by the splendid example of loyalty and sacrifice which the Arab tribesmen have given, by hastening to fight with the Turkish Regular Army against the invaders. The devoted attachment at the price of their blood which they have exhibited for the Sultan and the Empire, the immense sacrifices which they have borne for so many months for the love of Turkey, and their hatred of the invaders ought to be taken into consideration by the Powers as an equitable reason why the Porte finds it impossible to abandon to the enemy so many thousands of subjects devoted to its sovereignty, while she has to her credit a determined army of considerable size, which gives her the right to call herself mistress of the country.

"Continuing, the Porte refers to the feats of arms accomplished by Turkey's forces in Tripolitania and Cyrenaica, declaring that the heroic resistance of the Turks, aided by the native population, has almost always put a check upon the advance of the enemy—an enemy stronger in numbers, possessing a powerful fleet, and using weapons infinitely superior to theirs. That shows that the Army of the invaders has not been successful in its military operations. Therefore, the invaders, finding it impossible to assure their supremacy by the operations in African territory, desired to extend their field of action, taking the extraordinary step of attacking and bombarding the Straits while the Porte was still giving its kindly consideration to the representations of the mediating Powers and while the labours of the new Constitutional Assembly of the Empire were being inaugurated. No Power desires peace more sincerely than Turkey, who is passing through a period of internal reorganization, but that desire cannot imply a renunciation of the fundamental rights constituting the basis of the Ottoman State. Turkey is honestly and sincerely appreciative of the Powers and endeavours to restore that tranquility of which the Ottoman Government has need in order to continue to carry into effect for the good of the whole world its long programme of reform. The Porte declares itself ready to enter into negotiations on the basis of the maintenance of direct Ottoman sovereignty over Tripolitania and Cyrenaica. Turkey could only consent to negotiations on bases compatible with the existence of the Empire.

"The memorandum says that any solution not providing for the maintenance of the effective and integral rights of the Porte and the withdrawal of the Italian troops from Tripolitania is impossible. It repeats that the Porte is prepared to grant economic concession to Italy"—Reuter

(THE TIMES.)

In the course of his speech at the opening of the Turkish Parliament the Sultan made the following reference to the Commission which has been appointed to settle the question of the Turco-Persian frontier:

With a view to solving the frontier question between Our Government and the Persian Government, a mixed Commission has been appointed in order to ensure reciprocal rights in demarcating the respective spheres. We trust that an agreement will be reached within the prescribed time. It, however, contrary to our expectation, this agreement is not complete and certain points remain doubtful they will be referred to the Arbitration Tribunal at The Hague. The verdict delivered by this international Supreme Court, composed of the most eminent lawyers of all civilized countries, will naturally be respected.

With regard to the Salonika telegram published in the Times of 17th April, which stated that the court-martial appointed to try the instigators of the massacres at Ishtib on 15th December had been disbanded without sentencing a single perpetrator of the outrages, we have received the following information from the Turkish Embassy:

"The court-martial has already sentenced more than 40 guilty persons to different penalties, varying from hard labour for life to 15 years imprisonment and other penalties. These sentences have already been ratified."

I propose of the fact that certain Italian papers now accuse England of not being willing to force Turkey in the recognition of the fait accompli the Commentator observes caustically—

When there is a fait accompli, it will be time enough to recognise it, but in spite of the glowing reports of the Italian victories, the truth leaks out from time to time, and we learn that Italy is by no means in possession even of the coast line. Not so long ago a troop of Grenadiers made a reconnaissance towards Zanzur. Whilst digging trenches the soldiers were attacked by Arabs on horseback. The Italian Press published an account of this affair as being most successful, there being only ten killed and thirty wounded, whereas in reality, the soldiers were forced to abandon their shovels and pickaxes, twelve were killed, and sixty wounded—all shot in the back. . . . The bad feeling expressed in Italy can only be explained by the indecent haste in which they embarked on their campaign, without counting the cost, or realising the difficulties that beset their path. The idea of Italy taking upon herself the task of civilising the Arabs in Tripoli and Cyrenaica is ludicrous in the face of the facts that 52 per cent of the population in Southern Italy are illiterate, and that they began their campaign by a massacre of women and children.

The Dardanelles Adventure.

(FROM THE "DAILY CHRONICLE" CORRESPONDENT.)

Milan, April 21.

THE very outspoken leading article which has appeared in the London Times with regard to Italy's naval activity in the Dardanelles has made a profound impression here. More so since the copious citations from that organ of British Conservative opinion in the Italian Nationalist Press from the date of the outbreak of the war with Turkey, had induced the Italian public to believe that this powerful journal was wholeheartedly espousing Italy's cause against the Turks.

The Corriere Della Sera characterises the Times article as stupefying, and adds "The Times sees only that British interests are threatened, but shows itself blind to the fact that the general interest calls for clear and decided action on Italy's part, and so put an end to the present uncertain situation. If England wants to exert action she must turn her attention to Turkey."

The Morning Post's apologetic leader in Italy's favour, is on the other hand, reproduced with intense satisfaction and approval.

Italy is decidedly opposed to the proposal for an International Conference for the arbitration of her quarrel with Turkey, as she realises that such a course would spell compromise. There is a strong and widespread impression among the Italian public that the recent action at the entrance of the Dardanelles was intended to create a timely pretext for Russian intervention on the basis of an open violation of that Power's formal understanding with the Sublime Porte that the Dardanelles should never be closed under any circumstances whatever. It is moreover very generally argued that Italy would never risk single-handed the possible defeat of her troops at the hands of the Ottoman army in European Turkey, nor the probable loss of at least half her fleet in forcing a passage through the Dardanelles to Constantinople, and the only remaining hope of escape from the actual impasse is that of involving some other Great Power in the struggle against the Crescent.

The attitude of the foremost organs of the Nationalist Press has now become serio-comic, as they by turn pray and beseech Turkey, in view of her naval and financial limitations, to yield, then roundly abuse the Italian Government on the score of its lack of statesmanship and for bringing foreign ridicule on Italy by the precipitate flight from the Dardanelles.

These organs too are unsparing in their criticism of the conduct of the campaign in Libya (Tripoli), because 25 of Italy's picked Generals with an army estimated at 123,000 men have merely wrenched five miles of territory towards the hinterland from the Arabs in seven months' fighting. On the other hand, several leading Generals on the spot continue to publish their conviction that a march inland would be impolitic and perilous, very possibly disastrous.

(THE "MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.")

The Berlin Lokal-Anzeiger publishes an alarming telegram from its Vienna correspondent, saying that Italy had long been trying to obtain from Austria carte blanche on the subject of the Dardanelles, but that the late Count Aehrenthal flatly refused to give it, whereupon Italy promised to renounce the scheme of attacking the straits. Now that Italy (continues the correspondent) has revealed her intention of disregarding her previous engagement, Count Berchtold is determined to enforce it at all costs. The Austrian navy has been ordered to hold itself in readiness, and a Note has been drawn up in "language which goes to the uttermost limit of friendly representation," which will be immediately transmitted to the Italian Foreign Office should an attempt be made in earnest by the Italian navy to force the Dardanelles.

The Lokal-Anzeiger is in Austrian matters generally very well informed, but the Berlin correspondent of the Temps claims to be in a position to assert that its version of the state of diplomatic relations between Austria and Italy on the question of the bombardment of the Dardanelles is "absolutely inexact." Referring to Great Britain's action some three or four weeks ago in proposing to Italy the exclusion of the Aegean from the field of naval operations, the Temps correspondent says that that action was not supported by Austria, which has an understanding with Italy about the Ionian Sea, but refuses to limit Italy's freedom in any other part of the Mediterranean. The writer asserts that the information published by the popular Berlin journal had for its sole aim to embitter the feelings of the Italians against Austria.

It is doubtful whether the correspondent of the Temps has any other authority for his statements than his own surmises. At any rate, it is interesting to note that the Journal des Débats finds itself justified in stating that "the Rome Cabinet addressed an inquiry to the Great Powers on the subject of a possible action in the Dardanelles, and all the Powers, with the exception, perhaps, of Russia, dissuaded her from undertaking it." The Débats makes this important statement in the course of a leading article, adding that "there is ground for believing that these objections were taken (by the Italian Government) into serious consideration."

While the Débats along with the majority of the other French papers, condemns the action of Italy as useless to her and dangerous to the peace of Europe, M. Jaurès, writing in the Humanité brackets it with the latest events in Morocco and attacks Europe as morally responsible for the present humiliating and perilous state of affairs. "The ignominious comedy," he says, "which the Powers are enacting at Constantinople emphasises still more strongly the consequences of the Moroccan policy. To have delivered Tripoli to the cupidity of Italy and pushed her on to make an impudent attempt from which war was bound to ensue, and then to affect a Christian solicitude for peace—this is one of those pieces of hypocrisy which, even in these times of moral paralysis, revolt all consciences not yet entirely dead. The diplomats know well that their action can have no other effect than to furnish Italy with a pretext for enlarging the field of military operations." M. Jaurès winds up by crying out "And thus the Moroccans are massacred, international law is outraged, Europe, having scarcely emerged from a formidable crisis, is threatened with a new one, and the moral force of France is debased."

The Story of the Dardanelles.

By H. SACHSE

The Italian bombardment of the Dardanelles is not the first attempt in modern times of a fleet to force its way through the Straits to Constantinople. The Russian fleet made several attempts in 1770 under the command of Sir Samuel Greig, a Scotchman who had seen service under Hawke and won the title of Father of the Russian Navy. Nothing was effected because the Sultan had in the Chevalier Tott an excellent Engineer officer who fortified the entrance to the Dardanelles with great skill.

The only European fleet which has actually forced its way through the Dardanelles was the British squadron under Admiral Duckworth. At the end of 1806, Russian pressure drove the Sultan into the arms of Napoleon. The Emperor Alexander persuaded the British Government to send a fleet to compel Turkey to abandon the French alliance, and in February, 1807, Lord Collingwood was ordered to send a squadron under Sir John Duckworth to Constantinople. Sir John was an incompetent person and the expedition very nearly ended in complete disaster. There was no difficulty in forcing a passage through the Dardanelles, which were at this time hardly fortified, but trouble began when the ships lay before Constantinople.

Duckworth had received strict orders not to negotiate. He disobeyed them and precious time was wasted. Colonel Sebastiani, Napoleon's famous agent, roused the Turks to resistance, and under his direction, batteries were erected at every strategical point.

The Dardanelles are some fifty miles long, the maximum width of the channel is a little more than four miles, and it narrows down to a mile and a quarter, the shores are hilly, giving splendid stations for defensive batteries. A fleet which had to run the gauntlet would have a highly dangerous task, and it was this into which Duckworth allowed himself to drift. He waited for the completion of the Turkish preparations before on 1st March commencing the return journey. More by fortune than skill, he brought the squadron through with no greater loss than 300 men, and no attempt was made to repeat the enterprise.

Since then, until Thursday, no fleet has ever forced, or tried to force, its way through the Dardanelles, although on repeated occasions fleets have passed through without the consent of the Sultan, and in breach of international agreement. In 1833, when Mahomet Ali, the revolted Pasha of Egypt, threatened Constantinople, Russia sent a squadron to protect the Sultan's capital, and later in the same year the Russian Baltic fleet passed through the Straits into the Black Sea. In 1840, when Mahomet Ali again threatened Constantinople, the English fleet entered the Straits. In 1853, when Russia occupied the Principalities and before the declaration of war, the English and French fleets passed through the Dardanelles, and again in 1878, when the Russian army lay outside Constantinople, the British fleet was sent through the Straits.

It is very improbable that the passage could be forced by a fleet to-day. The Turks have had months in which to fortify the Straits, and what with modern guns, mines and submarines the long and narrow channel is probably impregnable. At the very least the Italian fleet would lose several ships. That is the opinion of prudent men in Italy. They realise that even if the Italian fleet could force its way through it could not strike a vital blow which would compel Turkey to make peace. Constantinople may not be fortified and could not therefore be bombarded. In any event, a bombardment would merely cause loss of life and property. The Italians could not land and occupy the city. And even if they could they would be no nearer peace. The political reaction might, of course, be very considerable, but that, though disturbing to Europe, would not assist Italy. Against these very dubious advantages, Italy must set the very real probability of losing a large part of her fleet, and so surrendering for an indefinite period her chance of naval supremacy in the Adriatic or Eastern Mediterranean.

If in spite of the overwhelming arguments against action in the Dardanelles the Italian fleet has commenced operations, this is due to two forces—the growing discontent of the Italian people at the prolongation of the war and the agitation of the Jungo "Nationalist" Party, which made the war and sees its own bankruptcy ahead. There is one other probable force—Russian influence. Russia and Italy are peculiarly intimate just now, and Russia has the very highest interest in raising the question of the Dardanelles. It is not probable, however, that the Italian Government means to push the enterprise home. The idea is probably to do just enough to soothe the "discontented" in Italy and to give Russia a chance to raise the whole question of the status of the Dardanelles when the time comes to make peace.

The status of the Dardanelles and of the Bosphorus—the Bosphorus is the channel connecting Constantinople with the Black Sea, just as the Dardanelles connects the Sea of Marmora, and so Constantinople, which lies at the eastern end of the Sea of Marmora, with the Aegean is very peculiar. In fourteenth and fifteenth centuries the Turks conquered all the territory round the Dardanelles, the Sea of Marmora, the Bosphorus, the Black Sea and the Sea of Azov. All these waters were treated as strictly territorial waters. The Sultan for a long time permitted no foreign ship, war or merchant, to enter any of these waters. The French in the sixteenth century made a commercial treaty with the Sultan, but their merchant ships were not allowed to pass beyond Constantinople, for warships the prohibition remained absolutely. It was in 1700 that Peter the Great first made a lodgment on the coast of these southern waters by capturing Azof, but she was not allowed to put a ship upon the waters of the Black Sea. From this time the opening of a way through to the Mediterranean became a supreme object of Russian policy, Russian arms gradually conquered the northern shores of the Black Sea, and in 1774 the treaty of Kutchuk Kanardji gave Russia and all the other Powers the right to send their merchant ships through the Straits. From that time the full territorial sovereignty of the Sultan over these waters was at an end.

The Russians aimed at getting a free passage for their warships and they wanted this to be not a right common to all the Powers, but a Russian prerogative. In 1798 they imposed a treaty to that effect upon Turkey. According to this the Straits were to be open to Russian warships and closed to those of all other non-Turkish Powers. In 1805 this treaty was renewed, but French intervention brought it to an end. It was consequent upon this that the Duckworth expedition was sent. In 1809 England intervened decisively. As long ago as 1700 the British Government tried to keep Russia out of southern waters. Warned by the Russo-Turkish Treaty of 1805, the British Government made with Turkey, in 1808, a treaty under which the Sultan undertook to close the Straits to the warships of all Powers. The treaty called this an "ancient rule of the Ottoman Empire." It was nothing of the kind, but England, with the assistance of France, made it a rule of international law. Russia, Prussia, Austria and France accepted it by signing the Convention of London of 1841, and it was embodied in the Treaty of Paris of 1856 and in the Convention of London in 1871. One of the main purposes of Russia in the war of 1877 was to get this rule overthrown, but England got it confirmed at the Congress of Berlin, and it governs the status of the Straits to-day. Russia, however, has never professed to like the rule, which practically excludes her as a maritime Power from the Mediterranean. In 1908, at the time of the Balkan crisis, Russia tried to get the Straits opened, and again last December, she will try again when peace is being made between Italy and Turkey. The question is of very great importance to this country, as will be explained in a subsequent article.—The Daily News.

Italy and the War.

(By THE "TIMES" MILITARY CORRESPONDENT.)

THOSE who have been watching the current of opinion in Italy, have been aware for some weeks past that a change in the plan of campaign was impending. This change has been brought about by a serious miscalculation in the original plan, which contained a wholly erroneous estimate of the probable attitude of the Arabs in North Africa. It was believed that when Italy had occupied the chief centres of population on the coast and had beaten the Turkish Regulars, the Arabs would not be slow to forswear their allegiance to the Sultan and to welcome the Italians with open arms.

When this expectation proved to be false, the whole plan of campaign collapsed. We must not blame General Caneva or the Italian troops for not doing impossibilities. The Italian higher command may occasionally have appeared to us slow to take advantage of opportunities, and to have displayed at times a prudence which seemed exaggerated, but in the main it has been justified in refusing to pursue the mirages of the desert. The Italian Army was not equipped for a desert campaign, nor were the troops suited to the work. Objective there was none, or at least none that promised any decisive result if it were attained. A desert campaign meant long preparation, heavy cost, and much loss of life on the chance of a success which was at best entirely problematical—considerations which should have been accorded more weight before the Decree of Annexation was launched.

When the writer pointed out these things early during the war and showed the extraordinary difficulties of desert warfare he was gently reproved by the Italian Press for want of faith in Italian arms. He was informed that the advance would be made by a combination of various measures, and an able critic, General Bompiani, hinted not obscurely in the Corriere della Sera, that the advance would take place last January or February, and that it would be "a classic example of the manner in which a desert campaign should be carried out."

January and February passed, not to speak of March. The campaigning season wore towards its end and nothing was done. We must do the Italians the justice to allow that they tried hard to prosecute the original plan so long as any hope of success remained. They poured troops into North Africa, hoping that the fortune of war or the exhaustion of the enemy would bring Italian Tripoli into the safe haven of an assured peace. At last it dawned upon the Italian Government that the war threatened to be interminable, and a conference of commanders was held in Rome, where doubtless it was discovered that the enemy's centre of gravity had neither been found nor struck. The extension of the war to the Aegean theatre was probably decided on at this moment and preparations were begun to act with vigour.

The first stroke in the Aegean naturally fell to the Italian Navy. Whatever other action might be determined on, it was necessary first of all to win and hold undisputed command at sea. However, inferior the Turkish Navy might be, it possessed some means of action and could not be ignored. It was necessary, as a preliminary to further action, to search thoroughly the European and Asiatic shores of Turkey in the Aegean, to examine the islands, and to interrupt as far as possible all communication between these islands and the mainland. This is the first and the simple task which the Italian Navy has successfully performed, and if in the course of it, some shots have been exchanged at long range with the outer forts of the Dardanelles, we shall see, as we examine the circumstances, that this was merely an episode in the clearing and reconnoitring task allotted to the Italian Fleet and was not premeditated in any way.

Very naturally and excusably, the Italian Naval Staff spread misleading reports in the Press. The First Squadron, it was said, was leaving Taranto to take the place of the Second Squadron, which was coming home for repairs after a six months' cruise. The School Division, it was added, was returning to Italy, after shepherding General Garioni, in order—this was rather thin—to land specialists for courses of instruction. The festivities prepared for the home-coming ships were also described in much detail, and, on the whole, the Press did its work very well and only failed to convince some hardened unbelievers who thought it strange that the future movements of Italian fleets should for the first time during the war be suddenly described with such touching candour.

The command of the Italian Navy has passed in turn from Admiral Aubry to Admiral Paravelli and then to Admiral Viale. The command has suffered from the strain of responsibility, and not improbably that good servant but bad master, wireless telegraphy, is largely accountable for the fact. But the Fleet itself is practically intact and has probably been maintained at a good standard of efficiency by the return home of ships for repair and rest on a regular roster. The Fleet is at present mainly composed of the First and Second Squadrons, each divided into a battleship division and a cruiser division. A torpedo flotilla is attached to each Squadron. In the First Squadron are the battleships Vittorio Emanuele, Regina Elena, Roma, and Napoli, and the armoured cruisers Pisa, Amalfi and San Marco. This Squadron is under Admiral Viale's personal command. The Second Squadron is under Admiral Amero d'Aste, and is made up of the battleships Regina Margherita, Benedetto Brin, Ammiraglio di St. Bon, and Emanuele Filiberto, with the armoured cruisers Giuseppe Garibaldi, Varesse, and Franco-Ferruccio. The School Division is under Admiral Borea-Ricci and has in it the old battleships Sicilia, Sardegna, and Umberto—now more suitably described as protected cruisers—besides the cruisers Carlo Alberto and Marco Polo, and a torpedo flotilla. The Duke of the Abruzzi in the Vettor Pisani commands a division of 24 destroyers and torpedo-boats. Lastly, in the Red Sea are the cruisers Piemonte, Puglia, Liguria, and Calabria, with a few smaller vessels and torpedo craft.

Of these various fractions of the Italian Navy, the School Division has not yet been accounted for, but probably remains off the coast of North Africa to support the Army and to act as a reserve. The Red Sea division has not apparently moved. The blockade of the North African littoral is carried out mainly by auxiliary cruisers and torpedo boats. All the rest of the Navy is, or has recently been, in the Aegean, and at a rough calculation should number eight of the best modern Italian battleships in commission, six armoured cruisers, and 36 destroyers and torpedo boats. Including auxiliary cruisers there are or have been, certainly not less than 60 Italian ships in the Aegean. An examination of a list of the Italian Navy shows that practically all the important ships are accounted for, and it is highly creditable to the Italian Navy and Italian yards that this can be said after six months of cruising and no safe bases in North Africa.

It will have been noticed by those who study the telegrams that the presence of Italian ships has been reported simultaneously from many points in the Aegean, and it is probably true that to each squadron and each division has been allotted for reconnoitring purposes a definite area of the coasts and islands. To the First Squadron and the Duke of the Abruzzi's destroyers has probably been allotted the northern part of the sea from the Gulf of Enos to Mitylene, and to the Second Division the remainder of the Turkish coast of Asia Minor and the islands as far south as Rhodes. Salonika is apparently being left severely alone. The main strength was naturally in the north, because the Turkish fleet was known to be anchored within the Dardanelles, and it was part of Admiral Viale's plan to coax it out into the open sea if it would come.

The First Squadron left Taranto on 15 April, and on the night of 17-18 April cut the cables connecting Lemnos and Imbro with the mainland. The Duke of the Abruzzi's destroyers had meanwhile ranged right up to the Maritza in the Bay of Enos, and by 6-30 A.M. on the morning of the 18th, these forces reunited at a rendezvous out of sight of land in the Gulf of Syros and made for the mouth of the Dardanelles. In order to draw the Turkish Fleet, the Pisa and Amalfi, belonging to Rear-Admiral Presbitero's cruiser division of the First Squadron, were sent ahead to demonstrate against the Turkish forts at Seddul Bahar and Kum Kale, and to lure the Turkish fleet into blue water, where Admiral Viale hoped to fall upon it. A Turkish destroyer showed herself at the mouth of the Straits and when this news was reported by the cruisers two battleships of the First Squadron were sent in to support the two cruisers in case the Turkish fleet should appear. These two battleships had not come within sight of the Straits when the Turkish forts opened fire against Presbitero's ships, then about 7,000 to 8,000 yards distant, but without effect, as the shells fell short. The Turkish destroyer now put about and made the best of her way home. The Turkish fire grew hotter, and at 11 A.M. the Italian ships, as the official report says, were "constrained to reply." They claim to have silenced the Turkish batteries and the Turks claim to have damaged an Italian ship, but as neither side admits the claim of the other, we can only conclude that not much harm was done. According to Italian reports from Athens, Admiral Viale steamed to the northward of the Gallipoli Peninsula after the exchange of shots; but according to the Italian official report from Rome, la forza navale, avendo raggiunto i suoi obiettivi, è in rilla per l'Italia, a statement which conflicts with the information given by the Foreign Office to Lloyd's, and with the subsequent occupation of Stampalia. It may be true, however, that some battleships have returned to Taranto, for the battleship strength is needlessly large.

Meanwhile, the Second Division of the Second Squadron under Rear-Admiral Thaon di Revel, accompanied by some auxiliary cruisers, reached a point between Rhodes City and the Gulf of Makri at dawn on 18 April, cut the cable, and after visiting Marmaris and the Gulf of Kos, captured a yacht belonging to His Highness the Khedive in the Gulf of Makri. The proceedings of the battleship division of the Second Squadron are not yet reported, but it is probably this division that bombarded Samos, and it is not improbable that it looked into the Gulf of Smyrna. Vathy, in the Island of Samos, was bombarded without previous notice by a battleship which was accompanied by a torpedo boat. The barracks were knocked about and some earthworks, mistaken for fortifications, received some attentions. The Turkish garrison, 1,000 strong, retired into the interior of the island. News from Mitylene there is practically none.

At a subsequent date, not yet named, an Italian naval division occupied the island of Stampalia. This island, the ancient Astypalaea, lies between the Turkish island of Kos and the Greek island of Anaphi in the southern part of the Aegean Sea. It consists of two large and elevated masses joined by an isthmus. It is about 14 miles long, and its highest point is 1,660 feet above the sea. There are deep bights on both sides of the isthmus, and as much of the coast is steep-to, ships can approach close to land. The Greek population numbers 2,500 souls, of whom 1,500 reside at Stampalia Town on the east coast of the southern part of the island. The island has obviously been occupied to serve as a temporary base for the Italian Fleet.
